Scenes on board a Passenger Ship.

Mr. Editor: In my former communication I gave your readers a feeble description of the sublimities of ocean scenery. I now call their attention to scenes on board a Passenger Ship.

On the—of the month of——being anxious to return to the land of the "stars and stripes," I secured a passage in a regular packet ship. I had my baggage conveyed on board, and one hour afterwards, we were clear of the Liverpool docks. It was a beautiful afternoon, the sun shone brightly in the heavens, and a fine breeze gently filled the white sails of numerous vessels in the offing. The docks were crowded with people, and the cheerful straths of the merry tars as they sung around the captain their farewell song to the shore and their welcome to the sea, their native element, tended to enliven the spirits, and chase away the gloom and sorrow incident to parting scenes. But yet, scenes of beauty, activity, nor life, could dispel entirely, the gloom from the emigrant's heart, nor hush the sorrows that swelled up in his breast, when called to take the parting hand, and speak his last farewell. What a contrariety of feelings are awakened in the bosom, weet, painful, affectionate, and solemn—what hopes, doubts and fears; what anguish thrills the heart, and how the tear drop falls from affection's sacred fount, at the utterance of this sweet and simple word "farewell." How solemn and plaintive it falls from the lips of him who bids an adieu to the friends of his youth, the home of his fathers, and the graves of his kindred, to seek a habitation in a strange land, far beyond the wailings of the deep blue sea. All the bright, cheerful, and sunny associations of youth,—all the matured affections of happy and joyful days, spent amid the green hills and verdant dales of his own native land, rush in upon the memory and touch a secret and hitherto silent chord, deep hidden in his soul. Our vessel was crowded with passengers, and I could appreciate the deep sorrow of the poor emigrant on his separation with friends beloved. His tearful eye, and heaving breast, and warm pressure of the hand, was language more emphatic than words, and revealed the separation of kindred, the severance of friends, and the parting of hearts true to love and friendship. Many of them loved their native seagirt isles, with as true affection as "father loved, or mother dear;" and as they stood by the side of the noble vessel, as she leaped upon the bosom of the swelling wave, gazing on the green fields that sloped down to the ocean's shore or some ancient church, whose venerable spire towered high above the smoky wreaths that gathered around less elevated structures, or the white cliffs glittering in the sun's departing rays, now feebly and faintly receding from their vision in the distance, till blended amid undistinguishable objects and finally lost in the blue expanse of space;—tears trembled down their cheeks, and they turned aside to hide the anguish of their grief, and weep in solitude.

With whatever enthusiasm, or romantic and poetic feeling an individual may contemplate a sea voyage when surrounded by the social enjoyments of a cheery fireside, should he find himself located as a second or third class passenger in an Atlantic liner, he soon realizes that too many disagreeable prose realities are blended with the beautiful and the sublime. Were you ever a voyageur in an Atlantic liner, dear reader tossed about by the uncivilized waves as if you were a worthless and indefinite article, fit for nothing but the sport and buffoonery of the angry waves? Were you ever there when the vessel first kissed the rising billows, and old father Neptune, with his spray-covered locks, shook his "dropsy sides," and threatened you with the vengeance of his trident for disturbing the repose of his oceanic domain; and a peculiarly oscillatory motion, so deeply interesting to passengers, yet deeply revolutionary in its tendency made you tremble on your feet, and quake in the region of your stomach? If not, may Providence keep you safe ashore, and save you the extreme disgust of such a scene.

Imagine for a moment our situation. Our passengers were the most perfect medley ever congregated together on ship board.—men, women, and children, representatives of a great portion of the civilized world—England, Ireland, Scotland, Italy, France, Spain, Germany, with several native and naturalized Americans; and as it regarded cleanliness of person and neatness of attire, I had the assurance of too or three of our officers that they excelled the least in these particulars of any they had the pleasure of importing into the U. S. Of course, I shall be understood here as alluding to the majority; for it is with pleasure that I can refer to exceptions—individuals that were clean, neat, and tidy; forming a striking contrast with the unshaven, unwashed, uncombed, and slovenly majority. It is worthy of remark here, that the representatives of one country and the devotees of one religion, stood forth pre-eminent in this particular feature? and in that also of intelligence and virtue so much so that I was very forcibly struck with the contrast manifested by them and other individuals, even of the same country, and from under the same laws; and could only solve it by the shrewd and nowise bogoted remark of a young Irishman:—"They are Catholics: we Protestants."

Ostensibly, the vessel was divided into two compartments for the passengers, one termed second cabin, the other the steerage, but no partition was drawn between the two. The berths run parallel with the sides of the vessel; similar to those which you find occasionally constructed for deck passengers on board some of our river steamboats, sufficiently wide to accommodate two individuals. They are uniformly numbered, and the passengers, receives a certificate with the number of his location. If you are a single and modest young man, (the latter qualification, dear reader, you may be assured, is one of my own,) you are accommodated with another individual, who takes up his lodgings with you for the passage, sans ceremonie. As to the neighbors in the berth below, over whom you have the pleasure of climbing to obtain possession of your own, they may be all very well, but don't let your arm hang too low, or you may accidentally encroach upon their liberties. Curtains were only appreciated by three or four families; and as the boards which serve as head and foot and side divisions of the berths are only some six inches wider, a passenger, to obtain a full length even of the tier on which he reclines, need only bring his head to a small elevation: he can look into his opposite neighbors berth without this trouble. The inhabitants of each berth form separate and distinct communities; and all the baggage, and provision barrels, and cooking utensils, are there lashed for security in a storm and heavy sea. P.

SKETCHES IN THE WESTERN WOODS.

NO. I.

Br. Bassett: Having just returned from a hasty visit from that part of our State (Indiana) known as the Miami Reserve, where in all probability my lot for many years is cast, should Providence spare me, I have thought a few sketches, concerning that fertile region, would not be without interest to you and your many readers.

The Miami Reserve is situated between the White River on one side, and the Wabash on the other. It extends north to the Mississineway River a tributary to the Wabash, and south till it touches the road leading from the Ohio River, via. Indianapolis, to Lake Michigan—(called the Michigan road)—35 miles north of Indianapolis. It extends to the Wabash river, (and of course to the Wabash & Erie canal,) between Logansport and Peru. It is 30 miles square, and, of course, contains 900 sections, or 576000 acres. Of this the Indians still hold 15 sections, on which there remain about 200 of these sons and daughters of the forest, who, as I was informed, are desirous of remaining and coming under our laws. Some of them have already made great advances in the arts of civilization, have fine farms, and live in good houses. But those Harpies, who live by plundering the Red man, seem determined to have their fertile lands, and drive them westward, though they are represented as a harmless, inoffensive people. Among these Miami Indians is an aged white woman by the name of Slocum, of whom, if I mistake not, an account was published in the Recorder some years since. She was taken prisoner, I think, at the age of five years, in the State of Pennsylvania; was married to an Indian, and has several grown children. Some of her daughters are said to be quite handsome. Her fate was unknown to her kindred till she was discovered a few years ago by Mr. Ewing of Logansport. Mr. Ewing wrote to her brothers, who came to see her and tried to persuade her to return with them, but she replied, that she was well treated among the Indians, whereas were she to return to the whites, she would be treated with contempt.

The Reserve was purchased from the Indians by "Uncle Sam" a short time since at about $1,25 per acre. It is not as yet surveyed. Notwithstanding this, however, about 3000 voters are now settled upon it, before whose sturdy blows the forest is rapidly receding.

Large tracts of most excellent land, however, still remain unoccupied. We traversed the Reserve diagonally, from S. W. to N. E. nearly the whole extent, and can truly say it excels any country we have ever beheld for unbroken fertility. In our course we crossed three large creeks, viz.: Wild Cat, Honey Creek and Pipe Creek, on each of which are good saw mills in operation, and grist mills are being erected. That part of the Reserve not embraced in old counties, has been divided into two new counties, viz.: Richardville, (named after the old Indian chief,) and Tipton, (after the old General,) Kokama, county seat of the former, was laid out about a year ago, on a section purchased from the Indians by Mr. Foster, a trader. It is on the banks of Wild Cat, and contains 30 or 40 houses, and the number is rapidly increasing. New London settled by the Friend Quakers, in the same county, is said to be going ahead of Kokamo. This might be expected from the enterprising and persevering character of the Quakers.

As to the health, I would remark, that as I was there about the time when sickness generally was at its worst, I had an opportunity of forming a tolerably correct judgment in this matter, and think it is not more sickly than common over all the western country. Along the streams, Fever and Ague prevailed to a considerable extent; but back from the creeks there were but few complaints.

A bill passed Congress at its last session, extending the privileges of pre-emption to this Reserve, and fixing the minimum price of two dollars per acre, which considering its situation, fertility and other advantages is cheap enough. The land, as stated before, is not surveyed, and those well acquainted with the matter, say it cannot be ready for sale in less than at least two or three years. So that there will be a fine chance to secure farms that are really worth now eight or ten dollars per acre, at two dollars, and a good time to raise the money.

My location will be on Pipe Creek, eight miles south of Peru, county seat of Miami county, one-fourth of a mile north of Finimore's mill, where we will be glad to see any genuine Protestant Methodists who may give us a call. More anon.

Yours in love, S. W. WIDNEY.

Progress of Our Cities.—I have lately stated the relative progress of Boston and Cincinnati. I now add New York to the list.

	1840	1845	Increase.
Cincinnati,	46,381	78,153	69 per cent
Boston)	83,855	114,166	37 "
New York,	312,710	391,223	25 "

The causes which produced this disproportionate ratio of increase in the cities, are of permanent character, and must, year by year, afford a still wider disparity in their progress.—Cist.

Mouth of the Montreal River, Lake Superior, Aug. 20, 1846.

My Dear Sir: In that famous contest which will be known in history as the Wolverine war, waged by the State of Ohio against Michigan, wherein many of our militia Generals and Colonels covered themselves all over with glory, and proved right valiant knights: in that war, Ohio acquired a title to a strip of swamps bordering the Maumee, including several extensive cities, on paper, with two or three Wild Cat Banks, which, judging from the facility with which they revive after having exploded, posses all the vitality of the animal from which they derive their name; whilst, to Michigan, to compensate for her humiliation, and defeat, was assigned all that territory washed by the upper lakes on the north, south and east, and bordered by the Menomonee and Montreal rivers on the west. At the time it was regarded by her as a poor equivalent for the surrender of the swamps aforesaid, teeming with musquitoes and pestiferous with fever and ague. A cold hyperborean region, distant from 700 to 1000 miles from the outposts of civilization, an almost boundless waste of waters separating it on the north from a region still more sterile and inhospitable, and on the south, lashing a coast for the most part rock-bound, and where, for miles in extent, even the voyageur cannot moor his little craft and shelter it from the storm—a vegetation stinted in its growth and hung with festoons of moss, where the note of the singing bird is mute, and the croak of the raven or the scream of the hawk is only heard—stupendous cliffs towering up into the sky, bleak, burnt and desolate, and bearing upon their flanks ample proofs of the alternate ascendency of fire and water, in the great elemental strife which has swept over the world—cataracts tumbling from their headlong heights into the lake—what commercial or agricultural advantages had a region, so remote, so sterile, and so inaccessible?

Forbidding as is its exterior aspect, it has all of the elements of a mighty State within itself. After penetrating inwardly, we meet with a beautiful country possessing a soil of great fertility, and diversified with mountain and valley, and watered by the purest streams.—The winters are protracted, but the extremes of heat and cold are less than in Philadelphia. Most of the products of New York, it is believed, will flourish here. After passing Chocolate river, copper, associated with silver, is found to range with the trap through the entire mountain slope of the peninsula—a distance, following the meanders of the coast, of more than 250 miles. Whether the veins will prove permanently productive, is a problem yet to be solved. It will require years of toil, and the expenditure of much capital, to penetrate the recesses of these mountains and bring forth their hidden treasures. One thing is evident, that the external indications are highly favorable, and if the same laws are found to prevail here with regard to mineral lodes, that prevail in other regions, the day is not distant when copper will consitute one of our principal exports. Men will not make their fortunes in a day. Even the richest mines will require a large outlay of capital before they become permanently productive. Companies have been formed, and will be formed, without any solid foundation, to swindle the unwary. Humbug will have its day, and a crash ensue before the business settle down into a regular methodical business.

In England they have wrought veins which yielded only 2½ per cent. of copper. They have raised it 2000 feet from below the surface, and where, as the workmen pursued their subterraneous labors, the rolling of the breakers was heard above. Engines of vast power are constantly employed to free the mines from water. The ore when raised yields only about eight per cent., and is combined with sulphur and iron. Months of roasting are required to fit it for the furnace, and then it has to undergo several smeltings before it is reduced to a marketable state. Yet, under all of these disadvantages, we find several of those companies declaring dividends of 25 per cent. per annum. Here, in most cases, the mines can be drained by adit levels, and the process of reducing the ore, or rather the separation of the native copper from the earthy matter is easy and expeditious. Such is the region and such the resources that fell to Michigan in consequence of the "famous war!"

The Montreal is a clear brawling stream, which before it enters the lake, precipitates itself about 80 feet, in one unbroken leap. The rocks are tilted up vertically, and consist of red sandstone, finely laminated. On the opposite side is the territory of Wisconsin. After passing this barrier the country assumes a different aspect; in the place of projecting headlands of sandstone, there is a series of clay bluffs, destitute of trees, and ultimately these disappear, and a low, sandy beach skirts the Lake.

Did you ever see a lynx? I have had glimpses of them, but never, before the other day, met one face to face. The weather was excessively hot, and we were reclining on the rocks, under a shade, at the Presque Ile River—a log projected over into the stream, not more than ten rods from us, and whilst there, a lynx came out from the forest on the opposite side, and undertook to cross the stream, but finding that his bridge would not reach, sat himself down and fell into a doze. We waited until his nap was over, and, as he got up, saluted him with a hurrah, when off he bounded into the woods. He was about the size of a large dog, (this I admit is somewhat indefinite) of a tawny color, with a short, stumpy tail, and tufts of hair on the top of his ears. They boldly attack the cariboo, a kind of rein-deer inhabiting this region—fix their claws and teeth in his flanks and back, and eventually, by worrying the poor animal, bring him to the ground. It is said that, when gouded by hunger, they will even attack a man; and an instance is related of a person here, last winter, having been tracked for five miles by one of these animals.

I have received a budget of papers recently from below, and in looking over these rambling sketches, perceive that I occasionally indite some knotty sentences, and make use of certain technical terms not found in the standard works on Mineralogy, but something approximating thereto. I write currente calamo, sometimes from the boat as we coast along, and sometimes in my tent or under a sheltering tree, whenever I can seize a leisure hour for such purposes. I have not time for transcribing and hardly for revision. I avail myself of your paper to communicate with my friends, who wished me to advise them of my wanderings, and whose solicitations I could not, in any other way, comply with. Technical terms, however plainly written, are liable to be set up wrong, by persons unacquainted with the "mystery." This apology I thought due to those of your readers with whom I have not a personal acquaintance.

With my best regards to them and yourself, I am, &c. F.

WOLF STORY.

NATURE OF LAW OF LICENSE, ILLUSTRATED BY A STORY OF AN INDIAN HUNTER.

Capt. John, a shrewd Indian, who got his living principally by trapping and hunting for wolves and other large game, was one day walking over his hunting ground, when he spied within rifle shot a shabby lank old wolf, walking slowly and watchfully along. The skillful hunter could easily have shot a ball to her heart, but for certain reasons seemed to think it would be wrong to take the life of the fruitful old destroyer. And the remarkable scruples of the savage will appear the more singular when you are informed that the government was paying at that very time fifty or sixty dollars bounty on every wolf's head.—The calculating hunter, however, proceeds with cautious steps in pursuit, and endeavored to keep an eye on the old wolf. He followed her through upland woods and deserted fields, until finally entering a ravine, he pursued her into a deep and lonely swamp, inhabited only by beasts of prey. A watchful snarl, and the crackling of brush in the direction of an ancient wind-fall, but a short distance from the hunter, arrested his attention, and he dimly saw through the dusky shades the leaping of a wolf, evidently proceeding from an old hollow log. Encouraged by this last discovery, he quickly left the thicket, reserving a farther search to a less dangerous hour.

The next day, on examination, the ingenious calculator found, as he had anticipated, in the same hollow log, a fine litter of half dozen whelps. Fifty dollars a piece, makes three hundred dollars, exclaimed the successful sportsman, when the sound of his own voice aroused the old watchful slut from her retreat: and in her fury to defend her young, Capt. John was in danger of his life, and was almost compelled to discharge his well loaded rifle in self-defence. And notwithstanding he could so easily have added fifty dollars to his prize, he determined on saving the life of the old "breeder," unless otherwise compelled from stern necessity. You may think, perhaps, that Capt. John was rather short sighted, but I can assure you that he acted with all the foresight of an interested politician. His prize would enable him to draw from the treasury enough for his support the present year, and he was anxious, if possible, to secure an equal draft on the funds of the next. And it was a matter of great concern with capt. John, lest some one would kill the old wolf. He invented a variety of ingenious tricks to divert and call the attention of hunters to another direction. At the same time there were grievous complaints among the industrious farmers for many miles round, that their sheep, pastures, and yards were suffering greatly from the frequent ravages of a wolf.

The Indian pretended some degree of sympathy for the people; at the same time he gave it as his own opinon, that if the Legislature would offer a more liberal bounty, the wolves would all be killed in a very short time, and thought the people had better petition for at least one hundred dollars bounty for every head. But the work of destruction went on during the whole year, greatly to the grief and injury of the surrounding country. At the "proper time," however, the Indian did not fail to pay a courteous visit to the old hollow log: his expectations were fully realized in discovering the second litter of at least half a dozen snarling pups.

It is difficult to decide in which Capt. John showed the greatest solicitude in securing the "savage brood," or in preserving the life of the old wolf. He was, however, successful in both, and bore off his increasing prize with feelings of great satisfaction, for which he received a good round sum in ready cash from the appropriate funds. The old wolf continued, as before, to rife and commit her depredations on life and property, to the very great annoyance of community. And it had never once entered into their minds that the skillful hunter would be expert in killing all descriptions of wolves, and especially those of the most destructive kinds, seeing the state was paying so large a bounty on every wolf's head. But instead of killing the old wolf, capt. John was also able on the third year to present another claim of equal demand to the supervisors, demanding his bounty. On reference to their books of records, of testimonies and affidavits, it was found that every year the young whelp, had been killed in the same place. This excited suspicion, and they began to question the captain a little.

"How is it that you have killed the wolves every year in the same place?"

"Ho; me fine um there," was the shrewd reply.

"But John, do you never see the old wolf?"

"Ho, yes, me see the wolf great many times."

"Well, but can't you shoot her?"

"Ho, yes."

"Well, why don't you shoot the wolf then?"

"I guess, says capt. John, "if I should kill the old wolf, you'd have no more scalps to pay me for."

Now if there is any adaptation in things, the above circumstance has its fair application. The old wolf, or in other words, our license law, is kept in a vigorous state, and produces an astonishing increase. She is kept alive with greatest care and solicitudes, and for every whelp a price is demanded and received of about ten dollars, and then these fiendish offspring of a cruel monster, come to a rapid growth, commit their ravages on society, destroy the property, happiness, reputation, and the lives of men, women and innocent children. No less than "two thousand eight hundred and sixty two" are found in the city of New York, and in about the same proportion in every part of the union. The old savage monster is under the protection of law and government, and her thousands and tens of thousands of bloodthirsty offspring claim the same legal protection. And in the name of common reason I would ask; is not this a most singular piece of national policy? To adopt and perpetuate a system which has in it scarcely a redeeming feature, and that too supported principally at the public expense, and in opposition to the wishes of the most valuable part of the community, who are compelled by the same authority to pay a heavy tax to support its unnatural existence. And can we suppose that an enlighened and patriotic people of the land of freedom, will long endure the existence of this mad destroyer? And can the time be far distant when the intrepid sons of liberty shall arise in their glory of republican principles, and declare with authority, that America shall no longer welter in the shame of her drunken son's blood.—Southern C. Adv.

TEMPERANCE ABROAD.

The Rev. Dr. Baird, in a letter to the quarterly paper of the Foreign Evangelical Society, speaks well of the Temperance Convention he attended at Stockholm in June last, which was attended by the king, queen, and crown prince. He states that in Sweden, there are three hundred and thirty-two temperance societies, and upwards of ninety thousand members.—In Norway, he states that the Temperance cause has only just taken effectual hold. At the beginning of this year, there were a hundred and twenty-eight temperance societies, and fourteen thousand, eight hundred and twelve members.

In Prussia there are 699 temperance associations and 743,713 members.

In Austria there are more than 60 societies, and 150,000 members.

In the kingdom of Hanover there are 456 societies, and 69,116 members.

In the Duchy of Oldenburg there are 75 societies and 23.108 members.

In the rest of Germany there are 126 societies and 25.824 members.

So than there are now in Germany, including Austria, 1426 temperance societies, and no less than 1,019,193 members.—Alliance and Visiter.

THE MINISTER'S FAREWELL SERMON.

My Dear Friend:—As I occasionally amuse you by detailing the gossip and passing events which disturb the tranquility of our thriving village, I have thought it would not be uninteresting to tell you what is now going on, especially as it relates principally to one of our clergymen, a man of exemplary character, who came among us four years ago, and by the force of presevering exertion, and a faithful delineation of Christian truth, succeeded in collecting a small congregation; and as they had laid the foundation of a house of worship, which is now in a state of considerable forwardness, it was with great surprise that I learned that there had been a blow up between the pastor and some few of the leading persons of the congregation. This is no common thing now-a-days, nay, is what must be calculated upon, as almost certain to happen, and of course the clergyman, whether in the right or wrong, no matter which, was about to go away.

Understanding that on Sunday, he would preach his farewell; and knowing him to be an acceptable preacher, and, withal, had a considerable spice of eccentricity mixed up with fair talents, I determined to attend and hear the closing remarks of one so generally esteemed among us; for I could not learn that although deprived of his means of living, and about to leave us, that he had done aught that was worthy of bonds or of death. This moral assassination of ministers is, however, an every day occurrence now, which, it would seem, no prudence of circumspection on their part can elude, and which has become a necessary appendage of the profession, however discreditable it may be to the piety and Christian character of the people to whom they minister. Accordingly I took my wife to the school house where he officiated, in common with many others, and found a large congregation assembled, no doubt many of them expectants like myself; and if I should judge from the individual attention, and interested bearing of the hearers, we were not any of us disappointed in our excited anticipations. I must say the discourse fully justified our expectations. It was serious, becoming, eloquent, and dignified, befitting the occasion, and creditable alike to the head and heart of the preacher. It was based upon the parting command of our Lord to his disciples: "Go ye into all the world and preach the gospel to every creature;" and one object of the preacher seemed to be to show that the duty of ministers was to preach the gospel far and wide, extend the blessings of salvation every where, which duty could not be performed where their teaching was always limited to one congregation. We listened attentively—we heard with pleasure; but we were surprised when the preacher closed, that he had omitted to say one word of parting advice, or in the slightest manner whatever, to refer to the circumstances of his leaving them. He closed, read a hymn, then as is the usual custom, offered up a closing collect—and we were expecting the accustomed benediction which closes the service, when, rising from the kneeling posture of prayer, he extended his hand, and in a voice clear and distinct, but evidently not without emotion, he said, "One word ere we close. When Jesus Christ was on earth, he was a man of sorrows and acquainted with grief. He went about doing good to the bodies and the souls of men. His whole life was one continued labor of love, and in the performance of these offices of benevolence, he had wrought manifest, wonderful, and stupendous miracles which amply evinced that he was a teacher come from God. On one occasion in particular, he had crossed the lake of Gennesereth into the country of Gadarenes, and as he approached the city, there met him two possessed with devils, coming out of the tombs exceedingly fiery, so that no man might pass by that way. And behold, they cried out saying, What have we to do with thee, Jesus thou Son of God? Art thou come hither to torment us before the time? And there was a good way off from them, an herd of many swine feeding. So the devils besought him saying, If thou cast us out, suffer us to go away into the herd of swine. And he said unto them, Go. And when they were come out, they went into the herd of swine, and behold the whole herd of swine ran violently down a steep place into the sea, and perished in the waters, and they that kept them, fled, and went their way into the city, and told every thing; and what was befallen the possessed of devils; and behold the whole city came out to meet Jesus. [Here the preacher paused, and then extending his arms, slowly and deliberately, with a pointed accent which could not be misunderstood, said] "and when they saw him, they besought him that he would depart out of their coasts."

The effect can better be imagined than described—expectation was on tiptoe, every eye was on the preacher, every ear was listening with the most riveted attention, to what was next to come; but when he paused, and then slowly and deliberately uttered the closing sentence—"and when they saw Jesus, they besought him that he would depart out of their coasts," the effect was absolutely electric: had a thunderbolt fallen in our midst from heaven, greater surprise, astonishment, perhaps indignation, would scarcely have been produced.

Farewell, faithful preacher, thou hast had the courage to speak the truth in the ears to which truth is offensive, and thou too hast experienced the truth of thy Master's word: "If they have called the master of the house Beelzebub, how much more shall they call them of his household."

Premature Old Age in Females.

The Rev. Hubbard Winslow, in the "Journal of Health," makes the following truthful remarks in relation to the exercise of the mental powers in this country—remarks, which, if attentively read, will we hope, stir up our young females to a greater degree of intellectual activity, and to those admirable exercises which are the results of liberal culture and consequently of a more health imparting and life-sustaining influence.

Nor does the premature old age; of which we are speaking, come of too much study. We do not begin to study in this country, as they do in Germany, nor as many do in England and France. It is a common thing among the educated ladies of Germany, to find those who can read and speak three or four different languages, and are extensively versed in mathematics and natural philosophy.

It is clearly proved that the high cultivation of the intellect is favorable to protracted youthfulness and long life. Highly educated men and women, on an average, live longer and enjoy more even and pure health, than those of little or no mental culture. The mind is life,—the very essence of life, and where there is most of mind, other things equal, there is most of that which imparts life and vigor to the body. It is believed that thousands in this country annually die some twenty years sooner than they would, had they bestowed a higher cultivation upon their intellect. We must be more intellectual and less sensual—more of that which dies not, and less of that which does—if we would invigorate and prolong whatever of us is mortal. It is said to be better to wear out than to rust out. The truth is, after all, very few in this country can claim the honor of wearing out, intellectually. But hundreds are daily dying through mental rust. Why does the man of business languish and die so soon, on retiring to enjoy in idleness his gains?—Just because the life giving power, the mind, ceases to act. Rust, stagnation, disease, gloomy spirits and death, must inevitably come.

The perpetual tug and excitement of business, as it is done in this country, frequently overtaxes and breaks down the mind; not so much by the intellectual labor, as by the excitement attending it.—Now the study of the languages, sciences, &c., and the putting forth of the mental energies in the form of written thoughts for the world, afford just that kind of mental effort which is most favorable to long and vigorous life. Accordingly literary and scientific men are, as a class, long lived. If our females would give up their dissipations, renounce their novels and their indolence, put away both their inglorious rust and their vainglorious excitements together—and rise higher in the scale of intellectual, thinking, spiritual being, they might secure to themselves and to their children a far more healthly, youthful, prolonged earthly existence, than most of them now enjoy.

What a Wife should be.—When a man of sense comes to marry it is a companion whom he wants, not an artist. It is not merely one who can paint and play, sing and dance; it is a being who can comfort and counsel him—one who can reason and reflect, and feel and judge, and discourse and discriminate—one who can assist him in his affairs, lighten his sorrows, purify his joys, strengthen his principles, and educate his children.

A woman of the former descriptions may occasionally figure in the drawing-room, and attract the admiration of the company, but she is entirely unfit for a helpmate to man, and to "train up a child in the way it should go."

Is there a more lovely sight on earth than the devotion of a daughter to an aged, and perhaps peevish parent, sinking into second childhood; or of a mother to that sickly, deformed and perhaps imbecile child, who is an offence and a burden to every one beside?

Youth's Department.

EARLY PIETY.

I saw a lovely boy
Kneel down beside a chair,
Then place his head upon his hands,
And sweetly lisp a prayer.
A lovlier sight was ne'er beheld;
No mockery was his part;
The infant form thus bent in prayer,
Might shame an older heart.

And there he knelt, nor moved he then,
Nor turned his little head,
Till all his prayer was finished,
The last—last word was said.
I gazed, entranced, upon the child,
So artless, young and pure,
And fondly wish'd his little form,
Might long with us endure.

But yet methought that infant mind,
Mild as the breath of even,
Enriched with many mental gems,
Seemed ripening fast for heaven.
Oh, may that power who governs all,
Forever watch and guide him,
And spare him here for many a year,
And evil ne'er betide him.

THE BRAVE BOY.

Two boys of my acquaintance were one day on their way from school, and as they were passing a cornfield in which there were some plum trees full of ripe fruit, Henry said to Thomas,

"Let us jump over and get some plums. Nobody will see us, and we can scud along through the corn and come out on the other side."

Thomas said, "I'm afraid. I do not like to try it. I would rather not have the plums than to steal them, and I guess I will run along home."

"You are a coward," said Henry, "I always knew you was a coward, and if you don't want any plums you may go without them, but I shall have some very quick."

Just as Henry was climbing the fence, the owner of the field rose up from the other side of the wall, and Henry jumped back and run off as fast as his legs would carry him.

Thomas had no reason to be afraid.—So he stood still, and the owner of the field, who had heard the conversation between the boys, told him he was very glad to see that he was not willing to be a thief; and then he asked Thomas to step over and help himself to as many plums as he wished. The boy was pleased with the invitation, and was not slow in filling his pockets with the ripe fruit.

Which of these boys was brave, the one who called the other a coward, but ran away himself, or the one who said he was afraid to steal, and stood his ground?—[Selected.

NESTORIANS IN PERSIA.

LETTER FROM MR PERKINS, MARCH 25, 1846.

Revival of Religion.

The revival of which we wrote you last month, still progresses with increasing interest and power. We are filled with wonder, as well as with joy unspeakable, in view of this work of mercy and grace. In whatever aspect we contemplate it, it deeply impresses us as "the Lord's doing," and as great and glorious, as well as "marvellous in our eyes."

We expressed the hope, in our communications of last month, that this revival would spread among the villages; and such is becoming extensively the fact. There are now inquirers, and some who are hoping in Christ, in several villages; and in Geog Tapa a great work is in progress, by which that large and important village is pervaded. In our seminaries, the interest continues undiminished, and they naturally form radiant points from which a strong and blessed influence goes forth through the length and breadth of our field, not only by the scores of the pupils who, we trust, have become new creatures in Christ Jesus visiting their homes, but also by attracting large numbers of their friends and people to our premises, for the express purpose of hearing the gospel preached and learning the way of salvation.

No opposition worthy of mention is yet manifested to this work of grace. Most of the leading Nestorian ecclesiastics—some of the family of the Patriarch, among the rest—habitually attend on our preaching, neither contradicting nor objecting, but acknowledging, in words at least, that this is unquestionably "the work of the Lord." We have much occasion to recognize the hand of God in thus preventing serious opposition to a work of such signal power, in our remote position and defenceless circumstances. The Lord orders all things well!

There are almost innumerable incidents of great interest connected with the progress of this work, illustrative of its character, but few of which will probably ever reach you. We may safely say in general, however, that nearly all of the large number who have hitherto, during this revival, indulged the hope of having experienced a saving change, give such evidence of the power of grace in their hearts, as to lead us to hope and believe that they will, the Lord assisting them, hold on their way as devoted, active, and efficient Christians. The elements of Nestorian character are very marked; and they are exceedingly interesting when renewed and sanctified. They are eminently fitted to form faithful and heroic witnesses for Christ, not unworthy of their illustrious ancestry of missionary and martyr memory. And we have more and more reason to hope that the prayers of American Christians will be answered, and their anticipations verified; and that this remnant of a once great and venerable church will be speedily raised up from the shadow of death in which it has so long lain, and, at no distant day, bear a conspicuous and important part in the spiritual regeneration of this benighted continent.

CONSTANTINOPLE.

LETTER FROM MR. DWIGHT, MAY, 13.

Persecution arrested.

The intelligence contained in the following letter will carry joy to many hearts. The progress which the Turkish government has made in the matter of religious toleration, within the last two or three years, is one of the most remarkable occurrences of the age. It was not till 1843, that the Christian powers of Europe took up the question in earnest. But already, in 1846, the Sublime Porte has acknowledged the true doctrine; and our persecuted brethren are now restored to their rights, in spite of the power and machinations of the Patriarch. Who would have ventured to predict, a few years ago, that the sword of the false prophet would be so speedily and so effectually broken? Let us thank God and take courage.

The Armenian brethren in Constantinople have all been restored to their shops, by order of Reshid Pasha, Minister of Foreign Affairs. This result has been brought about chiefly through the influence of Sir Stratford Canning, the British Ambassador; whose noble efforts for religious liberty in Turkey are worthy of all praise. It matters not with him by what name the victim of persecution is called, or to what nation or denomination he belongs, whether he be Jew or Greek, Mohammedan or Armenian or Roman. This noble philanthrophist is always ready to fly to his relief; and his influence in Turkey, I scarcely need inform you, is very great. The Lord has used him as an instrument in bringing about as great changes in this land as we have ever seen in any part of the world; and the recognition of the principle by this government that Protestant rayahs (subjects) can live in this country and pursue their lawful callings, and, at the same time, worship God according to the dictates of their consciences, is not among the least of these changes.

You are to understand that no Protestant sect has been formed and recognized by the government; nor would Sir Stratford lend his hand for a moment to promote such an enterprise; nor could we desire it. His sole aim is to prevent, if possible, all religious persecution; and this he endeavors to do without identifying himself with any sect, or interfering, in the least, with the politico-religious communities existing here. I do think that he is a chosen instrument of God for this work; and the zeal, prudence, perseverance and decision with which he pursues his object are truly wonderful. The Prussian Minister, Mr. Le Cox, has also been ever ready to lend a helping hand; and so has Mr. Brown, our own Charge'd Affaires.

I think we may now consider it a settled point, that direct and open religious persecution will not be tolerated in Turkey; though evangelical Christians will be vexed in many ways, by their numerous, powerful, and bitter enemies; and for a long time to come they will, probably, be called to suffer severe trials. I would say that such trials, in the existing state of things, are likely to be among the best and most efficient means of strengthening the church and preserving its purity; though we are not to pray for persecution, nor to hope for it, any more than we pray for personal bereavements, and other afflictions; but the reverse.

Scene in a Prison.

Last Sunday afternoon and evening no less than twelve of our brethren were seized by the Turkish police officers and thrown into prison. This excited great alarm. What the charge against them was, could not be ascertained until the next morning; when it was found that it was a mere pretence of some informality in the manner of hiring a house, in which several of them lived in Galata; and the thing was got up, undoubtedly, by some enemy merely to vex them.

They remained one night in prison, and then were liberated. The enemy designed it for evil, but God overruled it for good. The twelve brethren were confined in one room, and they spent most of the time in singing and prayer, "and the prisoners heard them." Four times, in the course of the night, did the Turkish officer in command send for one of them to come up to his room, to answer questions, in regard to this so called "new way," and he heard more about the gospel that night than he had during all his life before; though we do not know that, like the Jailor at Philippi he truly repented of his sins. Their fellow prisoners were of several different nations, and among them were some noisy and blaspheming Greeks, who ridiculed these evangelical men and told the Turkish prisoners that they were infidels. The Turks replied to the Greeks, "These men are good men, and you are the infidels; for these men have prayed to God several times in the course of the night, but we have not seen you pray once." The Greeks said, "We pray in our hearts." "No," replied the Turks, "we cannot believe that you pray in your hearts, so long as you utter so many blasphemies with your mouths. Look at these men whom you call infidels. They not only do not utter blasphemies, but all their words are good words. You are infidels and they are good men."

Surely it is worth while for our brethren to be put in prison, when such opportunities are given for preaching the gospel! How often do Satan's emissaries overshoot the mark. They persecute and imprison and banish men, in order to prevent their making known the gospel; while this is the very means of sounding it abroad more and more, and in places where it would not otherwise be heard. There has been such a proclamation of the gospel of Christ made throughout all classes of the inhabitants of the Turkish capital, during the last three months, by means of the perpsecution, as could not have been made in twenty years, in the ordinary way. Praised be the Lord of Hosts from whom "this also cometh forth," who "is wonderful in counsel and excellent in working."

SCIENTIFIC.

The Great Centre of the Universe Probably Discovered.

CINCINNATI OBSERVATORY, 8th Sept. 1846.

MESSRS EDITORS:—I have just received by the last steamer, No. 566 and 567 of the "Astronomische Warchrichten," a journal published at Altona, near Hamburg, and conducted by the celebrated Prof. Schumacher. These two numbers are almost exclusively taken up with an article by Doctor Meadler, Directer of the Dorpat Observatory, Russia, well known to the astronomical world, in which he announces the extraordinary discovery of the great central Star or Sun, about which the universe of Stars is revolving, our own sun and system among the rest.

This discovery, the result of many years of incessant toil and research, has been deduced by a train of reasoning and an examination of facts, scarcely to be surpassed in the annals of science.

Guided by the researches of the elder Herschel as to the figure of the stratum of stars to which our sun belongs, Dr. Maedler, as a first approximation, locates his grand centre somewhere near the Milky Way.

But as the milky way divides the sphere of the heavens into two equal parts, he urges that the centre must be searched for in the smaller of the two parts.

Again, it has been shown that the sun is nearer the southern than the northern side of the milky way, and hence we must expect to find the great centre not only in the smaller portion of the heavens, but also in the northern part of this smaller portion.

Another approximation to its position obtained by the learned auther of this remarkable paper, from an examination of the sun's motion through space, and he reasons that the point in the heavens towards which the entire solar system is urging its way, is the pole of a great circle, within the centre about which the sun is revolving must be placed.

This subject has been ably discussed by Argelander and by Otho Struve, and the point in question has been ascertained to a very close approximation. If from this point determined by Agrelander, (which is in the constellation Hercules) as a pole, we describe a great circle, it intersects the milky way in the constellation Perseus. By using that point determined by Otho Struve, we find this circle cutting the milky way nearer to the constellation Taurus.

Having made this rough approximation to the grand centre, Mr. M. prosecuted the research by means of the proper motion of the fixed stars, and after many trials of different stars, at length finds a point which satisfies all the conditions yet presented by observation.

This discovery he announces in the following language:

"I therefore pronounce the Pleiedes to be the central group of that mass of fixed stars limited by the straum composing the milky way, and Alcyone as the individual star of this group, which, among all others, combines the greatest probability of being the the Central Sun."

By a train of reasoning which I shall not attempt to explain, he finds the probable parallax of this great central star to be, six thousandths of one second of arc, and its distance to be 34 millions of times the distance of the sun, or so remote that light with a velocity of 12 millions of miles per minute, requires a period of 537 years to pass from the great centre to our sun.

As a first rough approximation he deduces the period of revolution of our sun with all its train of planets, satellites and comets, about the grand centre to be eighteen million two hundred thousand years.

The ascending node of the orbit is (1840) in 236° 53′ of longitude, and the sun will reach this point A. D. 154,500 or in about one hundred and fifty-two thousand six hundred and sixty years.

All these numbers are given as first rough approximations. The auther of this wonderful theory throws it before the world, and declares that he will yield it on condition that one single star can be found, by any astronomer, within 20° or 25° of his great centre, in which a well determined motion towards the north exists. His theory indicates that the proper motion of all the stars thus situated must be towards the south. Such is a brief outline of the wonderful facts announced by Dr. Meadler. The entire paper will be translated and published in the Sidrial Messenger

PHYSIOLOGICAL PHENOMENON.

BY DR. G. O. STEARNS, OF BOSTON.

Perhaps the following description of a Physiological Phenomenon may interest your readers. Some years ago I heard Professor Bronson remark that he knew an individual who had the power of producing a musical sound of a much lower pitch than is usually accessible to the human voice. He remarked that "he supposed the man produced it by some other organ than the glottis—perhaps the upper part of the wind pipe." This fact recurring to my mind some time ago, I made a few experiments, and soon found to my great surprise, that I had a register of voice below the ordinary bass voice; not one note but a full octave, going as low as the lowest F., in the piano forte. Not knowing but that it might be a mere accident, and not a thing common to all, I informed a friend of it, and after a little instruction he was able to produce similar tones, and I conclude that any one may do the same.

This voice is a sort of falsetto below, and is produced by slackening the vocal chord in such a manner as to allow it to vibrate freely and easily, and the use of it does not at all fatigue the muscles of the throat, as it does to try to force the ordinary voice below its natural compass, and in this respect it is precisely similar to the falsetto above.

Perhaps your readers may remember a band of vocalists called the Hungarian Singers, who came to this country some years ago, and produced quite a sensation in our musical circles by their unique performances in imitation of musical instruments. One of them imitated the trombone in a most remarkable manner, being able to produce, sustain, and swell, a strong and ready trombone tone on double B flat. It may have been by the cultivation of this falsetto bass that this tone was produced.

As no writer with whom I am acpuainted has mentioned the existence of this register of voice, I have been led to communicate this account of it as something new.

FOREIGN NEWS.

From the New York Sun.

EIGHT DAYS LATER FROM EUROPE.

Great rise in Grain. Advance in Cotton. Ravages of Cholera in the East. Death of Lord Metcalf. Fire in Liverpool.

By the arrival of the steamer Great Western, Capt. Matthews, in eighteen days from Liverpool, we have English papers to the 12th inst. This favorite steamer has a large number of passengers, and a heavy freight.

The Cotton market continues steady, and although we cannot fix a higher quotation, yet on some descriptions there has been an upward inclination. Considerable anxiety prevails respecting the new crop.

The Grain markets with us, as with our continental neighbors, are on the rise.

The failure of the potatoe crop influences the price of provisions of all kinds. Bacon & Ham are rising rapidly. Indian Corn is also increasing in value, as in fact is almost every kind of grain.

Poor Lord Metcalf has paid the debt of nature. The decease of this eminent man, long expected, has excited less surprise than regret.

Among the late unexpected events connected with the corn trade is the purchase of two cargoes of English grown wheat for exportation to France.

The Sikh war is about to be renewed in India. The British Army is assembling for this purpose.

Corn riots have occurred in France and at Lusane, in Switzerland.

It is calculated that not fewer than 40,000 Irish reapers have entered Scotland via Ardrossan and the Clyde.

LIVERPOOL, Sept. 10.

AWFUL AND DESTRUCTIVE FIRE AT LIVERPOOL.—At about a quarter to seven flames were observed to issue from the premises occupied by Messrs. M'Fie and sons, of Bachelorstreet, as a sugar refining establishment. It will require £60,000 to cover the entire loss, to say nothing of the destruction to the furniture of the poor people and the loss to the workmen (100 in number.)

IRELAND.—O'Connell has gone to Darrynane, and there will be a lull at Conciliation Hall. He dilates on the failure of the potatoe crop, and promises the people plenty of food and work if they keep quiet— if they did not violate the law. He estimates the expense of feeding the people until the next harvest at Fifty Millions of Dollars, which sum, he intimates the Government is ready to advance, if the necessity arise.

The commissioners have reported that the bay of Galway presents great natural advantages for a more rapid communication with North America.

ALGIERS.—By the last mail from Algiers we have the journals of that place to the 5th instant inclusively. The accounts, generally speaking, are very favorable; for tranquility is said to reign in almost ewery part of the French territory. The Akhbar mentions a report that a French envoy had arrived from Tangiers, for the purpose of treating with Abd-el-Kader for an exchange of prisoners.

GERMANY.—It appears from recent advices dated Berlin Sept. 1, that the financial crisis there is becoming more complicated every day.

SPAIN.—The Tiempo mentions a rumor that immediately after assembling the Cortes, and laying before that body an official communication of the intended marriage, the Government will dissolve it, and prevent the possibility of discussion.

All the journals, except those supposed to be in the pay of the Government, continue to inveigh against the allance with France.

PORTUGAL.—Our latest advices from this part of the Continent inform us that the north of Portugal is still in a disturbed state, but the capital and Oporto were tranquil.

ITALY.—A letter from Rome of the 30th ult., in the Augsburg Gazette, says:—

"His Royal Highness the Prince de Joinville is expected to arrive here this day. He is charged with a special mission from the King, his father, to the Pope. He will stay only one clear day at Rome, and then return to Naples."

Cardinal Gizzi has ordered the governors of the provinces to adopt measures calculated to improve the religious and temporal condition of the poorer classes. The document states that the Pope beholds with the utmost pain the quarrels, thefts, and other misdemeanors constantly recurring throughout the Pontifical states.

TURKEY.—We learn from the Constantinople journals of the 26th ult., that accounts had been received there from Trebisond of the suppression of the revolt in the Adjara, and the capture of its chiefs, KEUR HUSSEIN BEY. From Teberan, afflicting news of the ravages of the cholera had just reached Constantinople. One of the sons of the SHAH had died, and so great was the panic at Teheran, that the MONARCH and all his Ministers had quitted it, and the members of the corps diplomatique were, it was said, about to follow the example.

OVERLAND MAIL.—The last accounts from India are painfully distressing. The cholera—that scourge of the human race—is sweeping all before it in Scinde. Hardy veterans, long inured to toil and fatigue, and to all the "pride and circumstances of glorious war," are being mowed down by thousands.

The warlike Affghans are being stirred into commotion against the British power by the Shah of Persia, and they have put the projected movement upon this issue—if he will furnish the troops.

ANOTHER ARRIVAL—Since the above was in type we have received by Bicknell's Reporter, and the Dollar Newspaper, intelligence of the arrival of the Hibernia at Boston on Saturday last. She made the passage in 13 days and 18 hours. Prices of American Cotton have advanced in Liverpool. Melancholly accounts are given of the failure of the potato crops in Ireland, in the British Island, and in parts of the continent of Europe. It is said that the future use of the potato, as an article of food, is nearly abandoned, Indian corn is now considerably imported, and corn bread coming into use. "Pone, sweet pone."

WESTERN RECORDER.

PUTNAM, OHIO.

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 10, 1846.

DATE OF OUR PAPER.—In view of issuing as heretofore on Thursday, we have dated accordingly, on the outside of the present number. It has however been impracticable for us to issue our paper this week, before Saturday. And we have for additional reasons which need not be named, concluded that Saturday shall hereafter be our regular day of publication.

DETAINURE—APOLOGY.—Our friends will excuse us that the present number has been delayed much longer than we anticipated. This has been unavoidably occasioned, in part, by our new arrangements, the removal of our office, and procuring the new type from Cincinnati. We attended to the purchase in person, at the Queen City, and for the very purpose of avoiding detainure or injury to our type, accompanied it by water to Marietta. Unfortunately for us, all the Muskingum boats were outward bound, and we were obliged to come home by stage, leaving our type at Marietta, to await the first opportunity for shipment by steamboat to Zanesville. We had rising of 700 pounds of type, and it would have been imprudent, if practicable, to attempt conveying it by land. For many days we were held in suspense and anxiety, hourly hoping for the arrival of a boat. Yet it was not till Monday last, 5th inst. that the Steamer Newark relieved our anxieties, by bringing us safe and sound, our new type from Cincinnati, and also a good supply of paper from Steubenville. The tedious process of preparing and distributing such an immense number of parcels of type, occupied our entire force of hands for a day and a half. We however then procured extra aid, in view of getting out our first number this week. And though late, we are glad that we have been enabled to accomplish it. Now, that we have resumed our post, we trust we shall hereafter be prompt and regular in our weekly issues.

A POINT OF CONSCIENCE.—We here state that a matter of concience had somewhat to do with the delay of our paper. We were in Cincinnati on the 17th and 18th days of September, ult. Those two days were occupied at the Cin. Type Foundery in putting up our type. We were in readiness to leave for home on Saturday, and could have taken passage on board a better boat, and on more favorable terms, than we afterwards obtained. But we refrained from starting, on account of the near approach of the Lord's Day, knowing that we should then nescessarily be journeying on that day. We accordingly spent the Sabbath in the city, and took one of the first boats starting for Pittsburgh on Monday, 21st. We had a slow and unpleasant passage, and did not reach Marietta, till Thursday night. We were then obliged to tarry on expenses till Saturday, and then to leave our freight, and come home by stage, not reaching here till late at night. Had we left Cincinnati, on Saturday instead of Monday, as we might have done, we would have reached Marietta in time for a boat to Zanesville, with but little detainure, would have got home several days sooner, type and all, with much less expense, and might have got out our paper, at least ten days sooner. Many an individual would without scruple have pursued this latter course. But though we have suffered much inconvenience and mortification by the delay, the question with us is, whether had we done so, we would have felt any better, or been prospered any more, by neglecting to have respect to the day of the Lord. We make this statement, (though some will deem it of little importance) as further apology for the late appearance of this number, knowing that our consientious friends will not be dissatisfied with us for having yielded rather to the claims of concience, than to the demands of business in this case.

CONFERENCE TIME.—We have travelled more than one thousand miles by land and water, within a few weeks past, in attending the sessions of our three principal western Conferences, and including our trip to Cincinnati. We have been rocked in Steamboats, tossed in stages, shaken well in rail cars, and conveyed more gently in private carriages. Many perils have we met with, yet through a benevolent Providence have we been preserved alive. Our trip by stage from Zanesville to Springfield, nearly 100 miles, occupied but 16 hours. We reached there early on Saturday morning 12th ult. having missed the first three days of the session of the Ohio Conference. We allude to this as a rare circumstance with us, having never before missed a single day of any session of that body within the 16 years of our connection with it. Br. J. M. Young had been re-elected President, but was confined to his bed by sickness during nearly all the session. Some of the circumstances foreseen by "A dreamer" a few weeks ago, were verified. Yet the number who took their certificates on the occasion, fell a little short of his anticipations. The Conference did all that could reasonably be demanded of it, in reference to slavery, and the rights of colored members. But because the Conference could not be prevailed upon to pass a disorganizing enactment, some three or four of the preachers thought it their duty to withdraw themselves. We are gratified however to state, that in taking their leave of us, no excitement occurred, and mutual good feeling was expressed and reciprocated. The Conference concluded its session with an interesting season of religious devotion, in which the seceding brethren took part.

TRUE WESLEYAN.—We see by the last two numbers of this paper, that I. F. Roberts, who writes "from the banks of the Ohio.' i. e. only nine miles out, is giving us some labored attention. Very well. When he gets through, we will attend to his case a little, if we deem it requisite.

SECESSION FROM THE M. E. CHURCH, AT LEBANON, O.—About one hundred members have recently withdrawn from the M. E. Church at Lebanon, and have been organized as a society of the Methodist Protestant Church. We hope soon to be favored with particulars.

EIGHTH VOLUME.—We present our readers, according to promise, an enlarged sheet, in a dress entirely new. Our old type which has told so many good and bad things, is laid aside, and will go for old metal. We have spared neither pains nor expense in the improvement of our paper. We have just settled a bill of $307,00 for new materials, at the Cincinnati Type Foundery, besides which we expended recently $65,00 in Pittsburgh, in the purchase of other materials for the purposes of our office. We make this statement thus particularly, that our subscribers who are in arrears, and those who have not paid in advance and that our agents too, may be apprised that we stand in need of their help. Every little sum of two dollars, but especially $5, or $10, will essentially cheer and aid us. Our expenses will be every way increased by the enlargement. Our paper costs us more, and the services of an additional hand in our office, will probably be required. But, we did not sit down to write a dun, but to congratulate our readers that they now have in hand a sheet so much improved. It is not our pleasure to commence our eighth volume, with a lecture upon money matters. But having made this statement in reference to our expences, and only adding that we have incurred a debt much larger than we anticipated, we trust that those concerned will take the hint, and that we shall not soon have to recur to this subject.

SCANDALOUS CONDUCT OF A STEAMBOAT CAPTAIN.—We transfer to our columns from the Marietta Intelligencer the subjoined statement in reference to a recent transaction on board the Steamboat Western. It is from the pen of a professional gentleman residing in Lancaster. We were a fellow passenger with him at the time, on board the Western, but did not witness the altercation between the Captain and the colored man, till both parties had gone ashore. What first arrested our attention was the circumstance that our boat was laid up, and we stepped out from the cabin to see for what cause. The captain, followed by three others, was then in hot pursuit of the negro, with deadly weapons, and with evident intent to kill. We learned from various witnesses, that for a slight impertinence on the part of the colored fireman, the captain was so offended as to strike him several violent blows with a stick of wood—struck him also on the head with a large piece of stone coal, and also aimed a blow at him with a sledge hammer, and finally forced him to land in water at considerable depth. By this time the poor fellow was provoked to curse the captain and throw a stone at him from the shore. We are sorry that he did this, for he might otherwise more readily have obtained redress at law. He was then pursued, as the writer states. From the account given us of the blows inflicted, we should not be surprised if they should cost the injured man his life.

Captain Timms treated us with some politeness during our passage, as he was bound to do for his interest's sake. We do not pronounce him a murderer, but we state that after the transaction, we heard him repeatedly express his regret that he had not succeeded in killing the fellow. Now this is not the way to deal with a dog, or an ass, much less a fellow man, under any circumstances, even if he has a dark skin. We do'nt patronize Capt. Timms' boat after this. That's all.

From the Marietta Intelligencer.

Outrage on the Steamboat Western.

The subjoined statement comes to us attested by gentleman from three counties in this State, who were on board the Steamboat on the 23d of Sept., and witnessed the proceedings:

"The Steamer Western, Captain Timms, while on its way from Cincinnati to Pittsburgh, on the 23d of Sept., when about 20 miles below Gallipolis had an altercation with one of the fireman, a colored freeman, because he was unwilling to fire more than his watch. The Captain struck him twice over the head with a club, and once with a lump of coal, and struck at him with a sledge hammer; but it being heavy the negro escaped the blow. The boat was then ordered ashore, on the Virginia side, and the negro forced off without paying him anything for his services. When ashore he threw a stone at the captain, which fell short of the boat, and at the same time threatened to sue the captain when he returned to Cincinnati. At that moment the Captain called for a loaded gun or pistol, and after some considerable search the Clerk presented him with his revolvers; upon which the Captain ordered the boat again ashore declaring at the same time he would kill the d——d nigger. When the boat neared the shore, he buckled on a large knife and belt, and with pistols in hand he with three of his men jumped on shore and pursued the poor fellow, who mounted the bank and betook himself to a cornfield, pursued by the captain and his men. In about an hour they returned to the boat being unable to overtake him. On returning to the boat they declared if they could have overtaken him they would have taken his life. This the captain reaffirmed several times to the writer of this and other passengers. When they found they could not overtake him and returned to the boat, they called to some men on the bank and desired them to try to arrest the runaway negro! Two of the Virginians immediately set out in search of him with their guns; at which the Captain and crew appeared greatly rejoiced, saying if they could not find him and kill him there was some hope of his being taken and sold as a slave, as they thought he had not his free papers with him. We merely wish to state the facts to the public and let them judge of the case, and patronise such boats if they wish.

THOSE "SKETCHES."—Our readers will certainly be gratified that our correspondent "P." has resumed his pen. Number two, of the Voyager, will be found on our first page. We have also in hand No. 3. for our next paper. The same writer is also gifted in verse, as will be seen from our Poetical Department. And as the voyager has now become an "itinerant," we apprehend that when he gets through with his reminiscences of the deep, he will favor us with some journeyings in terra firma. His request came too late.

We are gratified also to present this week to our readers the first number of the "Sketches in the Western Woods." S. W. W. is always welcome. He, too, is a poet. Has his muse fled?

OLIVE BRANCH.—The request of the Editor shall cheerfully be complied with next week, likewise that of "Non Fini," so soon as we find room.

THE NEWS.—By the suspension of our paper, for four weeks, we have fallen a little behind with our record of passing events. But we now are so situated as to have the advantage of daily mails, and shall be enabled to keep up with the times.

Since our last, accounts have been published of the return of Santa Anna to Mexico. Also, a disgraceful civil war at Nauvoo, Ill. has resulted in bloodshed, and the loss of several lives. The Mormons, we suppose, are none too good, but it is very evident that their cruel persecutors, are no better than they.

A very disastrous gale on the gulf of Mexico took place early in September. Several vessels are reported to have been lost. Of these, the Steamer New York, on her way from Galveston to New Orleans, was wrecked, and eighteen of her crew and passengers perished.

The World's Convention, to form a Christian Alliance, lately came off at London. It was numerously attended from various countries of Europe and from this country, and from many denominations of Christians. We are gratified that a respectable number attended from the United States. Hereafter we will endeavor to give some account of the proceedings.

The case of Jerry Phinney and the kidnappers has excited general interest, especially throughout the State. Jerry it appears, is restored to his family, through the liberality of citizens of Columbus who have made up his purchase money. It will be seen by an article copied from the O. State Journal, that Esq. Henderson at the recent trial was found guilty.

ILLINOIS CONFERENCE.—Just as our paper was going to press, we received a letter from Br. John Clarke, Jr. with a satisfactory report of the Minutes of the Illinois Conference, which has just been held in Quincy of which he was Secretary. He speaks of the session as "very harmonious" and states that "its business was despatched to general satisfaction." Br. R. Horne is President. With pleasure we will publish the proceedings next week. Our accounts from the Conferences, thus far, are, upon the whole, encouraging to the church.

ROBERT OWEN.—The New York Sun, announces, the return to this country of this distinguished man. It states that though seventy five years of age, he has crossed the Atlantic four times within less than six months, "for the sole purpose of cementing a lasting friendship between the two countries, and with the best results."

MINISTERS AFFLICTED.—It will be seen by the statement of Br. Andrew, that Br. G. Brown, President of the Pittsburgh Conference, and Br. G. Clancy, President of the Muskingum Conference, are both confined by sickness in Steubenville. To this we may add that we left Br. J. M. Young, President of the Ohio Conference, lying sick at Springfield, after the adjournment of the Ohio Conference. We respectfully suggest that as those brethren are detained by affliction from making the accustomed visits to the Stations and Circuits, their people, in the various charges, should remember their situation, and make provision for their wants as though they were able to render service. We regret also to learn of the serious affliction of Br. James Pelan at Xenia, Br. T. B. Cushman, at N. Lisbon, and Br. J. W. Case, at Plainfield. The brethren have our sympathies and prayers, and we shall be grateful to learn of their speedy recovery.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.—We are happy to have in hand the sermon of Br. G. Brown, furnished for publication, by request of the Muskingum Conference. Next week, it shall appear. We regret that the Secretary of the Ohio Conference has not found it convenient to send the remaining part of the Minutes. We have two or three of the Reports, but it would be more convenient to us, as well as more satisfactory to our friends, to publish the whole together. We have a number of communications on file, which shall be published, and others which are under consideration. Please have patience, friends.

ANNUAL REGISTER, 1847.—We regret that the publication of this little work is somewhat delayed, from the same cause that our paper has been delayed. It shall be forth coming now, so soon as possible. Send on your orders, friends, if you please, and tell us how we shall forward the pamphlets to you. $3,50 per hundred. $2, for 50 copies. 50 cents per dozen. Payable on the receipt of the pamphlets.

☞ We still promise to send by mail one copy to every subscriber to the Western Recorder, who pays $2 in advance for the 8th volume.

☞ New subscribers since our last, 126. Discontinuances, 106. We have taken some liberties with our list, and we fear that other names must be omitted soon. We are glad, however that new names are daily coming in to supply their places. Keep sending them on, brethren, i. e. the right sort of ones.

We have some copies of No. 1, for other new Subs., who wish to begin with the Volume, to have the Minutes of Conferences.

REV. MOSES SCOTT.—This brother, though he did not take an appointment from the last Conference, is still disposed to render efficient service. He writes us that he has recently formed a class of nine, at the Ohio furnace, with an encouraging prospect of increase. Was it not an oversight, that a new Mission was not recognised in the region of the Iron Works?

IOWA A STATE.—The State constitution has been adopted by a majority of 600, and Iowa is now a State. To consummate this work it only now remains to elect the State officers. For this purpose it is the duty of the Governor to issue his proclamation fixing a day of election, and which it is supposed will be in October.—Then a Governor, two representatives to Congress, and minor officers are to be chosen, together with the members of the Legislature which is to meet within four months from the time of the adoption of the constitution. It will devolve upon this body to elect two Senators to Congress and the Judges of the Supreme Court. The District Judges are to be elected by the people, at the township election in April. District Judge of the United States Court is also to be appointed by the President and Senate of the United States.

LITERARY NOTICES.

TREASURY OF HISTORY.—No. 12, of this valuable work has come to hand, and completes the treasury. It gives an "outline history of the different States of the Union" to the present year, with the Territories, and a sketch of California. The work, now completed, is embraced in two large volumes, 8 vo, pp. 760, and 638. It is published in 12 large numbers, suitable for mailing, at 25 cents per number. It is very cheap at that price. Recollect, Maunder's Treasury of History, comprises "an outline of universal history, ancient and modern, and a series of separate histories of every principal nation that exists, their rise, progress, and present condition." Published by Daniel Adee, 167, Fulton St. N. York.

AMERICAN PULPIT.—The September number is received. It contains two sermons, one by Rev. S. T. Spear, on the Conquest of the World by Faith, and one by Rev. J. K. Young on the necessity of a Revival of Religion. Wish we had room to publish this last. Published at Worcester, Mass. A good work, and should have a good patronage.

LITERARY EMPORIUM.—This is something good as well as neat. The September number, contains a fine portrait of Summerfield, and a colored flower. Contents, "Religious, Literary, and Philosophical." J. K. Wellman, Publisher, 110, Nassau St. N. York.

YOUNG PEOPLE'S MAGAZINE.—The September number of this useful work for Youth is before us. It is embellished with a portrait of its editor, Seba Smith, (alias Major Downing.) Likewise, a Colored Flower. The Publisher, Mr. Wellman, makes apology for giving the portrait, in violation of the Editor's wish. He adds:

Apart from the feelings of the Editor, the Publisher must confess that he takes a pleasure in presenting to his numerous readers the likeness of one whose various writings have rendered him a favorite with the reading public for nearly twenty years; and one particular branch of whose writings, it is not too much to say, had as wide a circulation and as great a popularity as anything ever written in this country. This allusion is of course to the original Letters of Major Jack Downing, published in the Portland Courier during the presidency of General Jackson. Some of Mr. Smith's ballads and poems, published anonymously, years ago, have also a popularity that will insure them a long life, for they are in the mouths of thousands all over the country, both young and old, who know not the author's name.

This Magazine, which was commenced under the editorial charge of Mr. Smith eight months ago, reached a circulation of about four thousand in six months, and is still rapidly increasing; a gratifying evidence certainly, that the public are satisfied with the taste and talent with which it is conducted.

☞The lacking number for June, has now been received. We are pleased to learn that the publication meets with good encouragement.

GODEY'S LADIES' BOOK, AND ARTHUR'S MAGAZINE UNITED.—The October number of this brilliant work, is received. The publisher takes much pains to make the work attractive. Seven embellishments are found in this number. The principal are, 1. Christ weeping over Jerusalem. 2. Bridge and Waterfall in Connecticut. 3. Colored Fashion plate. An interesting series of designs for cottages, farm houses, &c. is being given in the "Book." Also a Ladies' work department, with illustrations. The pages of the October number are filled by talented and popular writers. L. A. Godey, Publisher, 101, Chesnut St. Philadelphia.

COLUMBIAN MAGAZINE.—The October number of this elegant work, comes to us with accustomed promptness. The illustrations are exceedingly fine. 1. Cure for Love, (Mezzotint.) 2. View on the St. Lawrence River, (Montreal in the distance.) 3. Le Follet, (Four figures.) 4. Music. The Contents, as usual, entirely original. Amongst there are Mrs. Embury, Mrs. Sigourney, Mrs. Child, Fanny Forrester, Seba Smith, and the editors, Messrs, Inman and West. Published by Israel Post, 140, Nassau St. N. York.

LADIES' NATIONAL MAGAZINE.—We have received the October number of this tasty and popular work. Its embellishments are, The Poetess, and the Colored Fashion plate. Its contents are as usual, original, and furnished by numerous talented contributors. C. J. Peterson, Publisher, 98, Chesnut St. Philadelphia.

CINCINNATI CORRESPONDENCE.

Cincinnati Sept. 26, 1846.

DEAR RECORDER: Again melancholy duty seems to require a record of deaths doings, and this too under circumstances, calculated to draw largely upon our most tender sympathies. Another watchman upon the walls of Zion hath laid down his armor and ceased at once to work and live. The Rev. Thomas Breeden of the Charleston Circuit Ia. District M. P. C. died in this city on Sept. 14. after a short illness of 6 days. This estimable young minister was but 23 years of age and had been travelling but one year. As proper notice will be taken no doubt by his brethren of the Ia. District of his early career it will be necessary here to speak only of his last affliction. On the sabbath evening previous he preached in a school room to a crowded audience and as he labored zealously and earnestly with the people, became much heated. Upon coming into the open air he was chilled but had no indication of dangerous illness. On Tuesday he started up to this city in company with Br. Rogers of the Presbyterian Church. He was on the boat but a short time until violently attacked by fever and although during the night he suffered intensely, the pain of mind he experienced from witnessing the scenes of the card tables seemed greater than the pain of his body. He could scarcely be restrained from leaving his berth and falling on his knees before those thus engaged and imploring the mercy of God in their behalf. Upon his arrival in this city he was directed to the house of Br. J. Layman who received him kindly, and whose family bestowed every attention until his decease on Monday following. On Saturday, he expressed a great desire to be able to go up and worship in the sanctuary on the Sabbath. In the early part of his sickness a friend mentioned the death of Br. Stephens President of the Ia. District and his dying expression. He said O! yes I know that good Br. well and sometime afterward repeated the same expression. "The religion I have preached to others is now my comfort and consolation" adding the words Glory, Glory, Glory, "At another time whern laboring under a burning fever he broke out and sang, I'm going home, I'm going home. Although he had the attention of two Physicians the disease progressed rapidly until Monday afternoon. About an hour before he died he was heard to say. "An heir of our Lord Jesus Christ" after which he uttered no more, but far from his relations, and in the midst of kind friends but entire strangers, breathed his spirit into the hands of its Creator.

His languishing head is at rest
Its thinking and aching are o'er
The quiet immovable breast
Is heard by affliction no more.

He was interred in the Ministers, Lot in the M. P. Cemetery. Some circumstances connected with this brother's death are very afflicting. From a letter in his possession it appears his parents reside in Cravensville Mo. and are pious people—that the son had become a minister since he left home, and had promised to visit them at the end of this Conf. year. The letter further says "we all desire to see you, especially your mother, but she would rather never see you in this life than to hear you had gone back to the things of this world, I am about my house and your mothers prayers are that she may hear you preach in it before she dies (She is in very feeble health.) And if it is not to be so, she trusts in God we may strike hands in that happy land where parting will be no more."

Contrary to every human expectation that son has preceded the mother to the bright spirit land. Instead of the clasped hand and tender embrace of an earthly greeting, the parents will meet their son in heaven, "that happy land where parting will be no more." Thus may we live thus may we die, and at last may we all meet in heaven.

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

THE TRIAL OF THE KIDNAPPERS Closed before noon yesterday. The Jury returned a verdict after dark, last evening, having been out seven hours. They acquitted all but Henderson, the Justice of the Peace, on the ground mainly, we believe, that those thus acquitted were ignorant of the law and unaware of the facts as to Jerry's freedom.—We are not aware what motion will be made in reference to Henderson, to save him from the Penitentiary. We hardly know how the Jury could avoid the conviction of all those engaged in the affair, though some or most of them were undoubtedly misled by Forbes. We desire not so much the punishment of the kidnappers as the vindication of the law and the establishment of a correct precedent. The Jury was undoubtedly composed of men inclined to leniency towards the prisoners, or none of them would have escaped conviction. As it is, we are satisfied; and we trust the lesson will be a useful one to magistrates and others.—O. S. Jour.

JERRY PHINNEY, who was kidnapped and taken to Kentucky from this city several months since, was brought back on Thursday last, and is now restored to his family. He has been confined in the Penitentiary of Kentucky ever since he left, and is quite emaciated. For what has he endured this ignominy and suffering? We leave the question to be answered as the reader may decide properly, if there can be a diversity of opinion on a point so plain. Five hundred dollars was paid to secure his release. We will not say that it was wrong to pay this sum to get him back; but we must say that the idea of paying for a man who is just as free legally—to say nothing of his natural rights—as any man who walks our streets, is one that freemen cannot relish much. This sum was paid by our citizens under the impression that he could not otherwise be restored to his suffering family.—Ohio State Journal.

TERRIBLE ACCIDENT.—A most terrible accident occurred on the Portage Rail Road on Monday last. The following are the particulars, as we gather them from various sources. The persons injured were on the Locomotive and its tender, and were on their way to a Camp meeting in the neighborhood. The accident occurred about a mile east of the Half Way House in turning a curve. The Locomotive by some means, not satisfactorily accounted for, was thrown from the track, and upset against the embankment of the cut through which they were passing, when a section boat which was attached to it, was thrown forward by its impetus, crushing the engine, and instantly killing Col. Thomas D. McGough, a gentleman connected with the road, and so severely injuring another man, named James Bighlan, as to leave no hopes of his recovery, besides less severely injuring some four or five others. One young lady had her lip dislocated; another lost two of her fingers, &c. No blame is laid upon the Engineer. The engine was running quite slow at the time. Drs. James Christy and Lemon, have been in attendance, in whose hands the sufferers will be skilfully and kindly treated. To Dr. Christy we are indebted for most of the particulars above.—Hollidaysburg Register.

MARINE DISASTER.

The ship St. Mary, Capt. Foster, which arrived at this port yesterday from New York, picket up at sea, on the the 12th inst., in lat. 35° 16′ lon., 73° 30′ capt. Shanklin and crew of the schooner Mary Ann, of Philadelphia, from Charleston bound to Philadelphia, with a cargo of lumber, which vessel was dismasted in a gale and abandoned on the 8th inst. off Cape Hateras.

Capt. Shanklin reports that on the 11th he saw a New York brig, name unknown, with her masts gone by the deck. On the 12th he spoke the schooner Angeline R. Thompson, which reported having seen, the day previous, a schooner bottom upwards.

The St. Mary also brought up to the city John Valentine, one of the crew of the brig Helen McLeod, Captain Marston, of Baltimore, who states that vessel left the Capes of Virginia on the 7th instant, with a cargo of assorted merchandise, bound to this port.

A sail was seen in the west, and the Helen McLeod bore down towards her. Shortly after, a violent storm of wind and rain set in, and after the squall cleared away, she could not be seen, and is supposed to have gone down with all hands on board, consisting of the captain and crew, eleven in number, four ladies in the cabin and four in the steerage.

Capt Shanklin is of opinion that the crew and passengers of the Helen McLeod may have been taken off, as there were several sail in sight.

There is nothing easier than to deceive a good man: he that never lies, easily believes, and he that never deceives confides much. To be deceived is not always a sign of weakness, for goodness sometimes is the cause of it; have a care not to be so good a man, that others may occasion from it of being bad; let the cunning of the serpent go along with the innocency of the dove.

[By an extra of the Cincinnati Commercial, we have the following intelligence, taken from the Matamoras Flag.]

FROM THE ARMY.

CAMARGO, Sept. 8, 1846.

MR. EDITOR:—I hasten to inform you of the arrival, post haste, from Seralvo, of Capt. Murray, with information that McCulloch's Rangers had come into General Worth's camp, at Seralvo, and reported that on the 4th inst., about 40 miles beyond Seralvo, they discovered a body of Mexicans, forming the advance guard of a large force. They retreated as the Rangers advanced upon them, and were pursued until they fell back on a larger force, which was discovered to be from 800 to 1000 strong. It was the general impression that it was intended to attack General Worth, before reinforcements could arrive, and Capt. Murray thinks that a battle is being fought at Seralvo to day, (the 8th.) Captain Murray met General Taylor, with a part of his force, some distance in advance of the main body, and within 35 miles of Seralvo, on a forced march to its relief.

It is positively asserted that the Mexicans are determined to make a strong resistance between Seralvo and Montery. Ampudia and Arista are co-operating with each other, and their forces are augmenting fast—the Mexicans are rallying to their standard from all quarters. The heat has retarded somewhat the progress of the troops which left here with Gen. Taylor, it being out of the question to march during the heat of the day.

The troops were in high spirits and eager to come up with the Mexicans. Two companies of Rangers that were here, having their horses shod, started off immediately after Captain Murray arrived. All is quiet here. Proclamations from Santa Anna, Ampudia, and the Governor of Tamaulipas, have been received in town, and are having their effect upon the Mexicans.

The proclamation of Ampudia makes the penalty very severe upon all who may furnish provisions, assist in transporting provisions, or in any wise aid the Americans. It prohibits them from holding any intercourse or carrying on any trade with us. Death and a confiscation of property, are the penalties for disobeying the order. These proclamations have also been received in Mier, and Reynoso. Nothing more of importance.

We are also indebted to the clerk of the Brig Hatchee, for the following extract of an order published in Camargo, according to instructions from General Taylor, and signed by E. R. Kane, 2d Dragoons, commanding the post.

CAMARGO, MEXICO, Sept. 10, 1846.

To all whom it may concern:

No American citizen is allowed to locate in Camargo, without a written permit from General Taylor. No goods brought by steamboats or mules will be allowed to remain—all such will be seized and sent to the Quarter master at the Brazos. No person not connected with the Army will be suffered to stop at Camargo, without a permit from Gen. Taylor or the commandant at the post. No private freight of any kind to be brought ashore from steamboats, and in accordance with the instructions, all persons not connected with the Army, are required to leave the place on the 17th inst.

In our last paper we stated the advance of the army, under General Worth, to be at China. It was at Seralvo, a small town about sixty miles from Monterey. Further reports have reached here as to the number of Mexican troops in Monterey, which puts them at 8000, with a heavy additional force on the march, which it is said will be there before General Taylor can possibly arrive. The whole force which General Taylor marches to Monterey will not exceed seven thousand.

NARROW ESCAPE.

PERILOUS PASSAGE OF THE GREAT WESRERN.

The Great Western on her last trip to New York encountered the gale of the 19th, and sustained some damage. The storm was a terrific one, and the passengers, 126 in number, were seriously alarmed. Religious services were performed during the existence of the storm, and the sacrament was administered to some 60 persons. After the danger was over, a letter of thanks to the Captain and other officers of the ship was drawn up, and the sum of £200 was raised to present to the officers and crew, of which the Captain was asked to accept £80. A fund was also started for the support of the widows and children of those who perish at sea, to be called the Great Western fund.

REV. MR. STOCKTON'S CHURCH.—The first Methodist Protestant Church, on Eleventh street above Vine, of which the Rev. Thomas H. Stockton is pastor, has, during the last few weeks, been undergoing the process of an entire and thorough renovation. The whole interior has been changed in its character, and the church edifice now presents a neat, chaste and beautiful appearance.

Among the improvements, we may mention that the interior has been papered, the ceiling with two shades of pearl colored paper, the walls with pale salmon color, and the recess behind the pulpit, with various shades in imitation of panelling. The papers was manufactured and "put on" by Messrs. Howell & Brothers, and very closely resembles painting.

In the ceiling, a large new ventilator, of approved pattern, has been placed, for the better ventilation of the building.

Gas fixtures have also been introduced in the building, the first in the district, above Nine St. The pendants are silver plated, and of a very handsome pattern. The fixtures were put up by Mr. William H. Schrimer.

The old pulpit has been replaced by a very chaste design in wood, surmounted by a marble slab. In front of the pulpit, are the words "GOD IS LOVE," in silver-plated letters. Carpenter, Mr. John Gnodo.

The whole building, inside and out, including the pews, wainscoating, gallery, &c., has been newly painted. The painter, Mr. Morris Morris, has certainly done himself great credit.

In all respects, therefore, this church may be regarded as one of the most beautiful in our city. Its position is open and airy, the decorations neat and appropriate, and the general accommodations such as cannot fail to secure the comfort of those who statedly attend to worship in the building.—Phil. Sat. Inq.

THE MORMONS.—We have a most dismal account of the condition of the Mormons who undertook to migrate to California, but stopped at a place agreed on between them and Col. Allen, when the latter was desirous of raising a battallion of infantry from among them. They were to locate on the Platte river, and there to remain for an indefinite time. They attempted to raise a crop for their subsistence, but failed, and have abandoned the Platte, and are now at Bellevue, on the Missouri river, near the Council Bluffs. They are said to be in a starving condition, and nothing but the aid of the Government, during the coming winter, will save many of them from death. President Polk, it is understood, some time ago despatched an agent to their camp, to inquire into their condition—probably with a view of granting them some relief—and he is said to have returned to this city on the Gen. Brouke.—St. Louis Republican.

NO TIME TO READ.—How frequently is this sounded into our years. "No time to read!" What meaneth this" "No time to read.' What! feed the body and starve the soul? horrible! Friend, no time to read! then you have no time to eat, sleep, perambulate; to inhale God's atmosphere; no, not even to live. You dishonor your being, the God of your existence. No man has a right to let business or worldly cares, crowd out the consecrated hour. He does it at his peril. God commands us to read. "It is not good that the soul be without knowledge." The mind is a heath—a barren desert, a waste howling wildernes! Point us to the man who does not read, make a business of it, meditate, pray, treasure up; and we will point you to one more or less, earthly, sensual, devilish."

Ladies, dare you enter connubial life with the man who tells you he has "no time to read?" You do it at your peril!

Young man, dare you take the hand of her, in wedlock's holy bands, who reads not, excepting the light, fictitious, frivolous, ephemeral productions of the day? You marry not a wife—a bubble, a puff-ball; you sacrifice your all at the shrine of vanity and folly. Don't do it.

"Wise men lay up knowledge; but the mouth of the foolish is near destruction."

LA FAYETTE AND SLAVERY.—In a letter written or the Liberty Bell, Oct. 3, 1845, Thomas Clarkson says:—

"He (La Fayette,) was decidedly as uncompromising an enemy to the slave trade and slavery, as any man I ever knew. He freed all his slaves in French Cayenne, who had come to him by inheritance, in 1783, and showed me all his rules and regulations for his estate when they were emancipated. I was with him no less than four different times in Paris. He was a real gentleman, and of soft and gentle manners. I have seen him put out of temper, but never at any time except when slavery was the subject. He has said frequently, "I would never have drawn my sword in the cause of America, if I could have conceived that thereby I was founding a land of slavery."

FATAL STEAMBOAT COLLISION.—As the Steamboat Atlas was descending the Ohio River on the night of the 13th inst. and when a short distance below the mouth of the Missouri, she came in contact with the steamers Otter, which was ascending.

The Atlas struck with her bow against the starboard side of the Otter with tremendous violence, carrying and cutting away the whole of her pantry, store room, wheel-house, shatt wheel and two or three berths on the after part of the lower deck, and her guards down to the hull. Fortunately, the latter was uninjured, and the cargo preserved. One life was lost; a fireman named John Murphy, was carried overboard and drowned; he was sleeping at the time of the collision, in one of the after berths which was torn away.

After the collision the Atlas rounded to and took from the Otter her passengers.

DELAWARE CIRCUIT.—Our first Quarterly meeting will be held at Hopewell Meeting house near Johnstown, to which we invite Brothers T. Potter, S. Catlin, J. Wilson, S. Akins, J. M. Conn, A. S. Robison, Z. Ragan, C. S. Callihan, and as many more as can come.

WM. HATFIELD.

[Our brother has unfortunately omitted to state the time of his meeting. ED.]

FOR THE PRESIDENT, MUSKINGUM CONF.

BROTHER BASSETT: I wish to inform Br. Clancy, our President, through your paper, that I shall be under the necessity of making application for a release from the Summerville circuit. I have been once around the circuit, and finding it impracticable to get my family removed to so distant an appointment, and finding also that some of the official members did not believe that I could be supported, I concluded to return home, and seek a livelihood by other means. I shall however be ready to take an appointment from the President. Please address me at Homer, Licking co., Ohio.

A. CHANNELL.

XENIA CIRCUIT.—Our first Quarterly Meeting will be held at Bellbrook, on the 7th and 8th of November. We specially invite the following brethren to be with us on that occasion: A. M'Guire, R. M. Dalbey, O. P. Stephens, O. Warrington, W. Pelan, with any other brethren who can make it convenient to attend.

JOSEPH WHITE.

REV. GEO. CLANCY.—We regret that a note from this brother, intended for publication in the last number of Vol. 7, and announcing that the sickness of his companion and himself prevented his entering upon the duties of President of the Muskingum District, did not come to hand for several days after that number was issued. We have since received from him another note which we give below. The appended statement of Br. Andrew, which has just been received, informs us that our brother and his companion, are both still afflicted.

Steubenville, O., Sept. 22nd, 1846.

DEAR BR. BASSETT: I forwarded a note in view of having it appear in the last No. of 7th Vol.; but for some reason it did not; therefore, I wish to say in this, for the information of all whom it may concern, that the sickness of myself and companion, has prevented me from entering upon the labors of the District, as I did intend.

As to myself, I was attacked with the ague, which held me some two weeks, reducing me very much; but for some more than two weeks I have been relieved, and recruiting my strength very fast; but am not yet recovered sufficient for pulpit labors. My companion, who was quite ill when you (Br. Bassett) left this town, is still sick, and quite low. To all human appearance, she has been near her long home. For a number of days, my hopes and fears alternately prevailed. This is the 28th day of her confinement, and she is now in perfect helplessness. Her fever subsided two weeks since, but from what may in part be regarded as a bed sore, she suffers extremely—rendering her quite helpless—and from which she frequently is agitated with high nervous excitement. Though danger is not past, yet my hopes of her recovery are strong. We are kindly entertained, and ministered to with great hospitality at Br. Abdell's—(the place of my stay during our recent conference)—while my companion has been under the faithful medical attendance of Br. D. B. Dorsey, with some three other physicians of the place. I purpose entering upon my labors so soon as a relief from these afflictions will justify.

In love and haste, GEO. CLANCY.

DEAR BR. BASSETT: It may be proper to state through the Western Recorder that Rev. G. Brown, President of the Pittsburgh Conference, and Rev. G. Clancy, President of the Muskingum Conference, are both detained in this town by sickness.

Br. Brown received a violent attack of billious fever about a week ago; but his symptoms are now favorable, and he hopes to be soon able to attend to his duties on the District.

Br. Clancy and wife are both sick. Sister Clancy is very low. Br. Clancy has experienced a relapse of the ague, but is now some better.

As prayer was made without ceasing of the church for Peter, so let prayer be made for these brethren that the churches may not be deprived of their valuable labors.—It is upon the whole quite healthy in this vicinity, and in religious matters our prospects are brightening.

I remain yours truly, R. ANDREW.

Steubenville, O., Oct. 7th, 1846.

☞Obituaries by Br. Nichols and Br. Johnson, crowded out this week shall be given in our next paper.

BR. BASSETT: It is by the request of some of the brethren, members of the late Annual Conference in Steubenville, that I now pen a few lines for the Western Recorder. Will you therefore permit me to say to them, that through the mercy of a kind Providence, I have recovered from the sickness I had at Conference. After staying in Steubenville until the next Tuesday after the rise of Conference, I took a private conveyance and started for home, and arrived safely the following Saturday, and found my family well. My health is better now than it has been since the 17th of last March. Truly, dear brethren, my affliction has been very great this summer; but I can say I thank God for affliction. I believe it has been for my good.

I feel under a compliment to those brethren who sympathised with me in my late affliction, and who contributed for and sent to me seven dollars in money.

Yours affectionately, S. H. HEATH.

WELLSVILLE CIRCUIT.—Please give notice that our first quarterly meeting will be held in New Lisbon, to commence on Saturday, 31st of October, at 11 o'clock. Brs. R. Andrew and Jos. Burns, are requested to atttend if possible. T. B. CUSHMAN.

Br. Williamson, you are credited for a year, for your remittance.

Br. John Londer is credited in advance to middle of the 9th volume. The $5 lately sent, was correctly entered in our book, but by mistake, the credit in our last paper was $2 instead of $5.

To the Rev. Geo. Clancy, President of the Muskingum Annual Conference M. P. Church.

DEAR BROTHER:—As I Know not the place of your residence, I take the liberty of addressing you through the "Recorder,' in compliance with an act of the Pittsburgh Annual Conferance, at its last session, instructing me to forward to you a copy of the following preamble and resolutions:—

Whereas, there are a number of appointments lying in the N. West part of this District at present supplied with Preachers from the Muskingum District; therefore,

Resolved,—That this Conference respectfully request the Muskingum Conference, hereafter to leave those appointments unsupplied, in view of being supplied with preachers from this District, to which they properly belong; and that the Muskingum Conference take possession of the appointments lying within their bounds, at present suppied by the preachers of the Conneaut Ct., if convenient for them so do. Provided however, that the classes along the line, in the meantime, be consulted, and that there be no change without this general consent.—And that a copy of this resolution be forwarded by the secretary, to the President of th Muskingum Conference before its next session."

BR. BASSETT: I wish to inform Rev. J. M. Young, President of Ohio Con. (through the medium of the Recorder) that I decline accepting the appointment of the Annual Con. as Superintendant of Buford Circuit. He can therefore consider that Circuit without a Preacher, and me without an appointment.

Yours &c.

W. G. FOWLER.

Hamersville O. Sept. 18*th* 1846.

BR. BASSETT: The following preamble and resolution were passed with one heart and one voice, one only voting against it, at the 4th quarterly meeting for Flat Rock Ct.

Whereas, the subject of slavery has for several years past agitated and convulsed our Annual Conference to the great injury (as we believe) of the prosperity of the cause of Christ in the Salvation of souls, and this evil has been in the main produced by the ministry, to the general dissatisfaction of the members. Therefore,

Resolved, That this Quarterly Conference highly approve of the resolution as passed by the General Conference on the subject of slavery and recommend to our next Annual Conference to receive no Minister or Preacher into the travelling connection unless he gives evidence of his entire satisfaction with our Constitution and book of Discipline as it now stands, on that subject. And that the same be forwarded to the Western Recorder for publication, Yours as ever,

J. J. AMOS.

POETRY.

Written for the Western Recorder.

STANZAS.

From a Manuscript Poem.

[The former part of this Poem is descriptive of scenes connected with the history of a virtuous lady, reduced from a state of riches to want, by severe trials and afflictions; who died bequeathing her last blessing upon an orphan child.]

I.

Years now had passed and on her tomb the grass was growing green,
When kneeling by the silent grave a youthful form was seen:
'Twas he who had been blessed in life's last closing hour,
Who proved the sweetness of her prayer, its majesty and power:
Amid the solitude of night, alone the church-yard trod,
And wept beside her resting-place and pressed the sacred sod!
He mingled with the falling dew affection's holiest tear,
When a soft voice would soothe his grief, and speak his mother near.
He gazed upon the spangled sky, and traced her beauty there—
And fanned his brow her angel plume, when breathing up a prayer.

II.

His bark has plowed the Atlantic wave, he's pressed Columbia's strand,
Where freedom sheds her brightest ray to gild a happy land!
He's listened to the murmuring waves that lave lake Erie's shore,
And stood upon Niag'ra's verge, amid its thundering roar,—
And when the rapids down would rush, the river's mighty flow,
Then madly plunge, 'mid circling foam, a hundred feet below—
Before the great Creator, God! his spirit bowed subdued, Yet praised the law of love that gemmed the river's misty flood!
The mountain's rocky heights he's climbed, afar in the wild West,
And worshipped in the sylvan groves with gorgeous vesture dressed,
Where smoke of council-fires once curled above the forest trees:
Or sailed upon Ohio's breast, where played the Indian's oar,
And savage war-whoop only woke the silence of the shore:
Lo! many years in foreign lands a wanderer he has been,
Yet lovlier spot than that sweet grave he never yet has seen!

III.

His resting place it may not be, (alas! I know he weeps,)
Beneath the shadow of the church where now his Mother sleeps!
In regions far away, beyond the swellings of the sea,
Far from his home, far from her grave, e'en there his tomb may be!
But when from all the scenes of earth, his spirit shall depart,
Thy name, O Mother! will be seen engraven on his heart!
The winds that softly kiss the flowers that bloom above thy head,
May murmur 'round his lowly bed a requiem for the dead:
And should some lovely flower bloom above him when he's gone,
The fragrance off his mother's grave, may mingle with his own. P.

THE WORLD AS IT IS.

This world is not so bad a world
As some would like to make it;
Though, whether good, or whether bad,
Depends on how we take it.
For if we scold and fret all day,
From dewy morn till even,
This world will ne'er afford to man,
A foretaste here of heaven.

This world in truth's as good a world
As e'er was known to any
Who have not seen another yet,
(And these are very many!)
And if the men and women, too,
Have plenty of employment,
Those surely must be hard to please
Who cannot find enjoyment.

This world is quite a clever world,
In rain or pleasant weather,
If people would but learn to live
In harmony together!
Nor seek to burst the kindly bond
By love and peace cemented,
And learn that best of lessons yet,
To always be contented.

Then were the world a pleasant world,
And pleasant folks were in it:
The day would pass most pleasantly
To those who thus begin it;
And all the nameless grievances,
Brought on by borrowed troubles,
Would prove, as certainly they are,
A mass of empty bubbles!

Elected to Deacon's Orders and Ordained.—T. L. Falkner, M. Stewart, E. Martin, I. Holand, V. Lucas, J. Wood.

The following brethren were elected the standing district committee.—W. Reeves, P. T. Laishley, C. Avery, F. H. Pierpoint, J. W. Phillips, J. L. Sands.

Jos. Burns was elected permanent Secretary, and J. Scott, assistant.

The following resolutions were adopted:—

Resolved, That this Annual Conference entertain no charge against the official character of any of its Ministers, unless it be officially presented from the quarterly conference of his circuit or station, except in cases where the charges did not exist, or were not known before the sitting of the last quarterly conference of said circuit or station.

Resolved, That the case of Br. A. Shinn be referred to a committee of three.

J. Robison, J. L. Sands, A. Shores were chosen said committee.

The above committee made the following report which was adopted:—

The committee to whom was referred the case of Br. Shinn, report:—That after having applied to the best sources for information with regard to his pecuniary affairs, they find that he has nothing to rely upon for his support. We are informed, he holds a mortgage on a tract of land in Virginia. But this farm fails to support the family of the gentleman who now occupies it, so that our beloved and greatly afflicted brother, is entirely dependant on his friends and the church, for the means of subsistence.

In view of this, the committee recommends the passage of the following resolution:—

Resolved, That each superintendent be required to bring the case of Br. Shinn before the church at each appointment, and left a collection at each place for his use and benefit.

Resolved, That these collections be forwarded to the conference Steward, (J. Cowl,) to be by him applied to the aforesaid purpose.

Resolved, That the Temperance reformation now going on in this, and other counties, is every way worthy the cordial support of this Annual Conference; and we request our ministers and preachers to bring this good cause before our people in all places where it is practicable.

Resolved, That each superintendent be required to see that the Stewards lift conference collections at all his appointments.

Resolved, That each minister and preacher be requested to use every effort to get up Sabbath Schools, in every circuit and station within the bounds of this district.

Resolved, That the next session of this Conference be held in Waynesburgh, Green Co. Pa.

Resolved, That the time for the commencement of the next session of Conference be the third Tuesday in August, 1847.

Whereas we have been favored with an address from Br. Clark, (Colporteur of the American Tract Society,) in which he gave a statement of some facts in reference to the existence and character of said society, as to its happy adaptation to the end proposed, its importance, and glorious results; therefore,

Resolved, That it is the opinion of this Conference, that the Tract cause, and the Colportage system of circulating religious truth, should receive our warmest sympathy—most fervent prayers—and as far as practicable, our hearty co-operation.

The following preamble and resolutions, from the committee on finance, were adopted:—

Dear Brethren: Your committee on finance find, with deep regret, that the Conference Steward's Report will exhibit a great delinquency on the part of circuits and stations, in meeting the disciplinary claims of the Itinerant brethren, who have labored for them during the past year. And we have felt a deep anxiety to ascertain the cause or causes of this evil among us, that this serious hindrance to the prosperity of the church may be removed. We cannot be persuaded that it arises from a want of ability on the part of the District to support its ministry; nor do we conceive that our people are unwilling to render a righteous compensation to those who break to them the bread of life. But we think that this unpleasant state of things, has been (at least in part) produced by the premature division of circuits, and setting off of stations. We are inclined to the belief that the wholesome restriction of our discipline on this head, has not been duly regarded by this Annual Conference in creating new circuits and stations. The discipline says, "No Station or Circuit shall be divided, unless each part have ability to support one or more preachers." This we think has been frequently done, and the consequence is, that we have a number of small circuits and stations that are not able to support their preachers in a creditable manner.

Again. The superintendents have, in many instances, neglected to see that the plan of the Annual Conference for raising the means of support for its itinerant laborers, has been carried into effect. And it has been ascertained that in almost every case where the scheme alluded to (the subscription plan) has been faithfully carried into effect, that our preachers have received their salaries, and where it has been neglected, they have not. And it is well known, that all denomination of Christians in this land who pay their preachers have adopted the subscription plan.

In view of the embarrassed state of our financial affairs, the question has frequently occurred to our minds, what can be done? All see, and feel the necessity of adopting some energetic measures, and vigorously carrying them into effect.

With regard however to the resolution offered to the conference on yesterday, and referred to us, the committee think that its passage in its present form, would be productive of no good, but might be of much evil. We regard the resolution as antagonistic with the discipline; inasmuch as it gives the preacher leave to retire from his field of labor without the consent of the President. See Dis. page 52. Sec. 20.

In view of improving the condition of our financial affairs, we recommend the passage of the following resolutions:—

Resolved 1*st*, That the plan of raising the means of support by subscription, for the travelling preachers of the Pittsburgh District be adopted in all our circuits and stations.

2nd, That it shall be the duty of each class or society to select a man, whose duty it shall be to call upon each member of the church, and those who sit under our ministry, to subscribe what he or she may feel able to pay during the year, in quarterly instalments, be it much or little, and enter the same in a book or paper kept for that purpose.

3rd, That it shall be the duty of each superintendent, on his first round on his circuit, or at the first leader's meeting in his station, to publish this plan, and see that some one be appointed in each class to raise subscription as aforesaid.

4th, That it shall be the duty of each person appointed to raise subscription, to hand over his subscription paper or book, to the class leader or steward of his class, and it shall be the duty of such leader or steward to collect in quarterly instalments each one's subscription; and also to report to the first quarterly conference, the amount subscribed.

5th, That it shall be the duty of the chairman of each quarterly conference, to enquire particularly of each collector, whether suitable efforts have been made to collect the quarterly instalments.

NORTH ILLINOIS CONFERENCE.

Extract of a letter to the Editor from the President of the North Illinois Conference, dated Canton, Ill. Sept. 23rd 1846.

"The North Illinois Conference of the M. P. Church commenced its session according to appointment on the 16th inst. and closed on the 21st. Several members of Conference were prevented from being with us, on account of sickness. We had on the whole, an agreeable and interesting session. Our numbers are small, the Iowa Territory having been cut off from us by the late General Conference. Yet our ministers repaired from the Conference room to their respective charges, encouraged, and doubly resolved to preach Christ and him crucified, to dying sinners. We look for better days. Discord and schism threatened to make havoc of our little Zion in this District. But bless God, all appeared to be of one mind when we left Conference. Great unanimity characterized nearly all our deliberations. How good it is for brethren to dwell together in unity. Peace on earth is the legitimate effect of the gospel of Christ. Prince of peace reign, over us.

"You will, I trust in due time receive an extract of our minutes for publication, from the publishing Committee. We passed the resolutions recently adopted by the Muskingum Conference, with the addition of one word, without a dissenting vote."

MOSES JARED.

Biographical.

DR. MILO ADAMS.

With deep regret we are called upon to record the death of our worthy, and much esteemed friend and Br. Dr. Milo Adams, who departed this life, at his residence, in Sharon, Beaver Co. Pa. on the 18th of August, aged 55 years and 6 months.

The subject of this notice was born in Westmoreland Co. Pa. and at the age of 8 or 10 years, moved with his father, the late Dr. Samuel Adams, and family, to the falls of Big Beaver, in Beaver Co. in which County, he spent the remainder of his days, with the exception of the time spent, in the study of Medicine, with Dr. Philip Mowry in Pittsburg, and a residence of 4 years, in the same city, a short time back.

"The Western Star" speaking of the Dr. says: "The deceased, while living, in private and public life, was favorably known; his memory will be cherished by his bereaved and afflicted family, and those who enjoyed an acquaintance with him. He has gone down to the grave, and will mingle no more in the busy scenes of life; will be seen and known here, no more, for ever; yet, his many acts of kindness, and benevolence, will long linger in grateful recollection behind him." Again, same Paper—"In his 21st year he commenced practice here (Beaver) with a skill, success, and industry, that soon won for him, distinction in his profession, and the confidence of his fellow citizens; while his urbanity of manner, benevolence of heart, and kindness of disposition secured for him their esteem—a confidence and esteem, that he deservedly maintained undiminished to the last."—Again, same Paper.—"At different times they gave him strong proofs thereof (of their confidence) and though he mingles but little in the political controversies of the day, such was their regard for him, that in this County (Beaver) where the political party, to which he belonged, was in a minority, he was elected to the office of Sheriff, by a respectable majority"—Again, same Paper—"Twenty four years ago he experienced religion, and united himself to the M. E. C. in which he continued, until the severance of that body, into the two branches of Episcopal, and Protestant, when he connected himself with the latter, and continued an exemplary, and useful member thereof, until his decease."

The above is good testimony, from a public journal, in the vicinity of Dr. Adams' life and death, and is all true, and is therefore worthy of a place, in this notice, of a departed friend, and brother in the Lord.

Our deceased brother, was what is called, a "self made man," of strong original intellect, well cultivated by constant application—He had evidently read much and had profited by what he read. He was a man of extensive observation, and great experience in human nature—a sound practical philosopher. He considered himself to have been awakened to a sense of his lost estate, in answer to the prayers of pious friends, and he owned himself to be, under high obligations to the late Rev. Wm. Swazie, of the M. E. C. for the religious aid he received from him in the beginning of his religious career—Many others have done likewise. His views of the Christian religion were clear, and evangelical. He regarded it as his privilege, according to the scriptures, to have a constant evidence of his acceptance with God, though Jesus Christ. If at any time he lacked this (and sometimes he did) he mourned nor did he rest, until at the foot of the cross, his panting heart was reassured of a Saviour's love—His morality was sound—He walked as becometh the gospel of Christ—Works were nothing, and faith was nothing too, if it did not work—His faith was a worker—it worked by love and purified the heart. Who ever knew Dr. Adams, from the time of his conversion, to the day of his death, to do a dishonorable immoral action! His liberality of sentiment in relation to sister churches was grant. A good sermon was a good sermon with him, preach it who would, and a good christian was a good christian, with him, wherever found. He could join freely, and heartily, with all evangelical Christians, in their devotions, and feel himself perfectly at home—yet, his views and feelings were, without bigotry, Methodist Protestant, in their character, and so remained until he went to a better world.

He supported the gospel, and other benevolent institutions, according to, and as his friends some times thought, beyond his ability. His practice of Medicine, often disclosed to him, much human misery. This he always relieved; if it took the last cent he had at command—he fed the hungry and clothed the naked, and soothed the sorrowing—To do good was his delight.

His last illness was of long continuance. It was brought on by exposure up the Allegheny River, more than three years ago. Several diseases by which he was at first assailed, all merged at last, into the one of which he died. He suffered much, until near the close of life, but he bore all with christian meekness and patience—Who that knew him can doubt his being prepared to die? The death scene at length drew near. The affectionate husband, the tender parent, the pious christian, is now to be seen upon the bed of death. His mind is calm and sound to the very last. For his family's sake, he is desirous of a little longer stay on earth, but still he is willing to go if God shall call. He, in common with all christians, near death, had humbling views of himself, and seemed to himself as one, who had done but little for God. This made Christ the more precious. The Dr. hung his all for both worlds, or Christ. To him his weeping wife, and children were committed, with many a prayer for their present and eternal welfare. He prayed much day and night, especially in the night watches—When all was hushed into silence around him, he communed with God, and rejoiced aloud, in hope of the glory of God. Thus, with a strong, unshaken confidence in the promises of the Saviour of Sinners, death found him. He looked upon the last enemy and said "O death where is thy sting? O grave where is thy victory?—thanks be to God who giveth us the victory, through our Lord Jesus Christ. "Though my flesh and my heart fail, God is the strength of my heart, and my portion for ever." Dr. Adams, the friend of every thing good, is gone, we shall see

ECCLESIASTICAL.

Part of a discourse delivered, before the ordination of Elders, in Steubenville Augt. 23, 1846, and written out for publication, in obedience to a request, of the Muskingum A. Con. M. P. C.

The elders which are among you I exhort, who am also an Elder, and a witness of the sufferings of Christ, and also a partaker of the glory that shall be revealed. Feed the flock of God which is among you, taking the oversight thereof, not by constraint, but willingly; not for filthy lucre, but of a ready mind: neither as being lords over God's heritage, but being examples to the flock. And when the chief shepherd shall appear, ye shall receive a crown of glory that fadeth not away. 1 Peter. 5, 1—4.

The very celebrated Mr. Wesley said, in his letter to the American Methodists in 1784, that Lord King's account of the primitive church, had convinced him many years ago, that bishops and Elders were the same order, and that consequently, they had the same right to ordain. This was the doctrine of Luther, and his coadjutors in the Reformation, in the 16th. century, on the Continent of Europe. And from arch bishop Cranmer, in the reign of Henry the 8th down to bishop Bancroft, in the latter part of the reign of Elizabeth, no doctrine contrary to this, was introduced among the English Reformers. That bishops and elders are the same order, is a position, which we think, can be amply sustained by the New Testament. In acts 20c 17v we read the following. "And from Militus he sent to Ephesus and called the (presbuteroi, presbyters) Elders of the Church." When these elders were met in Conference at Militus, S. Paul delivered to them, a most solemn, and affecting address, in which at verse 28 he calls these Elders "overseers," Episcopous, bishops. On this place Dr. Clarke in his commentary remarks," that bishop and presbyter, or elder, were at this time the same order." If St. Paul called elders, bishops, he did so understandingly, he knew what he was about, and to assert that an Elder, is not a bishop, is beyond all doubt, to contradict an inspired apostle. Dr. Scott in his comment on the same passage says, "The same persons are in this chapter, called "Elders" or presbyters, and "overseers" or bishops; it must therefore be allowed, that there were not distinct orders of ministers in the church at that time. Again he says, when the Apostles founded a church, they appointed a pastor over it"—"These were at first called either "elders" or "overseers," that is, presbyters or bishops, indifferently; and no one had any direct authority over the rest." One was their master even Christ, and they were all equal among themselves.

In Titus 1c 5v St. Paul says to Titus—"For this cause left I thee in Crite, that thou shouldst set in order, the things that are wanting, and ordain Elders in every City, as I appointed thee." Not one mighty bishop over the hundred cities of Crite, to have charge of the ministers, who in turn were to have charge of the people, but "Elders in every city". i. e. simple pastors of the flock. Here Dr. Clarke remarks. "It appears that those who are called elders in this place, are the same as those termed bishops in ver 7, where it is said, "a bishop must be blameless as the steward of God." And Dr. Scott in his comment on this passage tells us, that these pastors ordained by Titus, were "called elders and bishops indiscriminately."—Dr. Macknight on this passage, makes the word Elder, not only to mean bishop, but deacon too, and says that "Jerome in his commentary on this passage"—affirms that in the first age, bishop and presbyter or elder, were one and the same." and the same father "infers that the pre-eminence of bishops, above presbyters, is owing more to the custom of the church, than to the command of Christ." "Master, which of us shall be the greatest?" was a question proposed by James and John, to Christ himself. He rebuked their ambition, and humbled their pride, but in after ages, the mystery of iniquity" did fearfully work, a most desolating apostacy took place, in the Christian church—It was brought about by the clergy.

In our text St. Peter is addressing, presbuteroi, Elders, or presbyters. This, as the whole scope of the passage will show, is the name of an order in the ministry. St. Peter calls himself, sum presbuteros, a fellow Elder. No hint is here given by Peter, that he was "the Prince of the apostles." Popery gave him this title in after years. He speaks of these Elders, "taking the oversigh." Episcopounies, "discharging the office of bishops or Superintendants"—the order, and the office, went together, in this and the other cases, above noticed. Here Dr. Clarke says in his commentary. "This is another proof, that bishop, and presbyter, were the same order, in the Apostolic times, though afterward they were made distinct." And Dr. Scott in his comment on this passage says." This must be allowed a decisive testimony, that no express distinction, between presbyters, and bishops, was, at the time when the apostle wrote, established in the church." And Dr. Macknight says, "Elder as a name of office, belonged indifferently to bishops, presidents, teachers, and deacons." This is testimony enough.

From the foregoing it would seem to be plain, that no pretended apostolic succession in the ministry, of a higher order than "Elder," can be traced back to St. Peter. Indeed we doubt the ability of any man living, to trace the (so called) apostalic succession. But could it be traced, when we get back to Peter, we find nothing but an Eldership. His elder was a bishop, and his bishop was an elder. Peter then, stood at the head of an eldership, and no bishops claiming to be of a higher order than elders, can legitimately claim succession from him.

But Papal writers tell us another story. According to them, Peter was the Rock, on which the church is built, had the keys of the kingdom of heaven, exclusively committed to his keeping, had a primacy over all the church, and was the prince of the Apostles. The fountain of all ministerial authority, and all divinity authorized ministers of religion are in the Apostolic succession coming down unbroken, through the Popes, they say, from Peter. In which succession bishops are an order, superior to elders. I state their view of this matter, in my own words. See the Pope in St. Peter's chair of authority at Rome. With an air of sovereign apostolical majesty he looks down on all beneath. He manages a great ecclesiastico politico despotic Hierarchy, and calls to his aid, officers the Galilean fisherman never heard of—Patriarchs, Exarchs, Metropolitans, archbishops, bishops, Chor-episcopoi, presbyters, deacons, subdeacons, acolythia &c. &c. and below all these may be seen, the people—low in the dust, ignorant, stupid, superstitious, priest-ridden, underfoot, and down troden. According to Bengelius, one of these pretended successors of St. Peter, held the following maxims—1st That the bishop of Rome alone, is universal bishop—2 That he alone, can depose bishops, and receive them again—3 That he alone has the power to make new laws in the church—4 That he alone ought to use the ensigns of Rayalty—5 That all Princes ought to kiss his foot—6 That the name of Pope, is the only name under heaven, and that this name alone, should be erected in the churches—7 That he has power to depose Emperors—8 That no general synod can be convened but by him—9 That no book is canonicial without his authority—10 That none upon earth, can repeal his sentence but he alone can repeal any sentence—11 That he is subject to no human judgment—12 That no power dare pass sentence on one, who appeals to the Pope—13. That all weighty causes every where, ought to be referred to him—14 That the Roman church never did, nor never can err—15 That the bishop of Rome, canonically ordained, is immediately made holy, by the merits of St. Peter—16 That he can absolve subjects from their oath of allegiance." Now, as the Popes claim infallibility, we suppose that all these pretended successors of St. Peter, are governed by the foregoing maxims of Pope Gregory, and that instead of being in the direct line of succession from St. Peter, they have led the church off from Christ, and Peter, into the wilderness of apostacy. If according to the New Testament, bishops and elders, are the same order; then no elder can need an additional ordination to make him a bishop: for being an elder, he is a bishop already, these two being the same order. The church of Rome therefore, and all those churches, that go with her, in giving elders an additional ordination to make bishops of them; have in this particular, if in nothing else, apostatised from the principles of the New Testament, and cannot claim succession from St. Peter, who was at the head of an Eldership: though they may claim from another Apostle. We will not deny their apostolic succession, provided they claim from the right apostle—We mean the apostle Judas.

Let us examine this matter a little further, in the light of New Testament prophecy, and we shall see the correctness of the view here taken, of the Papal succession. 1 Tim. 4c 1—6 v. "Now the spirit speaketh expressly, that in the latter times some shall depart from the faith, giving heed to seducing spirits, and doctrines of devils; speaking lies in hypocrisy, having their conscience seared with a hot iron; Forbidding to marry, and commanding to abstain from meats, which God hath created to be received with thanksgiving of them which believe and know the truth. For every creature of God is good, and nothing to be refused, if it be received with thanksgiving: For it is sanctified by the word of God and prayer. If thou put the brethren in remembrance of these things, thou shalt be a good minister of Jesus Christ. This is a plain self applying prophecy; in which all Protestants clearly see, the fearful apostacy of the church of Rome.

She is strongly marked by her prohibition of "marriage," to all her clergy, and her Nuns—and by her "commanding to abstain from meats, which God hath created to be received with thanksgiving &c. Here we see a Judas like apostacy; a rebellion against God's authority, brought in by "giving heed to seducing spirits, and doctrines of devils," and we are to "put the brethren in remembrance of these things," that we may be good ministers of Jesus Christ." He who would think us better "ministers of Jesus Christ," if we would cover up "these things." and let them be forgotten by the brethren, is in danger of going into the apostacy himself: if he is not already there.

Let us take another propecey from "2 Thes 2c 3—12v, Let no man deceive you by any means: for that day shall not come, except there come a falling away first, and that man of sin be revealed, the son of perdition; who opposeth and exalteth himself above all that is called God, or that is worshipped; so that he as God sitteth in the temple of God, shewing himself that he is God, Remember ye not, that when I was with you, I told you these things? And now ye know what withholdeth, that he might be revealed in his time. For the mystery of iniquity doth already work; only he who now letteth, will let, until he be taken out of the way. And then shall that wicked be revealed, whom the Lord shall consume with the spirit of his mouth, and shall destroy with the brightness of his coming: even him whose coming is after the working of Satan, with all power, and signs, and lying wonders, and with all deceiveableness of unrighteousness in them that perish; because they received not the love of the truth, that they might be saved. And for this cause God shall send them strong delusions, that they should believe a lie; that they all might be damned who believe not the truth, but had pleasure in unrighteousness."

Here, according to all Protestant commentators, we have a complete portrait drawn, by an inspired apostle, of a great corrupt, idolitrous, ecclesiastical despotism, which can only apply to the church of Rome, in its apostacy from Christ. Christ and his authority are set aside, that the Pope and his authority, in all its impious daring, may be set up, and acknowleded. In the light of these two propecies, we are now ready to show that the Papal Hierarchy, derives its succession from Judas, not from Peter.

1. "Judas by transgression fell" i. e. He apostatised. The Papal Hierarchy is described "as falling away"—a "departing from the faith," i. e. an apostacy—2 Judas is spoken of as "having a devil" The "coming" of the Papacy is said to be "after the working of Satan"—led on by seducing spirits, and doctrines of devils."—3 In the apostacy of Judas, there was enormous wickedness. He owned himself to "have sined exceedingly." The Papacy is emphatically called "the man of sin" "that wicked," that was to be revealed"—4 Judas was a lying, deceitful, hypocrite. He "kissed" and "betrayed" the Son of God. The Papacy is representated as "speaking lies in hypocrisy" as doing "lying wonders," as acting "with all deceiveableness of unrighteousness." 5 Judas in 3 years and 6 months, might have received the truth from Christ and been saved, but did not. The Papacy did not know its day of visitation "received not the love of the truth, that they might be saved." 6. Judas was under a strong delusion, loved lucre even unto covetousness, "which is idolatry" sold Christ for money, and was "lost." On the Papacy "God shall send strong delusions, that they should believe a lie, that they all might be damned, who have pleasure in unrighteousness." 7 Judas was called "the son of perdition." "Those that thou gavest me, I have kept, and none of them is lost, but the son of perdition." John 17c. 12v. The Papacy is called "the son of perdition." These points are enough, to fix the resemblance beyond dispute. We do not affirm that Judas had a 3d ordination, but he stood at the head of the apostacy, which apostacy has a 3d ordination, and deserves to be named after Judas, "the son of perdition," because for worldly gain, and worldly glory, it has betrayed Christ and his cause, Judas did not live to carry out his plans. Had he lived, in all probability, a 3rd ordination might have been introduced by him, and order upon order, until he had erected a splendid Hierarchy: opposing and exalting himself, above all that is called God, or that is worshipped, so that he as God," would have been found, "sitting in the temple of God, showing himself that he is God." What he did not live to do, the Popes have done for him, His plans have been more than accomplished, by his successors, in the grand apostacy. The Papal church denies salvation to all who are not in her communion, i, e. in the apostacy; and she allows none to be true ministers, unless they be in the succession, i. e. in the apostacy. And she has a daughter in this country, with high, and low church parties &c. The high church party, like the Roman mother, allows none to be true ministers, who do not belong to the secession, i. e. to the apostacy. To the pulpits of this party, ministers, not in the succession i. e. in the apostacy, have no access, no matter how pious and talented they may be. And she has a grand daughter who denies the succession, as being a fable, and holds that bishops and elders according to the New Testament, are the same order; yet she practices, most inconsistently, a 3rd ordination, when she makes an elder a bishop. It is said that once upon a time, one of her favored sons, on one day was made a deacon; and so we may suppose, was in the succession with St. Stephen. The next day he was made an Elder; and so we may suppose, was in the succession with St. Peter. And on the 3d day he was ordained a bishop, and so we may suppose, (in this particular) passed over to the apostacy, and became a successor to Judas. The history of this transaction now lies before me, and I am heartily sorry that it ever took place. Let this be settled in our minds, that bishops, and Elders, are the same order, according to the New Testament. And that when a man is an elder, it is going into the apostacy, to give him another ordination, to make a bishop of him.

To conclude this part of our discourse, the character of a true christian bishop may be given from the writings of St. Paul. "This is a true saying, if a man desire the office of a bishop, he desireth a good work. A bishop then must be blameless, the husband of one wife, vigilant, sober, of good behaviour, given to hospitality, apt to teach; not given to wine, no striker, not greedy of filthy lucre; but patient, not a brawler, not covetous; one that ruleth well his own house, having his children in subjection with all gravity; (For if a man know not how to rule his own house, how shall he take care of the church of God?) Not a novice, lest being lifted up with pride, he fall into the condemnation of the devil. Moreover he must have a good report of them which are without; lest he fall into reproach and the snare of the devil. 1. Tim. 3c. 1-7v such an one was an elder by order, and a bishop, overseer, or superintendent, by office, had charge of the flock, rather than of preachers, had a family, lived in the midst of his people, was acquainted with them all, taught them all, the doctrines, experience, and practice, of christianity; and illustrated and enforced, the instructions given, by the holiness of his own life, and conversation.

[CONCLUDED.]

The first two days of our passage were beautiful, with a pleasant and gentle breeze, and a smooth sea. Afterwards the winds increased, the waves lifted their spray-covered heads, and dashed against our vessel, making her tremble like an aspen leaf. That dread of a sea-voyage, seasickness, now commenced its ravages. The sorrows of parting had been forgotten or buried amid other absorbing scenes,—countenances, grief-clad, had assumed bright and cheering expressions; and the passengers were busily engaged in making the acquaintance of each other, gazing and wandering at the vessel as she "walked the waters like a thing of life," and all prophecying a speedy and pleasant voyage. But now, what a change came over them? Countenances became pale, eyes glassy, a peculiar expression lurked in the corners of the mouth, and the lip upturned with contemptuous scorn at every thing, even savory and nice in its appearance; and the whole man fifty degrees below "smiling point." Formerly they greeted each other with a happy smile, a cordial "good morning," an anxious inquiry into their health, with many other complimentary expressions. But now, to enquire of a "pale countenance" how he "felt," was to expose yourself to his contemptuous indifference: he neither cared for you, nor any body, nor any thing else! his whole being had become absorbed in one great consideration—how to get relief from the incubus that weighed so heavily upon his——stomach? Had you taken a survey of the inmates of the various berths at this period, upper and lower, heard the many piteous exclamations that escaped therefrom, saw the number of heads projecting listlessly or engagedly over their side-boards. You would certainly not have envied their position, but especially those of the lower tier. The winds still increased in strength, the sea rolled higher its waves, and the motion of our vessel became more like the evolutions of a drunken man. Passengers, from the want of experience, generally neglect securing their various articles of baggage at the commencement of the voyage. It was the case here; and at this juncture a large hoary-headed wave taking a notion to view things on board and things below, lifted himself over the side of our vessel and rushed down the hatchway in a perfect torrent! The children screamed, the old people cried out for mercy, and thought their end had come, while the waters rolling and dashing from side to side with the motion of our vessell, sent adrift boxes, and barrels, and chests, and bottles, and water jugs, and cooking utensils and other vessels not to be mentioned here, which had hitherto been quite orderly and respectful in their demeanor; breaking, and scattering, and mingling their contents together in no enviable condition. Many of the passengers were wise enough to remain still in their berths, but others, not at all pleased with this "wreck of matter and crash" of things, leaped out amid the floating materials, and in their turn were sent adrift amid the screams and laughter of the more fortunate voyagers.

Gradually our emigrants recovered their health; and with their health, their appetites. You have been to Camp Meeting, Mr. Editor, and have, no doubt, seen the extensive demolition of earthly comforts there; and the gormandizing practices of some professed good people who go especially for spiritual benefits: but this is a mere shadow, in comparison to that witnessed after sea-sickness. Frying, and stewing, and steaming, and baking, and boiling, and broiling, from morning till night. Your olfactory cannot escape at any time the perfume of some curious combination of food. Every body turns cook for the company, or cook in particular, and becomes deeply interested in culinary preparations. The fire-place, about four feet in length, is crowded from early dawn to the extinguishment of the fire—seven o'clock, P. M. As soon as the faint glimmerings of day begin to pour through the small twelve inch diametred pane, which at all times is barely sufficient to render "darkness visible," there commences a busy hum of voices, a rattling of sauce pans and kettles, and a general rush to the fire. The gallery is crowded and wedged, each one boldly claiming priority of right that results in strife and angry altercations, and the complete overthrow of some poor Irishman's kettle of "stirabout" or porridge into a neighboring pan of fried ham and eggs, and the extinguishment of the fire. But, says the old adage, 'there is many a slip between the cup and the lip,' the truth of which is fully exemplified at sea. With what care many a passenger has gone and prepared his meals during a fine sea, and arranged it nicely on the top of a barrell or box, and gathered around with self satisfaction and pleasure, when a sudden lurch of the vessel would send dinner and dishes to the opposite side of the ship, and the disappointed passenger sprawling upon the deck! Sometimes eating becomes a matter of desperation. How often have I seen them clinging to their berths, or to some other support, with the energy of a despairing man, with a porrenger or tin cup between their knees and a dish resting against their feet, availing themselves of their contents at every convenient opportunity.

During the day, weather permiting, most of the passengers were generally upon the upper deck amusing themselves with the varied scenes of the ocean, or gazing at the sailors in the discharge of their duty. At night, they would pass away the time according to their varied inclinations. Here is a pious and intelligent Irish family, with two or three other passengers, engaged in singing religious hymns; while at the distance of not more than four or five steps, is to be seen, gathered around an old box lashed to a pillar, a company of men in angry strife over a game at cards. A little farther, an old Irishman, who boasts of his knowledge in military tactics, and as being engaged in the wars of Napoleon, is tormenting the ears of others with the voice of an old cracked flute, and the sea being unusually calm, two or three couple of young sprigs are tripping it merrily around, on what in polite parlance, is termed "the light fantastic toe." In another direction, perched on barrels and boxes, a group is discussing the great blessings likely to result from their emigration across the blue waters to "swate Amiriky," or listening to some marvelous relation of shipwreck drear and the perils of an ocean voyage; whilst to cap the scene, an Irish amazonian is beating most unmercifully her child, amid the screaming entreties of the unfortunate girl.

Those who have never looked upon European scenes of poverty can form no adequate conception of its misery and extent. On ship we had a partial manifestation of its wretchedness, in many who had commenced the voyage, uncertain in its duration with but one change of linen, and without any other provisions but a small quantity of oat-meal and potatoes, and many without the addition of the latter. And not only this, but some were without a solitary shilling in the world, about to land on a foreign shore, in a strange city, where they knew no earthly acquaintance. Had you seen them shivering in their half-clad garments as they approached the American coast, and looked upon their sorrowful and forlorn countenances, your heart would have bled with sorrow. "An' faith," said a daughter of the Emerald Isle, shivering from the chilling influence of a fiercing North-wester; "An' faith, had I'ave known that Amiriky was so could a country, I'd niver 'av left swate Ireland, at all, at all!" Great Britain has endeavored to meliorate their condition, by compelling the owners of vessels leaving the ports of the United Kingdom, to furnish each passenger a small amount of bread stuffs per day; but the designs of this humane and benevolent law are partially frustrated by the knavery and inhumanity of ship-owners, or ship captains, who through cupidity, refuse to serve out the full allowance, or lay in the provisions of such very inferior quality, that the stern necessity of want alone compels them to accept of the bounty.

During our passage, we had the sorrowful duty to discharge of committing to the unknown depths of the ocean, the remains of an unfortunate youth, a cripple from his birth. A burial at any time, and every where, affords matter for serious meditation: but none more solemn than one at sea; and when you hear the splash of the corpse in the dark rolling waters beneath, and reflect on the probable event that awaits it, your nature, startled and horrow struck, turns away with an involuntary shudder. There is no pomps nor earthly parade, no solemn peals of the death bell, nor the tramp of the mourners in the streets, nor surpliced priest or funeral vaults:—and yet there is a solemn grandeur in ocean burial that forces itself on the heart, and humbles the beholder. Previous to interment the sailors took the corpse and sewed it up in a piece of canvass to which they attached some ponderous weight; it was then brought upon deck and placed on an appropriate length of board, where it remained until the ritual at sea was repeated over it, when the plank being gently elevated at one end, the corpse glided down into the dark depths below, to become food for the fishes, or to lie deep in ocean's caves, where the sea nymphs shall weave its shroud; and the moon and the stars shall watch the sleeping dust, and the wild winds of the ocean shall moan a slow, sad, requiem over the sleeper's grave, until the trumpet of the resurrection shall roll the sea from its foundation and call for the restoration of the trust committed to its keeping. Hail! glorious morn! P.

NO. X.

La Point, Wiskonsin Territory. August 15, 1846.

My Dear Sir:—Since I have been occupied for the last day or two in observing the rites and ceremonies practised among the Indians of the North-West; and since, as a nation once great and powerful, their race is nearly run, and the places that now know them will soon know them no more forever, I hope you will not deem it uninteresting if I devote this letter to describing those ceremonies. Here are assembled between 1500 and 2000 Indians, for the purpose of receiving their bounty from the Government: they come from the head waters of the Mississippi, from the lakes that feed the Menomonee and Ontonagon, from Vieux Desert, L'Ance, and the Sault. Here are assembled their chiefs, ther medicine-men, and their warriors, their squaws and papooses. Lodges and canoes are on every side, and the drum and the rattling gourd are heard, night and day, accompanying some wild and uncouth song. —Faces painted black, red and blue, greet you at every turn. Figures tall and athletic, and nearly destitute of clothing, stride before you, presenting altogether, a strange contrast with what we see in civilized life.

They are the remnants of the Chippeways, or Ojibbeways, as they call themselves,—a race known from the earliest settlement of the country, as fierce, warlike, and indomitable. For two hundred years they have warred, with deadly enmity, against the Sioux, another powerful tribe, whom they have gradually dispossessed of their territory, and driven west of the Mississippi. Here is one warrior who boasts that, with his own hand, he has killed sixty Sioux. Others bear upon their forms the scars of many a fierce affray. The Sioux!—the Sioux! It is the very bug-bear they use to frighten their children. It forms the great theme of their eloquence, and when they kill their dog and dance around them reeking in blood and gasping for breath, they imagine their foe prostrate before them in a like condition.

The day has been celebrated by a series of dances and conjurations. First was a grand war-dance. The chosen warriors assembled their forces painted with all the colors of the rainbow, with long stripes of red extending down their backs. Their heads were decorated with the feathers of the eagle, and from their necks were suspended the claws of the bear. Two or three cymbals, or drums, accompanied by the voice, composed the orchestra. From them a wild cry arose, which was answered by the warriors with a whoop. Then commenced the dance: at first they moved not from their tracks, and yet every muscle was endowed with motion; but gradually their evolutions became more complicated. Then came the speech from the chief, which, so far as I could gather, breathed defiance and enmity to the Sioux, and was answered by a war-whoop. They then repaired with waving branches to the grave of a companion whom they had buried the preceding day. A dish of cakes had been placed upon his grave, which remained untouched. The wail was sent up, the drums beat, and the dance commenced. At intervals, the principal warriors delivered speeches eulogizing the virtues of the deceased which were responded to by the band. As they walked around the grave, each drew a feather from his cap and placed it at the head of the grave.—The cakes were then distributed among the warriors, who seated themselves around, and then the calumet passed from hand to hand.

In the afternoon, a medicine-dance, was held. Eight conjurers, or medicine-men, headed the ceremony. This was to drive out the evil Manitou which had taken possession of many of the tribe. They placed a girl, evidently in the last stages of consumption, upon a blanket, who was supported by her mother. Then the medicine-men arose and marched in single file to the head of the lodge. Invocations were uttered and drums beaten, to scare away the Manitou. At interval, they marched around the invalid, shaking their enchanted medicines over her head. Blue paint was next placed before her, and each conjurer dipped the ends of his fingers in, and anointed the sufferer.—Next, having moved around her several times, after severe retching, each disgorged a shell which was arranged by the girl as it fell on the blanket. These incantations were interspersed with cries and unearthly noises, mingled with the beat of drums and the rattling of gourds. Upon the sufferer, they seemed to produce neither joy nor depression. There she sat gazing at vacuity, and apparently insensible to what was passing around her. I watched these mummeries for more than an hour and seeing no prospect of an end, left, reflecting on the weakness and abjectness of human nature.

In the Indian I have seen much to admire, but more to condemn. In his form, in the development of limbs and sinews, the sculptor or the painter would find a faultless model of a man. In traversing the trackless wilderness, he will follow a given course with unerring instinct, and notice traces for which you search in va in. The displacement of a spere of grass, or the least bending of a bush, escapes not his vigilent eye. But these are traits that belong to the animal rather than the intellectual. As a man, he combines the vices of civilization and barbarism, almost without any redeeming virtues. He lives upon your bounty without gratitude, he betrays your trust without compunction. Indolent and improvident of the future, he exerts himself only when pinched by hunger; and, so soon as that is appeased, he relapses into his former state. The calumet, may circulate, but the plighted faith will be violated without a pretext, when it suits his convenience to do so. He wars not in open combat, hand to hand, but skulks and deals his blows like an asssin. The squaws enjoy no social equality, but are treated like beasts of burden. They construct the lodges, cut the wood, and perform all of the menial offices.—Attempts have been made, and are making, to elevate them to the rank and condition of intellectual beings, but where one is elevated hundreds are debased still deeper in degradation, by contact with civilization. Novelists have invested them with many magnanimous qualities, but it needs very litle association with them to dispel the delusion. There are individual instances of lofty heroism, of generous devotion, and of faith preserved; but they prove not the general rule. F.

ODE.

BY WILLIAM PITT PALMER.

O! soft sleep the hills on their sunny repose,
In the lands of the south where the vine gaily grows;
And blithesome the hearts of the vintagers be,
In the grape-purpled vales in the isles of the sea.

And bright is the wine when its splendor is poured,
Mid silver and gold round the festival board,
Where the magic of music awakes from its power,
And Wit glides the fast-failing sands of the hour.

Yet lift not the wine-cup—tho' Pleasure may swim
Mid the bubbles that flash round its roseate brim,
Yet dark in the depths of its fountain below,
Lurk the sirens that lure to the vortex of wo.

They have led the gay spirit of Childhood astray,
While it dreamed not of wilds on its radiant way;
And the soft cheek of Beauty they've paled in its bloom,
And quenched her bright eyes in the damps of the tomb.

They have torn the live wreath from the brow of the brave,
And changed his proud heart to the heart of a slave;
And e'en the fair fame of the good and the just,
With the grey hairs of age, they have trod to the dust.

Then lift not the wine-cup!—though Pleasure may swim,
Like an angel of light round its roseate brim,
Yet dark in the depths of its fountains below,
Lurk the Spirits that lure to the vortex of wo!

Intemperance, Insanity, Idiocy, Death.

In an appeal in the New York Tribune to the people of that state, awakening them to the dreadful evils of intemperance, we find the following:

From the bills of mortality which have been kept in several places, it appears that in a single year twenty deaths were occasioned in Portsmouth, N. H., by the use of intoxicating liqours; twenty-one in Salem, thirty-one in New Haven, Ct.; thirty in New Brunswick, N. J., and seven hundred in Philadelphia, Pa.; (and more than one thousand in New York.)

By examinations made, it has been shown that of eight hundred and eighty maniacs in our asyums, four hundred owe the loss of their reason to he use of intoxicating liquors; that seventeen hundred out of nineteen hundred paupers in our poor-houses owe their degradation to the same cause; that forty out of forty-four murders were committed under the influence of alcoholic stimulants; that sixty-seven out of seventy-seved found dead, died of drunkenness; and that four hundred out of six hundred and ninety juvenile delinquents either drank themselves or belonged to families that drank.

"I have shown," says the indefatigable agent. Samuel Chapman, Esq., who visited all the prisons and poor-houses of our State: "I haveshown beyond the powers of contradiction, that more than three-fourths of all the pauperism is occasioned by intemperance, and that more than five-sixths of all those committed for crime are themselves intemperate!! In no poor-house that I have visited have I failed to find the wife or the widow, or the children of the drunkard. In one out of one hundred and ninety persons relieved the preceeding year were nineteen wives of drunken husbands and seventy-one children of drunken parents; and in almost every jail were husbands confined for whipping their wives, or otherwise abusing their households.

"The annual destruction of human life in these United States occasioned by the use of strong drink, is said to be at least fifty thousand."

Mr. Chapman found that seventy per cent. of the deaths of male adults in one large town which he visited were occasioned by the use of intoxicating liquors; and the physician of another have given it as their opinion, that one-half of the men over eighteen years of age in that city, were brought prematurely to their end in the same manner.

Ministers' Department.

Christ, the Minister's Example.

The Saviour himself first published his own gospel to man. "Then preached he the gospel of the kingdom in their villages and cities." As a preacher of the everlasting Gospel, Christ is a model and perfect example of every Christian minister; and not only should this class of men in the study of the Scriptures sit at the Master's feet and learn his words, but should gaze upon the portraiture which the inspired penman have drawn of Christ as a preacher in the great congregation, and seek to be like him in the several respects in which he stands out as a glorious model of just and effective preaching.

1. In the subject matter of his preaching he is our example. The subject of Christ's sermons was always some doctrine or duty of consequence. The sermon on the mount contains more true divinity; more subjects important for men to know, than the entire system of all other teachers who had come before him. At one time Christ discourses on the necessity of repentance, regeneration, faith, and a new life; at another, on the character of God and man's duty to love him supremely, and his fellow man as himself; again, the worth of the soul, on his own suffrings, on heaven and hell, time and eternity. Our Saviour opened not his mouth, but the subject matter of his discourse is of the most solemn and important kind. No dry moral essays, no low disputations, no quibblings in the falsely called philosophy of the schools. Every subject partakes of the solemnity of eternity; and he speaks as a messenger from the eternal God, to men. Who that gazes upon the Divine model, can introduce light and trifling subjects into his solemn ministrations, and dwell on nonessentials instead of the bread of life for souls?

2. In the manner of preaching and in style, Christ is the minister's example.—We have supposed there was always something in the manner of Christ solemn and striking; that while he was dispassionate and calm, there was an earnestness and an unction, which led his hearers to feel that preacher felt what he proclaimed. In manner impressive, solemn, inspiring respect for himself and especially for his peaching, Christ could never be an example in subject or manner, to such preaching as should excite in his hearers the vain and risible feelings of our nature. He who never laughed would not preach to make men smile. And in style Christ is our pattern. Always simple and plain, yet elegant and often sublime, he always spoke in such language, and employed such metephors and illustrious as his hearers could easily comprehend. And this is the style of the best ministers; and is to be sought for, rather than a pedanic and studiously learned stye. The great mass of your congregations are to be instructed, not the fancy of the few gratified.

3. In boldness and fidelity, Christ is a model for every Christian minister. The gentle Say-four, whose tenderness would not break the bruised reed, knew well when to proclaim the truth in words that burn. Sins were attacked, and the guilty addressed with 'ye generation of vipers, how can you escape the damnation of hell." He laid the axe at the root of the tree, and did not content himself or think to fulfil his ministry by gently lopping off the branches, and leaving the tree of sinfulness yet standing. No matter whether in high or low places, sin was faithfully rebuked, and no matter whether Pharisee or a Puplican, "thou art the man," thundered out upon the guilty conscience. So it was with the Apostles; so should it be with the faithful minister of the Cross now. Now what a lesson should the fidelity of their Master impart to time-serving ministers, who dumb on the great sins of the time, cringe and quail before an erroneous public opinion, succomb to ask certain men in the society what they shall preach, and fear to come boldly to rebuke sin, as the messengers of God to men. Not so do we learn of Christ.

4. In holiness of life, and in consecration to his work, is Christ an to example ministers. In holiness and consecration, more than in sparkling talents, lies the success of the ministry of reconciliation. Men of much fervent prayer, men of deep-toned piety, are men who have been wise to win souls, and the most successful embassadors of Jesus Christ. My brethren, here we have Christ our glorious example; and in no other feature does he more strikingly become our example, and in no other respect is it more important that we copy out the example than in his holiness and consecration to his work. Our success must depend essentially on this one point. Let us rise higher in a holy life, and allow nothing to interfere with our consecrations to the ministry, and then we shall not run nor labor in vain.—Morning Sun.

AN AGED VETERAN.

The Rev. James Quinn was present at the late Ohio Conference, M. E. Church, in better health than usual. "When it was inquired, by the president, whether there was any thing against brother Quinn, he arose, before retiring, and said in substance as follows:"

"Mr. President: For forty and six years I have heard it said by my brethren, "Nothing against James Quinn;' yet I have some things against myself. I am a minister of the eighteenth century, ordained by the venerable Asbury. I spent two years of my itinerant life in the Baltimore conference: one year on the shores of Lake Erie. On learning my name was down to one of the Baltimore city stations, I petitioned to be sent west. It was granted; and in 1804, I found myself in the Hocking valley. The first conference I ever attended was held in October 2d, 1805, at Anthony Houston's, Scott county, Ky.; and I see here but one man that I met there. Old brother Jacob Young is that one. When I cast my eyes over the conference, I see the sons and the grandsons of those who bade me welcome to their cabins more than forty years ago. I am now a worn out preacher; yet I relish my food, sleep as sweetly as an infant, have no local disease, and can preach occasionally thirty or forty minutes, quite loud enough to be distinctly heard. I have peace with God, and a good hope through grace of everlasting life. I have the sympathies of my brethren. They almost burden me with their kindness. They are all ready to help the old man. I love the brethren. I love to meet them in conference; and if alive and able, will go next year to conference. And if I go to heaven, I do not know but I will be permitted to satisfy my anxiety by looking from paradise upon you at your annual comings together. I have gotten back. Mr. President, to the place of beginning. I went to the class-leader, where my family meets, and requested him to put my name on the class book. I would attend when able. He did so. The young preachers seemed a little embarrassed in meeting me in class, seeing my name on the class book. I said, "Come on, brother; I love to have my brethren talk to me of Jesus and his dying love." I live in the corner of three presiding elders' disiricts. I go to brother Wright's quarterly meetings, and sometimes he invites me to preach; and I go to brother Simmons', and brother Connell's quarterly meetings. But I shall soon be done with my earthly pilgrimage, and rest in my father's house above. Pray for the old man, that he may meet you all in heaven."—W. C. Adv.

THE ECCENTRIC LORENZO DOW.

In 1807, at a camp meeting held at Niskeuna, between Troy and Schenectady, I first became acquainted with the eccentric Lorenzo Dow, who was at that time, I think, in possession of a truly Christian spirit, though extremely odd and exceptionable in his manners. He seemed to possess the ability or art to transform himself into almost any and every human character. He could become ludicrious in the extreme—could satirize, or speak ironically to admiration, and yet I have heard him deliver some of the most solemn discourses to which I ever listened. At this camp-meeting, he had given offence to some of the multitude, by his cutting remarks, and a number had associated together without the camp, and formed a company of from fifty to one hundred, and chosen a leader or captain, and having armed themselves with clubs, were preparing to march into the camp ground, and take Dow by force, and carry him off and punish him at their leisure, for the insult which he had offered them.

Dow got information of their movements, before they were ready to enter the camp, and determined to go out and meet them. Several friends strove to dissuade him from this, but he had made up his mind, and taking Peggy; his wife, by the arm, he immediately started for the road, which was some fifty rods distant. I immediately followed, to see what would be the result. On coming to the highway, where were hundreds, perhaps thousands of people, he asked leave of the owner of a huckster's establishment to stand in the door of his shanty, and address the people. But the occupant objected, saying that should he do it, his building would be torn down at once, and his goods destroyed. He then made application to one or two others who had similar establishments, but being refused by all, he went to a stump where a large oak tree had lately been fallen, and there taking his stand, commenced addressing the multitude, who immediately gathered around him. Presently, the hostile band were seen approaching and pressing through the crowd, preceded by their leader, a large and lion-like looking man, whose mouth, like that of many who followed him, was full of cursing and bitterness. They pressed on until the leader stood directly facing Dow, at the foot of the stump.

He there paused for a moment or two awhile the speaker looked him full in the face and continued his discourse, Some one of the band from the rear, called out with an oath, "Why don't you knock him down?" "Pull him down, knock him down!" But the speaker continued, and the leader stood silent and almost motionless, when some who were in the rear attempted to press through to the stump, being impatient at the delay of their leader. But on their coming up, and making an attempt to pull Dow from the stump, the leader called out, "Let him alone until he has finished his speech!" But many voices replied, with awful oaths, that they would have him down at once. Their captain then raising his club, cried out in a threatening voice, "Let him alone until he has finished his discourse," and added, "I will knock down the first man that attempts to disturb him until he has finished his speech." This brought them to a full stand; for I suppose they knew the man whom they had chosen as their leader, and did not think it safe to provoke his wrath against themselves.

Dow went on with a solemn address, for the space of thirty minutes or more, and when he had closed, this captain or leader offered him his hand to assist him down from the stump, and asked him in a very civil manner, where he wished to go. Dow informed him that his design was to return to the camp ground. The other replied, "here are men that will injure you if they can, but if you will accept my services I will not leave you until I see you safe among your friends." Dow thanked him, and he then called out, "who of you will unite with me to see this man safe among his friends on the camp ground?" Some twenty voices responded, "I will." Dow then took his wife by the arm, and these volunteers formed around them, and in that order, they marched to the ground the leader having notified all, that if any one offered any violence, it would be at his peril.

Western Sketches.

The New States---Iowa and Wisconsin.

The following article on the relative position and extent of the new States of Iowa and Wisconsin—for the admission of which into the Union, Acts were passed at the late session of Congress.—is from the pen of Mr. Darby, the Geographer, and will be read with interest:

The great region of the U. States territory to the northwestward of Illinois and Missouri, westward of Lakes Michigan and Superior, and eastward of Missouri river, comprises, in round numbers, 267,000 square statute miles.

Of this large space, about 20 000 square miles between Lakes Michigan and Superior, form the northwestern part of the State of Michigan. Exclusive of this fraction extending from the northern boundary of Illinois, in a northwesterly direction of nearly six hundred miles, spreads east of the Mississippi river a space of 86 000 square miles, and from the southwestern part of which has been formed the new State of Wisconsin. The whole extent, including the part added to Michigan, comprising 106 000 square miles, was formerly spoken of under the general name of Wisconsin, and was the extreme northwestern section of the original territory of the United States, according to the treaty of 1782.

Between the rivers Mississippi and Missouri, and northeastern from Illinois extending 700 miles, with a mean width of 230, and embracing an area of 161,000 square miles, spreads the region from the southwestern part of which has been formed the state of Iowa, which we now proceed to delineate separately and specifically.

Wisconsin, as limited by act of Congress, extends from 42½° to 47¼° north latitude, and in longitude from 10° to 15° 5½′ west of Washington. The extreme diagonal length from the southeastern angle, on Lake Michigan, to the northwestern, west of Lake Superior, being about 370 miles, and the area so near 48,000 square miles that we may assume that amount, the mean width will be one hundred and thirty miles. This State has a very extended outline in proportion to territorial surface. Measured by general distances of fifty miles, the front on Lake Michigan and Green Bay exceeds three hundred miles, on the western extremity of Lake Superior one hundred miles, and two hundred along the Mississippi river; the whole outline exceeds by this general method one thousand miles.

A direct air line from Washington to the southeast angle of Wisconsin bears north 68 degrees west 670 statute miles, excluding small fractions of angles and miles.

Iowa, as limited by act of Congress, (except on the southern unsettled boundary between it and Missouri, which of course, we cannot precisely specify) extends from north latitude 40° 40′ to 43° 30′, and in longitude from 13° 10′ to 19° 30′ west of Washington. In direct contrast with Wisconsin, Iowa is amongst the most compact States in the Union. The breadth from south to north, when the southern boundary is decided, will not, it is probable, differ much from two hundred miles. The mean length from east to west, or between the Mississippi and Missouri rivers, is about 280 miles; area 56 000 square miles. By the general method adopted in regard to Wisconsin, the entire outline of Iowa amounts to only about 900 miles, though in area the latter exceeds the former 8 000 square miles. Of its outline Iowa is bounded, according to the mode of measurement stated, 250 miles on the Mississippi and 170 on the Missouri.

A direct air line from Washington to the southeastern angle of Iowa, at the mouth of the Des Moines river, bears north 82½ west; distance 780 miles.

The aggregate area of the two States amounts to 104,000, and mean extent 52 000 square miles; and the subjoined table will enable the reader to appreciate the relative extent of the whole organized territory of the Union, with the separative sections, and in particular the comparative extent of the two new and recent acquisitions:

Tabular View of the respective organized sections of the United States.

	Extent in sq. ms.		Extent in sq. ms.
Maine,	32,000	Alabama	50,800
N. Hamshire,	9,259	Mississippi,	45,000
Vermont,	10,200	Louisiana,	48,300
Massachusetts,	7,800	Columbia,	100
Rhode Island,	1,760	Arkansas,	56,000
Connecticut,	4,670	Tennessee,	44,000
New York,	46,000	Kentucky,	38,000
New Jersey,	6,850	Missouri,	50,000
Pennsylvania,	44,000	Illinois,	50,000
Delaware,	2,070	Indiana,	36,000
Maryland,	10,800	Ohio,	39,000

S. Carolina,	30,000	Iowa,	56,000
Georgia,	58,000	Texas,	200,000
Florida,	57,000
			1,261,000

From the preceeding table, given in round numbers, we find that the aggregate area of the organized sections of the United States embraces 1.261,000 square miles, and that of Iowa and Wisconsin combined amount to nearly the twelfth of the whole surface. The actual population of the United States does not now, say September, 1846, differ much from twenty-one millions—an aggregate of seventeen to the square mile. If, therefore, the two new States were peopled equal to the mean of the Union, they would possess together, 1,768 000 inhabitants, or rather less than Ohio does probably already possess.

In the ordinary process of observation, mankind pays more attention to the noise the stream of time makes as it flows on, than to the effect it produces.

A few months since I had put into my hand, by a friend, a volume, from which I extracted the subjoined matter, precious as a document on the progressive population of Anglo North American. This volume was the July number of the London General Magazine of Arts and Sciences, 1755.

"TABLE AND REMARKS."

Nova Scotia,	5,000	Pennsylvania,	250,000

New York,	90,000	Georgia,	6,000
New Jersey,	50,000
Total population 1755,			906,000

The following remarks are annexed to the table:

"The above account is not a vague calculation, but is taken from such census enumerations and muster rolls as are undoubted; but as the same have been taken at different times, and none within seven years past, there is a suitable allowance made for the increase, and for which, in the above account, is made various deductions, so that it is seventy thousand less than what are esteemed the best computations."

This document, as accurate as the nature and positions of things would then admit, we may regard as giving us a near approach to the aggregate Anglo-Saxon population of North America about a century past. WILLIAM DARBY.

WESTERN RECORDER.

PUTNAM, OHIO.

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 17, 1846.

☞ A slight accident happening to our press occasioned the delay of our paper to-day. Our friends will please excuse us, and we will endeavor to be forthcoming in due season hereafter.

SECOND ADVENT. "THE DAY-STAR." We never felt disposed to treat with ridicule what has been called the Millerite theory. The question of the speedy coming of our Lord, we ever thought too grave a matter to be thus treated. And though we were satisfied that the "Second Advent Believers," (as they have called themselves,) greatly erred in taking positive ground, in reference to the coming of the Lord within a definite period of time, yet it did seem to us that we should as greatly err, and be equally presumptuous, did we undertake to say that his coming would not occur within that limit of time. Should we quote to the adherents of Mr. Miller "ye know not the day, nor the hour when the Son of Man cometh,' with equal cegency might they demand of us, how know we the day, or the hour, or the year when he cometh not.

We have never for a moment doubted the sincerty, or the piety of those who chiefly led on the noted controversy and excitement of 1843. And we hesitate not to say that some of their arguments and chronological calculations, were quite plausible. And we apprehend that the discussion has produced one salutary result in inducing with some at least, a diligent research and investigation of the sacred scriptures, in connection with History and chronology, to ascertain, "whether these things are so."

The year of the expected "advent" (1843) having passed, leaving "all things continuing as they were," some relinquished the theory as erroneous. But the chief part of the "Believers" continued steadfastly to insist that the "day of the Lord" was "at the door." They taught that there was now a "tarrying time," that the prophetic periods were fulfilled, and that now the grand consummation was with the Lord. We believe that this is still the position of some at the East, and a few at the West. But the "Believers" have become divided amongst themselves, some patiently waiting, whilst others have ceased to pray or labor for the conversion of the wicked, and adopted the literal reading of the curses in the Book of Psalms! "Of thy mercy cut off mine enemies, O God, and let the wicked be no more." &c. In Cincinnati, their large tabernacle, (80 feet square) as we are informed, has lately been given up to other purposes than divine service. Mr. E. Jacobs, who for some time conducted the "Midnight Cry" a weekly publication at Cincinnati, and who was once a zealous minister of the M. P. Church, has left there, and identified himself with the Shakers! He has lately been spending some time in New England, laboring to bring over his "Advent" brethren to be with him in this "new resurrection."

We have been led to refer to this matter by the politeness of a frend at Cincinnati who has furnished us with a number of a small paper published by Mr. Jacobs, called "The Day Star." It purports to be issued as often as occasion requires, at Lebanon, Ohio," near to which is the Union (Shaker) village. We have read through the number furnished us, and have retained it as a curiosity. The churches are still denounced as "Babylon," and all true believers are called upon to relinquish the conjugal relation, as the true method of self denial of all worldly lusts, and of "following Christ in the regeneration" from all the works of the flesh. For the information of our readers, we give the following extract from G. W. Peavy, of Worcester, Mass. a writer in the "Day-Star." It will be seen that this portion of the Advent brethren have changed their views in reference to the visible manifestation, at Christ's Coming, and taken the ground (Shaker like) that his coming has already taken place.

"But, says one, is this the inheritance that we have been so long in search of? Is the second coming of Christ to end merely in Shakerism? It will doubtless be admitted by all, that one important object for which we have been looking, is to be made like Christ. "It doth not yet appear what we shall be; but we know that when he shall appear, we shall be like him, for we shall see him as he is." True, we did not apprehend the way in which this work was to be accomplished: hence the following verse was not understood, and carried into practice, as some of us now know it must be: "And every man that hath this hope in him, purifieth himself, even as he is pure." Well, when we become pure as he is, then we shall be like him, and can see him as he is. Our former difficulty relative to this matter was, that instead of attaining that likeness by purifying ourselves in obeying the truth, till we became pure as he is, and were thus made like him, we were expecting that it would be effected by a direct act of physical, omnipotent power, at the time of his visible manifestation in the literal clouds, for which we once so ardently looked, and for which many are now vainly looking. Should this ever meet the eye of one who is still looking for the personal appearing, as I once looked, permit me to say to you, that just as often, and just as certain as the time ever arrives to which you are looking for that manifestation, so CERTAIN YOU WILL BE DISAPPOINTED. Also let me say, that if you wish to see the Lord in his true character, you must look into his temple—the saints—the bright clouds—and not the literal clouds of vapor. Yea, let me advise you to penetrate the holy of holies, which is the heart, and there commune with that Eternal Spirit from off the mercy seat. But remember, that heart must be purified, as he is pure, before it is a suitable place for the holy God to dwell. Yea, this work must be performed by you, and in you, before you can ever see him as he is. Neglect this work, and you may gaze for that appearing till your eyes consume away in their holes, and your flesh upon your bones, and you will never witness it.

"Well, when we are made pure as he is—are made like him—then we shall see him as he is. I ask, then, if that for which we so ardently looked, has not been attained? Yea, verily. We were looking for Christ—and now having become like him, we have found the glorious object that we were in search of: Christ, our life, has appeared, and now we may appear with him in glory."

THE WAR NEWS:—We give at some length, the accounts of the late battle, and the storming of Monterey, without endorsing it as 'glorious news' or 'gratifying intelligence.' We take the liberty to say, that we regard it as a painfully deplorable circumstance, that with all the light and intelligence, and philanthrophy of the nineteenth century, the professedly Christian nation of the United States, cannot by some manner of means, arrange minor differences with a weaker power, without a relentless resort to arms, and the merciless butchery of hundreds on both sides, in the battle field. To speak of these scenes of carnage in terms of gratulation, as do some, or even with the cool composure with which ordinary events are detailed, would indicate at least a misanthropy which would disgrace a secular, much more a religious journal. We do not endorse the ultra doctrine of non resistance. Times and occasions have existed, in which we have regarded a resort to arms as justifiable, but we have never yet been convinced that the present war of conquest, is even excusable. And we fear that the blood of thousands, slain or wounded, if not the tears and agony of other thousands of disconsolate parents and widows and orphans, will rise in judgment against those who might, but did not devise the prevention of these scenes of destruction and of blood. We speak thus in sorrow, not in anger. May the Prince of Peace, come and reign over us. And may the nations, (shall we say Christian nations,) learn war no more.

WITTENBURG COLLEGE.—This is a newly established Institution located at Springfield, Ohio, under the patronage of the Evangelical Lutheran denomination. During our recent sojourn at S. attending the session of the Ohio Conference, we had the pleasure of forming acquaintance with its president, Rev. Dr. Keller, and found him a man of the right spirit. We became warmly prepossessed in favor of the Institution, and should be glad to see it flourish. Moreover, we like Springfield. It is a handsome, healthful, orderly place, situated at the intersection of the National Road, and the Little Miami Rail Road, connecting Cincinnati and Lake Erie. It contains 8 churches, of as many denominations, at peace among themselves. One of these is the Evangelical Lutheran Church, of which, Dr. K. is at present, the pastor. It is necessary to state that that portion of the Lutheran denomination is here referred to 'which is connected with the General Synod, and which approves of meetings for social prayer, protracted meetings, temperance associations, Sabbath schools, and all such means as promote revivals of religion, and experimental piety.' So says a pamphlet before us, containing the Charter & Constitution of the College. The Institution has been in operation but one year. Has 73 students, 22 candidates for the ministry. It has a Collegiate and a Theological Department. Candidates for the ministry of other religious denominations, are tendered the priviliges and benefits of the Theological department free of charge. The Ohio Conference adopted resolutions, gratefully responding to this proposal, and commending the Institution to the patronage of our friends and the public. We take pleasure in recording, though not now for the first time, our appreciation of the spirit of christian union and liberality, manifested by the Evan. Lutheran denomination.

REVIVAL IN NASHVILLE, TENN.—We learn from the Nashville Christian Advocate, that quite an interesting revival of religion is in progress in the Methodist Churches of that city. And that 343 have joined the Methodist Episcopal Church, South.

STAGE ACCIDENT.—We see by the Pittsburgh Com. Journal that one of the Good Intent stage coaches was overturned on Thursday of last week, a few miles west of Washington. The horses took fright and went down a precipice. A Mr. Clark of Louisville, had both legs broken, and the driver's back was broken. What a wonder that stage accidents are not more frequent. Not so much wonder, neither, since the abolition of drinking drivers on many of our roads.

☞ THE ANNUAL REGISTER, M. P. CHURH, 1847, is now in press, and shall be forthcoming soon as possible. Still send your orders brethren. We have only 3600 copies spoken for yet, and we mean to print 5000. Let us have them distributed before the ice interrupts our navigation. Every subscriber who pays $2 in advance for the 8th volume, of the Recorder, shall have a copy sent him by mail Send on friends.

Dr. G. BAILEY.—This gentleman, editor, of the Cincinnati Herald, is in our town, on his way to the eastern cities. We have had an agreeable interview with our old friend. He will remain over Sabbath, to get recruited from a slight indisposition.

ERRATA.—In our haste and urgency to issue our paper last week, several typographical errors escaped us. In the minutes of the Pitts. Conf the decrease of numbers should have been set down, 242, instead of 292. In the list of acknowledgements Muskingum Conference, T. Snyder should have been credited $2, and P. Kinsley $1. The figures were transposed.

KENTUCKY CONFERENCE, M. E. CH. SOUTH.—This body held its annual session recently in Covington, opposite Cincinnati. We see by the list of appointments in the Nashville C. Advocate, that G. W. Maley is Presiding Elder on the Covington District; Jos. J. Hill, a new accession from the north, is stationed in Covington, and E. W. Sehon, and S. A. Latta, at Soule Chapel, Cincinnati.

INDIANA CONFERENCE.—By the politeness of Br. C. H. Williams, the Sec. we have received an abstract of the Minutes of this Conference. We are happy to learn that a most agreeable, and harmonious session was enjoyed, and that nothing like division or secession, as some apprehended was hinted at. Br. Thomas Shipp is President.

ILLUSTRATED BOTANY.—The September number of this beautiful and instructive work has come to hand. The plates, four in number, are brilliant as usual, and tastily executed. We are still anxious to know that Mr. Wellman the publisher, is well sustained in so worthy and useful a publication.

THE ANTI PAPIST.—This is a weekly paper which has now commenced its regular issue at Cincinnati. It is to give a spirited expose of the errors of popery. It is edited by an association of clergymen. Published by Surguy and Ward, No. 7, West 4th St. Terms, $1 per year. We exchange, with pleasure, wishing the 'Anti Papist' success, in promoting 'the union of Christians against Popery' in the Mississippi valley.

A TRUE STORY OF A HORSE.

In the fall of 1842, as Rev. Geo. Brown was on his way to the Annual Conference at Mt. Vernon, Ohio, his faithful horse took sick, at St. Clairsville. Here he was obliged to leave him, and obtain other conveyance to the Conference. On the return of Br. B. he found the poor horse still much indisposed, and indeed not likely to survive. He was therefore under the necessity of again leaving him, and proceeded on to his labors, as President of the Pittsburgh District. Passing Steubenville, however on his way, he there examined two horses that were for sale, in case he should be so unfortunate as to lose his poor 'Jack.' Many weeks passed away, and no tidings of the beast were received by his anxious master, then at a remote distance. In his solicitude to learn the fate of the animal, he called for information through the Western Reorder, from any one who might be in possession of the facts. The following correspondence ensued, which we publish, by request:

Steubenville, Ohio, Nov. 9, 1842.

REV. G. BROWN, Dear Sir: Having seen in the Recorder a call for information, in relation to the sick horse, you left at St. Clairsville, on your way to the Conference in Mt. Vernon; and being aware of your anxiety to know, whether he is living or dead; we hasten to respond to your call. Information came to this place yesterday that your poor "Jack" has gone to Davy Jones' locker. He died two days after you saw him, on your return. The sorrel and the rone, which you looked at, in this place, in view of a purchase, are both since dead. At any time you want any word, relative to horseology, you may apply to any one of your friends here, and it shall promptly be given.

Very respectfully, M. M. LAUGHLIN, T. HANNA, M. E. LUCAS, H. J. HUKLE, R. H. HALSTEAD. J. LEETH, A. LIVINNY.

Pittsburgh. Pa. Jan. 20, 1843.

To Messrs. M. M. Laughlin, T. Hanna, M. E. Lucas, H. J. Hukle, R. H. Halstead, J. Leech, A. Devinny, DEAR BRETHREN: Your joint letter has been duly received, bearing date Nov. 9th, 1842, and should have been answered at an earlier date, but for my absence from home. I highly appreciate your kindness, in writing on so melancholy an occasion, as the death of my poor horse. Poor fellow, it appears to be but too true, he is dead! Well, if my horse is dead, my 7 Steubenville friends, still live. Long may you all live, to make joint reports, in case of dead horses. You are emphatically entitled to a double appellation—the preacher's friend—and the dead horse committee. My several letters to individuals, and my call through the Recorder, in relation to the life or death of my horse, had remained unanswered, until you generously stepped forth, and jointly communicated the saddening fact, that all was over, my Jack was dead. In this, you have done more than others—others were silent to my calls, you spoke out in the true style of real friends. Your past deportment to me had been so kind, as to convince me of your friendship, but this last act of kindness, makes assurance, doubly sure—even a skeptic must believe. Especially as you go to the trouble to oblige me, with the information of the death of two other horses—the sorrel and rone, which I had been looking at, in view of a purchase, and no doubt you jointly congratulate me on my lucky escape from loss, in not buying either of them. Thank you brethren for all these acts of kindness. Nor can I overlook, or forget your proffer of service in time to come. Surely your friendship is untiring—it knows no bounds: for you say in your horseological report, "at any time you want any word relative to horseology, you may apply to any of your friends here. "Horseology." This includes all about a horse, as I take it, pay and all. Thank you friends for this proffer—it is in good keeping with your well known character—it is help in time of need. I owe for that dead horse—times are hard. "Horseology" includes pay and all. Now about $5 each, will be very important to me. Br. Burns and Br. Dorsey, though not of the dead horse committee, no doubt have their hearts deeply enlisted in this matter, if so $5 between the two will be enough for them. I dont want to be hard with my friends. Moreover, I cannot regard you as self-created committee on dead horses. You must have constituents, if so, no doubt their hearts are equally kind with your own, this being admitted, as in all fairness it should, my chance will, in all likelihood, be pretty fair, for a little cash to pay my dead horse debt. I know you too well, brethren, to suppose for one moment, that your goodness of heart, will spend itself merely in words. Cheap words, easily uttered—no indeed, 'actions, speak louder than words,' you are men ripe for action, and action is the thing now called for. Any information you have to communicate in relation to "horseology," will be thankfully received, especially if there be any money in it, and yourselves always welcome at my house. I am, GEO. BROWN.

P. S. 1. I expect to be in your city, about the middle of the week, after the 2nd Sunday in February, and should like to pay my respects in person to the dead horse committee. Times are hard, or I'd go for an oyster supper, over which I think this matter might be adjusted to the satisfaction of all parties. G. B.

P. S. 2. In "horseology," it is but fair to keep in view, the difference between living horses and dead ones. Also between dead horses paid for, and dead horses not paid for. This last case I regard, as coming specially under the cognizance of the dead horse committee. However, if at the adjustment, there should be a difference of opinion, we can leave it to disinterested honest men.

I'd like to have certain brethren of your city, added to the committee. Such a committee should be strong in numbers, talent, and cash, as they may often have important cases submitted to their action. G. B.

We regret that this thrilling horsological sketch ends here—especially as we are left in the dark in reference to the most interesting and important part of the story, viz. the paying for the dead horse, and the procuring another. We certainly need a another report from the committee on this part of the subject. And indeed the committee have generously pledged themselves, to give 'promptly' when applied to, any word or information touching this matter. Come brethren of the Committee, our readers, with us will be anxious to have the rest of the story. Please send us another Report.

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

From the Baltimore American Oct. 12.

From Mexico.---Monterey Captured!--- Three Days' Battle.

The steamship James L. Day, Captain Wood, arrived at New Orleans on the 4th inst, from Brazos Santiago, bringing the news that Monterey was captured after three days of desperate fighting.

On the 19th, Gen. Taylor arrived before Monterey, with a force of about 6000 men, and after reconnoitering the city at about 1500 or about 1600 yards from the Cathedral fort, during which time he was fired upon from its batteries; his force was encamped at Walnut Springs, 3 miles short of the city. This was the nearest position at which the army could obtain a supply of water, and beyond the reach of the enemy's batteries. The remainder of the 19th was occupied by the engineers in making reconnoisances of the city, batteries and commanding heights. On the 20th, Gen. Worth was ordered with his division to move by a circuitious route to the right, to gain the Saltillo road beyond the west of the town, and to storm the heights above the Bishop's Palace, which vital point the enemy appear to have strangely neglected, Circumstances caused his halt on the night of the 20th, short of the intended position. On the morning of the 21st, he continued his route, and after an encounter with a large body of the enemy's cavalry and infantry, supported by artillery from the heights, he repulsed them with loss, and finally encamped, covering the passage of the Saltillo road. It was here discovered that besides the fort at the Bishop's Palace, and the occupation of the heights above it, two forts, on commanding eminences, on the opposite side of the San Juan; had been fortified and occupied. These two latter heights were then stormed and carried—the guns of the last fort carried, being immediately turned with a plunging fire upon the Bishop's Palace. On the same morning (the 21st) the 1st Division of regular troops, under Gen. Twiggs, and the Volunteer Division, under Gen. Butler, were ordered under arms to make a diversion to the left of the town, in favor of the important operations of Gen. Worth. The 10 inch morter and two 24 pounder howitzers, had been put in battery the night of the 20th, in a ravine 1400 yards distant from the Cathedral fort or Citadel, and were supported by the 4th Regiment of Infantry. At 8 A. M. on the 21st the order was given for this battery to open upon the Citadel and town, and immediately after the 1st Division, with the 3d and 4th Infantry in advance, under Gol. Garland, were ordered to reconnoitre and skirmish with the enemy on the extreme left of the city, and should prospect of success offer to carry the most advanced battery. This attack was directed by Maj. Mansfield, Engineer, Capt. Williams, Topagraphical Engineer, and Maj. Kinney, Quarter Master to the Texas Division. A heavy fire from the first battery was immediately opened upon the advance, but the troops soon turned it, entering and engaging with the enemy in the streets of the city, having passed through an incessant cross fire from the Citadel and the first and second battaries, and from the infantry who lined the parapets, streets, and house-tops of the city. The rear of the first battery was soon turned, and the reverse fire of the troops through the gorge of the works killed or dislodged the artillerists and infantry immediately in its rear. The 1st division was followed and supported by the Mississippi and Tennesse and Ohio Regiment, the two former regiments being the first to scale and occupy the forte. The success of the day here stopped. The Mississippi, Tennessee and Ohio Regiments, though warmly engaged in the streets of the city for some time after the capture of the 1st battery and its adjoining defences, were unable, from exhaustation and the loss they had suffered, to gain more advantage. A heavy shower of rain also came up to cause a suspension of hostilities before the close of the day. The 3d, 4th and 1st Infantry and the Baltimore Batallion, remained as the garrison of the captured position, under Col. Garland, assisted by Capt. Ridgeley's battery. Two 12 pounders, one 4 pounder and 1 howitzer, were captured in this forte, three officers and some 20 or 30 men taken prisoners. One of the 12 pounders was served against the 2nd fort and defences, with captured amunition, during the remainder of the day, by Capt. Ridgely. The storming parties of Gen. Worth's Division also captured two nine pounders, which where also immediately turned against their former owners.

On the morning of the 22d Gen. Worth continued his operations, and portions of his division stormed and carried successively the heights above the Bishop's Palace. Both were carried by a command under Capt. Vinton, 3d Artillery. In these operations the company of Louisiana troops under Capt. Blanchard performed efficient and gallant service as part of Capt. Vinton's command. Four pieces of artillery, with a good supply of ammunition, were captured in the Bishop's Palace this day, some of which were immediately turned upon the enemy's defences in the city. On the evening of the 22d, Col. Garland and his command were relieved as the garrison of the captured forts by Gen. Quitman with the Mississippi and Tennessee Regiments, and five companies of the Kentucky Regiment.

Early on the morning of the 23d, Gen. Quitman, from his position, discovered that the second and third forts and defences east of the city had been entirely abandoned by the enemy, who, apprehending another assault on the night of the 22d, had retired from all his defences to the main plaza and its immediate vicinity. A command of two companies of Mississippi and two of Tennessee troops were then thrown into the streets to reconnoitre, and soon became very hotly engaged with the enemy, these were soon supported by Colonel Wood's regiment of mounted Texas Rangers dismounted, by Bragg's Light Battery and the 3rd Infantry; the enemy's fire was constant and uninterrupted from the streets, house tops barricades, &c, in the vicinity of the plaza. The pieces of Bragg's battery were also used with much effect far into the heart of the city—this engagement lasted the best part of the day, our troops having driven the scattered parties of the enemy, and penetrated quite to the defences of the main plaza. The advantage thus gained, it was not considered necessary to hold, as the enemy had permanently abandoned the city and its defences except the main plaza, its immediate vicinity and the Cathedral fort or Citadel. Early in the afternoon (same day) Gen. Worth assulted from the Bishop's Palace the west side of the city, and succeeded in driving the enemy and maintaining his position within a short distance of the main plaza on that side of the city; towards evening the mortar had also been planted in the Cemetery enclosure, and during the night did great execution in the circumscribed camp of the enemy in the plaza—thus ended the operations of the 23d.

Early on the morning of the 24 a communication was sent to Gen. Taylor, from Gen. Ampudia, under a flag, making an offer of capitulation, to which the former refused to accede, as it asked more than the American commander would under any circumstances grant;—at the same time a demand to surrender was in reply made upon Gen. Ampudia—12 M. was the hour at which the acceptance or non acceptance was to be communicated to the American General. At 11 A. M., the Mexican General sent, requesting a personal conference with General Taylor, which was granted; the principal officers of rank on either side accompanying their Generals. After several offers in relation to the capitulation of the city made on either side and refused, at half past 4 P. M., Gen. Taylor arose and saying he would give Gen. Ampudia one hour to consider and accept or refuse, left the conference with his officers—at the expiration of the hour, the discharge of the mortar was to be the signal for the recommencement of hostilities. Before the expiration the hour, however, an officer was sent on the part of Gen. Ampudia, to inform the American General that to avoid the further effusion of blood and the national honor being satisfied by the exertions of the Mexican troops, he had, after consultation with his General Officers, decided to capitulate, accepting the offer of the American General.

The terms of capitulation were in effect as follows:

That the officers should be allowed to march out with their side arms.

That the Calvary and Infantry should be allowed to march out with their arms and accoutraments.

That all other munitions of war and supplies should be turned over to a board of American officers appointed to receive them.

That the Mexican army should be allowed seven days to evacuate the city, and that the American troops should not occupy it until evacuated.

That the Cathedral, Fort, or Citadel, should be evacuated at 10 A. M., next day, (25 h,) the Mexicans marching out, and the Americans marching in. The Mexicans allowed to salute their flag when hauled down.

That there should be an armistice of eight weeks, during which time neither army should pass a line running from the Rinconda through Linares and San Fernando.

This lenient offer of the American General was dictated with the concurrence of his Generals, and by motives of good policy and consideration for the good defence of their city by the Mexican Army.

Terrible Storm at Sea.

The Great Western, Steamship, in her recent passage from Liverpool to N. York encountered a fearful storm, which lasted 36 hours. On board were a number of citizens of the United States, returning from the World's convention. From an account drawn up by a committee of the passengers, we take the following extracts.

Sunday morning Sept. 20th. most of the passengers assembled in the cabin and saloon. Their haggard faces told too surely of the sleepless and anxious night which had passed. Even those most ignorant of nautical affairs could not fail to discover that we were in the midst of great peril. Few could dress with their accustomed care, owing to the violent pitching and constant rolling of the vessel. The stewards abandoned any attempt to prepare the breakfast table, and both then and throughout the day were obliged to content themselves with bringing such articles of food as were most convenient, to those who felt any disposition to eat.

"11 o'clock, A. M.—a heavy sea broke over the fore part of the starboard wheel house, or paddle box, which started the ice house and large iron life boat from their fastenings and washed them to leeward, and with much difficulty they were temporarily secured."

"At 11 o'clock and 15 minutes, A. M. attempted to wear ship, to get her on the other tack, (thinking she would be easier) as the wind still continued to veer to Northward. Lowered the after gaffs down; manned the fore rigging, and loosened the weather yard arm of the foresail, to pay her off, but found it had no effect. Therefore let her come to again. In the mean time the square sails blew away from the yards.

"11.30, A. M. The lee quarter boats were torn from the davits by a heavy lee lurch of the ship, bending the davits, tearing out the ringbolts from their stems and sterns."

Word was passed among the passengers that two of our boats were gone, and the others were likely to follow, the davits and bolts beginning to give. But not a remark was made; each spoke to the other only through the eye. And the ominous silence which pervaded the whole company told how sensibly all felt themselves in the very presence of the King of Terrors, uncertain of their doom.

It was wonderful to see how a few short hours changed the condition and feelings of all on board. The grades and distinctions incident to so large a company, varying in social position, citizens of almost all countries, and professing different creeds. yet, in the presence of so imminent danger, all distinctions seemed merged into one common emotion of awe, as we stood together in the court of the great leveller, Death. With this intense feeling which bound us together as one, came also another of an opposite and repelling character. Every heart was deeply occupied with its individual griefs and memories, as if not another shared the peril. Home, with its loved ones, and a thousand cherished hopes and joys, rose fresh to the view, and with a power like the storm, swept over the mind and left it like the ocean, tempest tost and troubled.

"See," said a gentleman to me, "no one converses, no one reads—all are engaged, each with his own thoughts; and if my wife and children were here, I confess, my feelings would be of the most distressing character." "But," said I, "they suffer in your loss." "Very true; yet it is only a question of time, and, whether sooner or later, God's will be done."

"At noon, storm and sea raging in all its fury, sea still breaking over the ship, a heavy sea struck the larboard paddle box and smashed it to atoms, sprung the spring beam, breaking the under half; shattered the parts of the ship attached thereto. A splinter struck the captain on the head while standing on the poop, and the force of the blow, together with the sea, carried him over the lee quarter, and he was only saved by the nettings.

"After this sea had passed over, we found the water had gained on the pumps; the wind appeared to lull a little and the ship a little easier, but still blowing a storm. All the hatches, except those made use of for passing into the engine room, were battened down, and the skylights partially covered. The weather continued the same until midnight, at which time it lulled for half an hour.'

The log conveys to the reader some idea of the state of the ship and effects of the storm on Sunday at noon, Its effects on those below can best be given in the words of a gentleman who remained the greater part of the time in the cabin:

"To convey an idea of the appearance of all around is out of my power. In the words of Sheridan "the tempest roamed in all the terror of its glory." The atmosphere was surcharged with a thick spray rendering a look far out to seaward impossible. The wind howled, reared and bellowed, like the constant mutterings of thunder cloud. Huge waves of tremendous height and volume, rose in mad disply around the ship, threatening every moment to break over us amidships and crush the vessel. Sea after sea, sinking us with terrific noise, caused the gallant ship to stop for an instant, tremble and shake in every timber from her stem to her stern post; reeling and lurching, tossed to and fro, again would she gather fresh strength, and with her wheels half hid in the wild waters, again and again receive the thundering blows of an element that seemed armed for our destruction.

"The sails on the yards, strongly secured by ropes and gaskets, were blown from their furls and streamed out to leeward in ribbons. But all this was as nothing. About 1 P. M., while most of us were seated in agonizing suspense in the lower cabin, holding fast to the tables and settees, a sea struck the vessel, and a tremendous crash was heard on deck. Instantly the cabin was darkened, and torrents of water came pouring down upon us through the skylights.

"Scarcely had the waters reached the floor when all in the cabins and state rooms sprang to their feet, and simultaneously, as if by concert, the ladies uttered a scream of agony, so painful and so despairing, the sound of it will never be forgotten; and heaven grant that such a wail of anguish may never again be heard by me. Several fainted—others clasped their hands in mute despair, while many called aloud upon their Creator."

The crash to which the writer alludes was caused by the tearing up of the benches and other wood work on the quarter deck. These were hurled with violence against the skylights, by the same sea which broke the windows of the saloon, drenching the berths on the larboard side, driving out their affrighted occupant, while it smashed by its weight the glass over the main cabin, and thus forced its way below.

This was a period of intense emotion. I was sitting in the upper saloon, striving to protect some ladies from injury. So violent were the shocks of the vessel, although firmly braced, it was with great difficulty we could prevent ourselves being hurled from our seats, and dashed with such violence against a part of the vessel as to endanger life or limb. Many received severe contusions and bruises, notwithstanding all their efforts.

It was an anxious hour. My eye wandered over the different groups in the saloon, resting one while on a father passing from one to another of his family, and cheering with a kind word an interesting group of daughters; then on a young wife folded to the bosom of her husband, without syllable being uttered, but the action spoke volumes; and again upon a mother whose children had been left in America as she clasped her hands as if in secret prayer, while her husband and her father gathered around, and all seemed bowed down to the earth in one common feeling of tender solicitude for those who might so soon become helpless orphans.

It was an awful hour. The most thoughtless amongst us cowered in their secret hearts before a danger, which none but a fool or a brute would have mocked, and all therefore accepted the invitation to meet in the cabin for prayer.

Rev. Mr. Marsh read the 107th psalm. Rev. Dr. Smucker prayed. Rev. Dr. Beecher made a few solemn remarks. Rev. Dr. Balch repeated the words of our Savior, "Let not your heart be troubled, ye believe in God, believe also in me," —commenting briefly on their consoling import, and then invited all present to join with him in the Lord's prayer; after which he pronounced the Apostolic benediction.

Night approached. And again I quote from the gentleman who has kindly given an account of what took place below.

"Amid this accumulation of horrors, and still more to add to our alarm, night gathered in around us.—The wind, far from abating, was on the increase, the lulls in the storm being less frequent, and the squalls if any thing more terrific. The whole ocean was one sea of foam, lashed up into terrible waves, wild and angry, while the spray and wind seemed driven through the rigging and over the ship, as if with demoniacal power. As darkness came, clustered together in the cabin, we all thought and reflected on our fate. Most, if not all of us, had given ourselves up for lost. For what with the heavy laboring of the ship, the terrible noise and howling of the wind, the continued frequent thumpings of the sea, the quivering and shaking of the groaning timbers, the carrying away of so many portions of the vessel's upper works, and the knowledge that we were perhaps for another night to be exposed to the full power of a raging hurricane, left us little to hope for."

In the evening, about 9 o'clock, the Rev. Mr. Balch, at the request of several passengers, administered the Holy Communion in the cabin, to upwards of sixty persons—many of whom received it there for the first time in their lives. Several applied to him as to the propriety of their embracing that occasion to fulfill a long cherished purpose of their hearts, but which, like many other "good thoughts," had been deferred to "a more convenient season." They all communicated, together with others of almost every creed and nation, thus reminding us of the promise of Scripture, "they shall come from the East and the West, the North and the South, and sit down with Abraham and Isaac and Jacob, in the kingdom of God."

It was a most solemn scene. Mr. Blach first read the service appointed for a storm at sea, after which, the whole communion office. The terrible conflict of the elements which raged without was rendered yet more striking by the impressive stillness which pervaded that company of Christ's disciples within.

Gathered around the table, they received, into hearts deeply moved, the consecrated emblems of the Redeemer's body and blood. All felt comforted by the blessed ordinance of grace. Many a bosom before tossed with fear, was now tranquil through faith.—Once more, all renewed their vows, and realized the peace of God shed abroad in their hearts, and felt, with a vividness perhaps, never before known, "Your life is hid with God in Christ." Oh! it was a night and a communion long to be remembered.

After the communion, I returned to my state room. The gentleman who shared it with me had gone below, to die, as he expected, in company with his daughter and son-in-law. Left therefore alone, taking a last look at the picture of my little family, and commending them, and all dear to me, to the grace and protection of God, I lay down and slept peacefully.

"Monday 21st, 12 30," continues the log, "the storm commenced raging again in all its fury, and sea a perfect foam, till 8 A. M., at which time the clouds began to break, and the squalls less furious. Got the ship's head to the N. W. and hauled the yards round: the sea still raging as before, and nearly ahead, curling and breaking over the ship in every direction. At noon the storm ceased; but the sea continued more violent till 2 P. M., at which time it ceased gradualy with the wind—having lasted about 36 hours; during which time, it gave me much pleasure to state, my officers and crew conducted themselves with great coolness and presence of mind.

From Monday evening till Tuesday evening the rise was fully 2 feet 2 inches, and at dusk the Monongahela was swelling rapidly. We expect to see fully 5 feet water this morning—that is, judging from the rate at which the rise was coming up last evening.— Pitts. Gaz. 14th.

Destructive Conflagration.—Twenty two houses burned, and one hundred families houseless.—The fire in Philadelphia, noticed by telegraph, turns out quite a serious affair. It began in George st. between Schuylkill Sixth and Seventh sts, destroying 22 out of the 29 houses in the row. The scenes of fright and horrow among the poor Irish and colored families, that followed the breaking out of the flames, were indescribable. Some of the children came near perishing, and one or two sick females had to be carried out from their beds. The row was believed to be the poorest in the city. In some of the cellars even there were two families. The situation of these creatures thus turned into the streets with the loss of their all, is truly distressing, and calls loudly upon the benevolent. The value of the buildings destroyed is estimated at $30,000. After six o'clock the roof of the residence of J. S. Pringle in Filbert street, between Schuylkill, Sixth and Seventh streets, which with the roof of the adjoining house, occupied by J. C. Cresson, was considerably burnt before it could be extinguished.—N. Y. Sun.

600 Indians Arrived.—Capt. Jewett, who went with his company some three or four weeks ago to Indians to move the Miami Indians from the lands purchased by Government in that section, returned yesterday to this city, bringing with about 600 of the Miamis, who will be shipped to their new homes in Missouri, as soon as a boat can be obtained. Capt. J. says he had no difficulty with them, except their movements were so slow that he was obliged to force them on with his men. The Captain struck the Canal at the nearest point, and, procuring five boats, embarked with his charge. Captain J. is a business man and expedites anything he undertakes.—So passes away the the "last of the Miamis."—Cin. Com.

Steamboat Accident.—About 12 o'clock last Saturday, while the steamer Highlander lay aground at the foot of Turkey Island close to the shore, a large tree measuring three feet through, which was standing near the edge of the bank, was blown down, and fell on the boat, smashing the cabin on the laboard side, from the wheel house forward, and breaking the connecting steam pipe. Mr. John Free, one of the pilots, who was in the pilot house when it fell; is dangerously wounded. Two other persons were slightly injured. There happened to be but few passengers on board, or the loss of life would have been great, as the stem of the tree cut clear through to the lower deck.—St. Louis Republican.

Fur Company Robbed.—The Independence Expositor of the 12th, says that the company of Messrs. Leonard of that county, and Shaw of St, Louis, are near at hand, after a long and tedious trip. The Pawnee Indians seeing their weakness, stole one hundred and forty packs of robes from them. The company contrived to retain possession of one hundred and twenty five or one hundred and thirty packs, which were expected to reach Independence in a few days.

Accident in Allegheny.—Yesterday while workmen were engaged in raising a frame house, situated on Ohio street near East lane, the machinery gave way, and the building fell. Several men were under the house at the time. All escaped but two uninjured—these two were Germans, one of them had his arm broken and the other was bruised very seriously on the breast. How they escaped, with their lives is really unaccountable. The building was occupied by a Mrs. Sowers Mrs. S., however, was the only person in the house at the time of the accident. She escaped uninjured, by springing out of the falling house.—Pitts. Com. Journal.

Commodore Decatur.—A very interesting correspondence has taken place between a Committee and Mrs. Decatur in relation to the removal of the Commodore's remains to be buried in Philadelphia, his native city. It was the desire of Commodore Decatur to be buried in the Church yard of St. Peter's Church, near the remains of his parents, which we learn will take place in a few weeks.

At St. Louis, on the 27th ult., the extensive building on Main street, known as Jenks' hemp warehouse, was entirely consumed, with its valuable contents, books, papers, &c. The loss is estimated at from $50,000 to $75,000.

Snuff Boxes.—At Nuremburg, the great Manufactory of European Snuff Boxes, it has been prohibited to lithographers and others to paint any subject on them referring to sectarian disputes on religion, and also any thing contrary to good morals.

Steam Boat Sunk.—We learn from the Louisville Journal of the 3th, that the new steamer Tom Corwin is reported to be sunk at Plumb Point, in the Mississippi. She was bound from Cincinnati for New Orleans, with but little freight. Boat and cargo a total loss. The Corwin was built at Pittsburgh about a year ago, where she was owned, we believe.—Cin. Com.

Terrible Accident.—On Saturday afternoon last, a youg man named John Fury, while oiling a machinery in Holbert's Foundry, on Front street, near Smith, was caught by a wheel and drawn into the running machinery. The flesh was torn off his left side and shoulder, and his arm broken.—He was dreadfully mangled and torn. Blood gushed out at every pore, and strange to say, after being thrown by the machinery some twenty feet, he was taken up alive. His arm was amputated by Dr. Shotwell at the shoulder, and his wounds dressed. He was just alive yesterday noon, but not sensible. It is very strange that he lived so long. We understand that the opening on his side, when taken up, showed his heart plainly!—Cin. Com.

Narrow escape.—On Tuesday at 2 P. M. the cints of the second story of the Custom House Philadelphia, gave way under the pressure of 1200 sacks of salt, which came down into the cellar. In the back room were Mr. Wm. Nelson, Mr. George D. Fisher and another, gentleman, all of whom escaped out of the building. Two negroes employed in the building escaped before the heavy mass fell.

One of the large shipping houses in Boston was applied to a short time since, when lading a ship to China, to take out as freight a quantity of ardent spirits.—"No, sir," said they to the applicant, "we don't carry that article to China." "But we are willing to pay large freight!" "No, sir, we do not carry cum to poison the heathen." The gentleman retired, posed at this unexpected temperance lecture.

Yellow Fever.—Fourteen cases of yellow fever have appeared at the navy yard in Pensacola. There are 200 cases in the Hospital, chiefly of scury, contracted while in the Gulf.

Yucatan.—This province although declared in favor of Santa Anna has not reannexed herself to Mexico but continues to govern through an independent Legislature.

Melancholy Accident.—Charles E. Thomas, son of Moses Thomrs, auctioneer, of Philadelphia, was run over while in a skiff at St. Louis by a steamboat, and drowned. He was much respected, and only 28 years of age.

Murder in Cincinnati.—Edward Byington, Esq., was cut to pices by a Mr, Church, with a bowie knife, in the street, on the 27th ult., in consequences of Byington accidentally running against him. Great excitement prevailed in Cincinnati, at the melancholy result.

Mirabeau said, "that to succeed in the world, it is necessary to submit to be taught many things which you understand, by persons who know nothing about them.

Found Drowned.—A man named Charles E. Thomas was found drowned on the 25th ulto. at St. Louis.

Slaves Liberated.—A lot of negroes, 19 in number, arrived here yesterday, from N. Carolina. They were liberated by a family named Winslow, and are on their way to Indiana, for the purpose of locating there —Cin. Com.

Bank Caved In!—One Man Killed.—Yesterday about 12 o'clock, M., while two men, (Germans,) were engaged in excavating the earth for Smith & Carr, on Freeman st, near the Whitewater Canal, the bank caved in and buried them both. They were dug out as soon as possible; one (named George Akers) found dead, and the other much injured.—Cin. Com.

"NAEREB"

Mr. Editor:—Our friend "Naereb" must be a splendid genius, and a man of a most penetrating mind; and if he can remain at "Home" long enough, and only have "leisure," we may expect some luminous productions. The most to be lamented is, that he has not more "leisure;" if he had a little more of this, when he wrote, would he not have made it clearly appear that all the unstationed ministers in the M. P. Church, or at least some of them, were aiming to acquire an equal amount of power, if not a greater amount, than that which is possessed by the Pope of Rome? Is not "Naereb" entitled to a premium for his discovery? If he had died before the publication to which he alludes, made its appearance in your paper of Aug. 6, the world might have remained ignorant forever, of the dark designs of these ministers. J. H.

Sept. 10th. 1846.

We inform J. H. that 'Naereb' is an unstationed minister. The above was in type last week, but crowded out.

PRICES CURRENT.

ZANESVILLE AND PUTNAM, OCTOBER 17.—Flour, $5,25; Wheat, 50; Corn, 20@25 cts.; Oats, 12@16 cts.; Flax Seed 50 cts.

PHILADELPHIA, OCTOBER 13, '46.—FLOUR—There has been a good demand for Superfine Flour since our last review, and the sales for shipment amount to about 10,000 brls.—including several parcels fresh ground Penn'a, early in the week at $5,25@$5,37½ for fair and good brands, and sound old stock at $5,06½@$5,12½ per brl. Since the market has become more settled, and good brands have sold freely at $5,25 for fresh ground, and $5 for sound old stock, Penn'a, and an extra brand at $5,37½ per brl—the market closing firm at these rates.

GRAIN—There has been a fair demand for Wheat, and about 20,000 bushels have changed hands, early in the week at $1,10@$1,12½ for old and new red, and $1,18@$1,20 for white; since, sales of Penn'a red at $1,08@$1,05 and white at $1,18@$1,15 per bushel.—Bick

PITTSBURGH, OCTOBER 12.—The market for Flour on Saturday was very steady at $3,75 per brl. The receipts were not so large as on Friday.

A solution of the great fluctuations in Flour on Thursday and Friday is to be found in the fact that not one of the shippers in this market, so far as we know their sentiments have the least confidence in the markets eastward. Considering that the current prices there have been inflated and not warranted by any news from abroad they look for a decline there soon. Hence a rumor on the streets sends prices up or down as it may happen to be favorable or otherwise. This is an unsound state of trade and likely to lead to sudden and violent fluctuations.—Pitts. Adv.

NEW-YORK, OCTOBER 2, 1846.—There is but little animation in the Flour market.—Prices remain about the same as on Saturday. Buyers and sellers are holding off for further advices from Europe.

The supply of Wheat is tolerably fair, but the demand not so active. Sales of Genesee at 100@105 cts.; prime ops of either descriptions at 98 to 103 cts.—Corn is not so active and prices a little on the decline.

CINCINNATI, OCTOBER 13.—FLOUR—Sales yesterday of 1200 brls. at $3,45 to 3,62. An advance of 25c per brl. induced by the news per Great Western, and its effect on the New York market.

NOTICES.

NOTICE.—Rev. Thomas Lancaster, your appointment in Green Co. Pa. will embrace the last Saturday of October, and first Lord's Day of November. Leave the Waynesburgh road at the Cross Key Tavern. Call at Mr. McCoshes,

A. Marple.

WHEELING CIRCUIT.—Our preacher has come on, and preached one round. So far he has been well received. We pray God to revive his work this year. We have peace and friendship among us. Our love to all adjoining circuits, preachers in particular. Member.

Rev G. Brown, Pres. Pitts. Conference.—We have just received a letter from Alex. Marple, and as it is not convenient at this late moment to publish it entire, we make a brief statement of its contents. He had forwarded a communication for the Confereuce, with the usual annual report, and representing his wish to the Conference to be left in the hands of the President, but the letter it seems failed to reach the conference. He notifies the President that he finds it impracticable to enter at present upon the field of labor assigned him. The chief reason given, is, his indebtedness for a horse on account of the very scanty support given him last year. He intends resorting to other means to make up the necessary amount, and expects it will take him nearly half the year. So, the brother asks to be exhonerated, and have the appointment filled by another, unless it will do to wait, till he shall be able to fill it. Pity, say we, that last year's circuit does not make up this money for the horse, and let the brother go to his appointment. The address of Br. M. is Rising Station, Green Co. Pa. He requests a communication soon. [Ed.

Written for the Western Recorder.

A CANZONET.

The sun that glories on his way,
Gives to the world his cheering light,
And scatters with each joyful ray,
The gloomy darkness of the night.

But wo to her for whom no sun,
Sheds a serene and holy beam—
For winter reigns, with gloom and storm,
And silent then each purling stream.

No incense floats upon the gale,
Nor bird sings blithely on the spray,
For flowers bloom within the vale—
For birds and flowers have passed away.

'Twere better could the queen grass be
Now waving gently o'er her head,
And winds their dirges mournfully,
Were sighing softly round her bed. P.

BE ACTIVE.

Be active—be active—
Find something to do,
In digging a clam-bank,
Or tapping a shoe.
Don't stop at the corners,
To drag out the day—
Be active—be active—
And work while you may.

'Tis foolish to falter,
Or lag in the street—
Or walk as if chain-shot
Were bound to your feet—
Be active—be active—
And do what you can;
'Tis industry only
That maketh the man.

'Tis industry makes you—
Remember—be wise—
From sloth and from stupor
Awake and arise.
You'll live and be happy,
And never complain
Of the blues or the dumps,
Or a dull, heavy brain.

TAKE IT EASY.

Take it easy! Life, at longest,
Butt a lengthen'd shadow is;
And the brave as well as strongest,
Dare not call to-morrow his!
Take it easy—for to day
All your plans of wisdom lay.

Take it easy! Done with fretting;
Meet your neighbor with a smile;
From the rising sun to setting,
Live the present all the while.
Take it easy! Every vow
Make in reference to 'now!'

Take it easy! What is hidden,
Or is wrong or seemeth so—
Leave it is as a thing forbidden,
Out of which a curse may grow!
Take it easy! Never pry
Into what will cause a sigh.

Take it easy! Daily turning
To the monitor within;
On its altar always burning,
Keep an incense free from sin!
Take it easy! Never fear
While you keep a conscience clear.

Take it easy! Ever leaning
To the side of truth and right;
Happiness from virtue gleaning—
Peace of mind from wisdon bright!
Take it easy! For, at best,
Life is but a sorry jest.

REPORT OF THE FINANCIAL COMMITTEE.

The committee on finance ask leave to report that they are exeedingly mortified to find so great a deficiency in the payment of the preachers. But one circuit with Cincinnati station has paid their disciplinary allowance, while the rest are sadly deficient.

God works by means; and among the most efficient in the judgment of the committee is the prompt and full and regular discharge of the pecuniary claims of our ministry. "Even so hath God ordained that they which preach the gospel shall live by the gospel."

The committee recommend for adoption the following resolutions:—

Resolved, That the first quarterly conference of the year make an estimate of the probable expenses of the circuit or station, and apportion the same to the several classes according to their ability by a vote of a majority of the leaders present. When in a book provided by each leader, each member shall subscribe what he is willing to pay for that year, to be paid quarterly; provided that each leader may obtain subscriptions from persons not members who may be disposed to aid us.

Resolved, That each and every class leader shall have a class steward elected, (or act in that capacity himself,) who shall use his utmost exertions to obtain the amount apportioned to his class by subscription or otherwise.

Resolved, That any minister or preacher shall be exonerated from all service in his appointed field of labor, if at the end of any quarter he is not fully paid his regular disciplinary allowanee up to that time. Provided that he notify the quarterly conference of his intention to leave; and within three weeks after leaving publish the reasons thereof in the Recorder together with a copy of this resolution.

Resolved, That the Constitution and By-Laws of the Home Missionary Society be read again in conference.

Resolved, That they be published in the Recorder, and each superintendent be furnished a copy.

Resolved, That the President be excused from visiting any circuit or station more than once, unless assured from such circuit or station of his full pay.

Next Annual Conference to meet on the second Wednesday in Oct. 1847, in Frankfort Circuit.

The following resolutions on the subject of Slavery, were adopted.

Whereas, Our last General Conference was respecfully called upon to take some action calculated to discountenance slavery, or to express some opinion adverse thereto. And whereas, the said General Conference declared itself not authorized by the Constitution to legislate upon the subject, but referred it to the respective Annual Conferences to make their own regulations on the subject, as far as authorized by the Constitution, therefore Resolved, 1. That slavery is a great evil, and opposed to the principles of the Christian religion.

Resolved, 2. That we will receive no slaveholder into the Church, nor those that advocate it to be right.

Resolved, 3. That we will admit no slaveholder into our pulpits, nor one that advocates slavery to be right, nor receive the sacrament at his hands.

Resolved, 4. That the privileges of our church be granted to all our members, without regard to color.

SUNDRY OTHER RESOLUTIONS.

Resolved, That this Conference deeply sympathise in the afflicted state of the neighborhood, and cordially tender thanks to our friends for their hospitality in entertaing us.

Resolved, That this Conference recommend to the Steward, of the several Circuits to use their best endeavors to raise the allowance of their preachers, and also to impress it on the people that they are as much obligated to pay their preachers, as they are to pay other debts. And, further recommend that an apportionment be made at the first quarterly Conference to the several classes, and that the Leaders are their best endeavors to raise the amount, and report to the second quarterly conference.

Resolved, That this Conference recommend to all the classes where it is practicable, to organise Sabbath Schools, and also that all our preachers ase their influence to promote their interests, and increase their number.

Resolved, That we concur in the Temperance cause, and all benevolent institutions that have for their object the glory of God, and happiness of man.

Resolved, That the members of this Conference use their influence to discourage the use of tobacco, in its forms.

Resolved, That we unite to seek a deeper work of grace in our souls, and that we recommend to all our people, holiness of heart.

Next session of Conference to be held at Bethel, Morgan Co. Ill. Commencing Aug. 24th 1847.

The session has been on the whole very harmonious. And its business dispatched to general satisfaction, And notwithstanding the general barren state of the Churches in the west, the brethren in the Ministry seem encouraged, and with apparent satisfaction and in good spirits receive their appointments which are now being read.

The want of time prevents me at present from making this abstract as full as may be desired, but more anon. Yours truly

Jno. Clarke, Sec.

Quincy Ill. Oct. 1st 1846.

P. S. It ought to be said the hospitality with which the Conference has been entertained by the friends in Quincy could not be surpassed.

The courtesies extended by the other denominations have been very cordial. The Baptists especially seemed to blend themselves in feeling & interest with the Conference.

The Trials of a Housekeeper.

BY THE EDITRESS.

"The deepest wretchedness of life; is continuance of petty pains;"

and none but the uninitiated can doubt that the mistress of a family is constantly exposed to trifling annoyances, which are in reality more difficult to bear than serious afflictions. How often, in cases where we see overwhelming reverses borne with fortitude and equanimity, does the temper give way before those petty inconveniences which are involved in the very existences of the social relations! How often do we see the woman who can stand by the dying bed of a parent, a companion or a child, with the calmess of Christian submission; who can bear the unwonted privations and humiliations of poverty without a murmur; yet suffer herself and all around her to be made thoroughly comfortable, by any one of those trivial accidents to which she is liable in the management of her domestic affairs! To such an extent is this true, that those great events which form eras in the existence of woman, cannot be regarded as a proper criterion by which to judge of the strength of her character, or the equability of her temper. Never, until she has been tried as a housekeeper, is the worth of her character, or its deficiencies fairly tested.

It is because we have not learned to seek strength from above, for the ordinary purposes of life, that these formidable "trials" obtain so much power over our happiness and usefulness; we feel that grace alone can enable us to bear severe afflictions, but do not expect it on those small occasions which are constantly occurring, and which, more than any other, go to make up the sum total of domestic happiness or misery. We have called them small occasions: they are so in their nature, but not in their consequences. Whatever mars the happiness of a family, whatever effects injuriously the temper and moral character of children or domestics, possesses an importance which we cannot adequately estimate. And what more likely to do this, than frequent ebullitions of anger, frequent paroxysms of fretfulness and impatience in her to whom they look for guidance and instruction? Long after she has forgotten the feeling, and the circumstances which called it forth, the fatal influence is operating on these ductile minds, and preparing them for a repetition of the same scenes in future years.

We talk of commencing and finishing the education of our children—as if this education were not commenced with the very first dawning of infant intellect, and progressing ever since, without one moment's intermission. The mother is herself the first book read by her child; and what he sees there, will certainly be copied into his heart and life. Her character and deportment, more than any or all other influences, is educating her children; and happy is it for society when the lessons daily learned of her, are such as may safely influence their conduct and conversation. But let it never be forgotten, that, example rather than precept, is to form the character of those committed to our charge. It is worse than idle to expect that the formal inculcation of sweetness and patience will make our children amiable and forbearing, when the see us irritated by trifles, and thrown off our guard by the unavoidable evils of life. Woman, as the centre of the domestic circle, should diffuse sunshine and warmth through the whole atmosphere of home. Strong in her physical weakness, and powerful in her gentleness, it is the enviable province of the wife, to soothe and cheer her husband, when he comes with fevered brow and ruffled spirit, from his daily avocations, to enjoy, for a few short hours, the delights of home. But if she, who should be the guardian genius of that hallowed spot, meet him with complaints, repinings, and it may be reproaches, instead of cheerful words and a kind welcome—if her face wear habitually a wintry frown instead of the bright smile which won his heart—what hope of happiness remains for him on earth? A fearful responsibility rests on the wife under such circumstances; and should the husband of her love, make shipwreck of hope, and honor, and happiness—should he fly for solace to the intoxicating cup, the gaming table, or the society of the living lost—would not concience whisper, "thou art the cause of his undoing?" How many good and noble qualities have we seen obscured by the indulgence of habitual frefulness, while the unconcious victim of this miserable propensity, imagined herself the most blameless and unfortunate of human beings! Beauty, wit, genius, learning—what are they all, when combined with this unlovely and uncomfortable trait of character?

Young ladies, who are toiling after accomplishments, and striving to become elegant, well-bread, and well educated women, we entreat you to endeavor to earn the appellation of amiable, good tempered woman—not by the display of that hollow courtesy which is reserved for public occasions, to advance your own selfish ends, but by the constant practice of kindness and forbearance in the domestic circle. Cultivate, at all times, a spirit of self-denial and accommodation, in your intercourse with others; for depend upon it, if as young ladies you do not learn to subdue your own wil, and consult the happiness of those around you, you will be miserable as wives and mothers. There is no magic influence in these relations, to convert the selfish daughter into the patient, devoted mother—or the careless, exacting young girl, into the affectionate, disinterested woman. Nothing but the power of the Holy Spirit can enable you to overcome the natural selfishness of the human heart, and without this, every effort will be to a great extent unavailing. There must be a new principle implanted within us, ere we can bear with patience the trials of life, or cheerfully yield our own will to that of another.

Every thing on the education of woman, should tend to develope a spirit of self-devotion and self-renunciation. This spirit can never be too much cultivated by our sex, because by it, our "highest triumphs are to be achieved," it bears with it, "as it is vanquished or victorious, the destines of the world." It is the true mission of woman, to exhibit to mankind the moral beauty and power of that love which seeketh not her own, but the love of others, and finds its own highest honor and happiness in so doing. In this limited, but important sphere, she will be "one of the most active and efficient agents in her heavenly Father's work of man's renovation, and generations yet unborn shall rise up and call her blessed."

AGRICULTURAL.

Fattening Stock.

Summer has gone, and now we find ourselves entering the fall season. The harvest is over, and now the farmer begins to think about fattening stock. We propose, then, to offer our agriculturing readers some valuable suggestions on this most important part of the farmers duties. Now we think the whole matter may be made of easy comprehension and memory: by giving it under the following heads:

1st. How to choose fattening stock;
2d. The conditions of keeping them;
3rd. The food, its qualities, preparation, &c.

And, first, as to selecting your stock. Animals dossessing small lungs, small liver, and small spleen,—indeed, small offal of every description, have a greater disposition to fatten, and to lay the fat on in the proper places—that is, to make that pretty streaked meat which the housewife loves to see, and which sells so readily at market—we mean that meat which has the red and white appearance. Though these facts can in no way help the farmer in his choice, yet they lead to the knowledge of principles which will aid him. There are certain signs which indicate early maturity, or a tendency of the animal having these marks to produce fat, or muscle, with greater rapidity and facility than animals that do not have them. The first we will mention is touch. Now a thick, hard, unyielding hide is by no means favorable; but a thin, papery feeling hide, transparent and shining, and covered with thin hair, indicate a good feeder, an animal that will easily fatten, but not carry much muscle this also indicates a delicate constitution. But, if the touch be perfect, that is, if the animal has a thick loose skin, floating as it were on a layer of soft, fat, yielding to the least pressure and springing back to the touch of the finger, like a piece of chamois leather.—These are the very best symptoms; they indicate hardiness, and capable of carrying plenty of muscle as well as plenty of fat. Small bones is another favorable sign, The size of the head; when the head of the bull approaches to the narrow elongated form of the female, his stock will be certain to fatten readily. Such are the indications of selecting good fattening stock.

2nd.—The conditions of keeping them. And in the first place, we will show how they should be kept in the growing state.

Now, while stock is growing, the object should be to raise as much muscle as possible at the least expense, because, nearly all the fleshy part of an animal is attained during the growing time, and the fattening time puts on the admixture of fat and lean. To effect this, then, let growing stock be fed on peas, beans, and barley meal, along with good hopgrass, and turnips, changing according to season and circumstances; and take notice that change of diet will tend more to produce appetite, than by regulating the quantity or quality of their food. Turnips and carrots, although so valuable in manufacturing beef and mutton, yet must not be given too carelessly. They contain a great deal of water, and will need to be accompanied with drier feed occasionally, in order to prevent the scouring, nor is this all, giving dry feed occasionally makes the wetter feed stay longer in the animal's stomach, and thereby gives a greater amount of nourishment, The best food that can be given to pigs is a mixture of barley meal, peas and potatoes, but as we do not raise barley and peas sufficiently for this durpose, corn meal is as good. If the pigs be fed on potatoes too exclusively, the fat has a tallowy appearance, and the meat shrinks up when boiling, for want of firmness.

3. The food its qualities, &c,

We must not judge of the value of food by its bulk. Green top turnips and beets, contain 89 parts; in a 100 of water. Russia turnips 85 parts; potatoes 72 parts, oats and wheat straw 18 parts. Now, the following rules, if attended to, will be found of immense value.

"1st. The preparation of food.—This should be so prepared that its nutritive properties may all be made available to the use of the animal; and not only so, but appropriated with the least possible expenditure of muscular exertion and energy. The ox that is obliged to wander over an acre to get the food he should find on 2 or 3 square rods; the horse that is 2 or 3 hours eating the coarse food he would swallow in 15 minutes if the grain was ground or the hay cut, as it should be; the sheep that spends hours making its way into a turnip, when, if it were sliced, it could be eaten in as many minutes; the pig that eats raw potatoes or whole corn, when either cooked could be eaten in one fourth of the time—may indeed fatten, but much less rapidly than if the food was given them in a proper manner, All food should be given to a fattening animal in such a state that as little time and labor as possible on the part of the animal shall be required in eating.

"2d, The food should be in abundance.—From the time the fattening process commences until the animal is slaughtered, he should never be without food. Health and appetite are best promoted by change of food rather than by limiting the quantity. The animal that is stuffed and starved alternately may have streaked meat, but it will be made too slowly for the profit of the owner.

"3d. The food should be given regularly.—This is one of the most essential points in feeding animals. If given irregularly, the animal indeed consumes his food, but he soon acquires a restless disposition, is disturbed at every appearance of his feeder, and is never in that quiet state so necessary to the taking on of fat. It is surprising how readily any animal acquires habits of regularity in feeding, and how soon the influence of this is felt in the improvement of his constitution. When at the regular hour the pig has had his pudding, or the sheep its turnips, they compose themselves to rest with the consciousness that their digestion is not to be unseasonably disturbed, or their quiet broken by unwonted invitation to eat. All creatures fatten much faster in the dark than in the light, a fact only to be accounted for by their greater quiet. Some of those creatures that are the most irritable and impatient of restraint while feeding, such as turkeys and geese, are found to take on fat rapidly when confined in dark rooms, and fed at stated hours by hand. There is no surer proof that apig is doing well than to see him eat his meal quickly, and then retire to his bed to sleep, or cogitate until the hour of feeding returns.

We will close this article with a remark respecting the drover's business. It should always be a standing rule with the farmer to have his stock, when taken to market, driven as little as possible. The loss of fat sustained by animals too far driven, is very great. Some gentlemen in Great Britain have tested this matter. Five sheep were sent from Wainfleet to London, to walk the whole distance, and five sheep were kept at home. Each lot weighed the same exactly, but when both lots were killed, it was found that the lot driven on foot had lost 60 lbs., while there was a gain on the lot at home of 14–1-2 lbs. So that the real loss was 74 1-2 lbs., on the five sheep. The plan should be to take them in conveyance, whenever it is practicable. If a farmer drives his fattened stock 25 miles on foot, when he could have taken them by railroad or steamboat, he becomes a great looser.

Cows will show their pleasure at seeing those who have been kind to them, by moving their ears gently, and putting out their wet noses. My old horse rests his head on the gate with great complacency when he sees me coming, expecting to receive an apple or a piece of bread. I should even be sory to see my poultry and pigs get out of my way with any symptoms of fear.

Biographical.

"Have pity upon me, have pity upon me, O ye my friends, for the hand of God hath touched me." Job 19-21.

We think with a great degree of propriety the language of this eminent servant of God may be adapted by our society in this place. For in the past year 5 of our number have been consigned to the Grave in this place, and those among our best and most active members. Some of their Deaths have already been noticed in the Recorder the design of this is to notice others—Sister Mary Sayer, wife of Br. John Sayer, died on the 28, Aug. last, in the 30th year of her age. Sister was a native of the Island of Guernsey, and came to this country in 1820. She embraced religion in 1830, and united with the Methodist Church. In 1841 she came to this Town, and by her christian walk and conversation she endeared herself to all who knew her. The theme on which she loved most to dwell was Jesus. On one occasion during her last affliction she said to me, O Br. N. you do not know how glad I am to have some one talk to with about my blessed Master. O that more would come to talk with me about Jesus." on another occasion she said, "I think it very doubtful about my recovering, I have had some desire to live for the sake of my Husband and Children, but I have now given them into the hands of God, and I am willing to live or die, manifesting the most perfect resignation. Sister S. was a Christian indeed and in truth; an affectionate Wife, and a tender Mother. She has left a kind Husband, 3 children, a large circle of friends, and the Church to mourn her loss. But we doubt not she has exchanged the cross for a Harp of lucid gold.

Died, on Tuesday, Sept. 8, Henry Fesler sen, aged 75 years, Br. F. was the father of Br. A. Fesler whom we buried about one year ago. He was a Native of South Carolina. He embraced religion in the early part of life and united with the Presbyterian Church, but the Doctrines and usages of the Methodist Church suitiug him better, he joined the M. E. Church in 1817, and continued in that Church until the formation of the M. P. Church, when he united with it. Br. F. has been one among the most steady persevering Christians to be found, and we believe all who knew him accredited to him the character of a good man, lived in peace with all men and in communion with his Maker. His voice cheered his Brethren in Class and Lovefeast Meeting. In a word, he was one of the excellent of the Earth. But he has gone—gone home to his reward. He has left an aged Wife and large family of children to mourn his loss. But in life he taught them by precept and example the path in which they should go, and a goodly number of them are following therein and O, may God conduct them safely through this life that they may at last meet him in the New Jerusalem above. Amen. As a church, we feel deeply afflicted. May God sanctify these afflictions to our spiritual good.

I. Nichols.

Cambridge, O, Sept, 21, 1846.

Died, at Hamersville, O. Sept. 13th, Reason Thomas, only son of Rev. Walter G. and Jane Fowler, aged one year and four months. The sickness which occasioned the death of this lovely child, was long and lingering. The setting of the conference drew near. Br. Fowler thought he should not dare leave the child to be gone so long, and at so great a distance though he felt an unusual interest in once more seeing his dear Brethren and fellow labourers in Conference. The morning arived; and several brethren met at Hamersville to start on their way. Br. Fowler was encouraged by his friends and companion to start, as the child was no worse. He sat out on his way, but alas, he had no more time than was nessesary to greet his brethren of the conference, when the message of the dark seal arrived conveying the heavy intelligence that his son's death was hourly looked for. We watched its feeble pulse with interest, desiring its stay on earth till its Father could reach home. Our desire was realized—Its Father came—soon it closed its eyes on all below. This was early on Sabbath morning—in the evening it was carried to the church, followed by a long train of mourners, where we had the privilege of addressing a large assembly on the occasion. So lies the little stranger in its grave. But its spirit rests in paradise.

Ere sin could blight or sorrow fade,
Death came with friendly care;
The opening bud to heaven conveyed
And bade it blossom there.

T. S. Johnson.

Hamersville, O. Sept. 14th 1846.

Departed this life at his residence in Groton, N. H., on Wednesday 9th inst., at half past 6 o'clock, A. M., Mr. John Norris, aged 81 years and 5 months.

He was born in Epping, N. H., and lived in that town until of age, when he went to the new State of Vermont. For five years he formed a part of the suite of Surveyor General Whitlaw, and was with him in the survey of all the northern towns of that State, then a dreary wilderness. In 1791 he and a brother purchased farms in the town of Chelsea, in that State, then entirely a wilderness, but since the shire-town of Orange Co. On new year's day, 1792, he married Miss Hannah Kelley, of Epping. On the same day his two only sisters were married, Priscilla to Abel, and Leah to Joseph Heath, brothers all of whom, with himself, moved at once to their new homes in the wilds of Vermont. He was the youngest of five brothers, all of whom, with one exception, became his neighbors in Vermont. He resided thirty-five years in Chelsea, where he had born a family of eight sons and three daughters; the eldest of these sons is the editor of this paper. In process of time his brothers all died, and his sons and daughters removed to the then town of Boston. Feeling lonesome, he removed to Groton, N. H., in the vicinity of some family connections, in which place he continued until his death. His widow, seven sons and two daughters survive him. The deceased was a man of very considerable muscular power, with great energy of character, well suited to the hardy enterprize of turning the wilderness into comfortable human habitation. His sons benefitted by his indomitable energy, and the habits of industry which he taught them. Tho' afflicted for years with an asthmatic affection, his health was nearly always good, and his hearing and eyesight were perfect as in youth, till death. Until the Wednesday previous to his death, he was almost as regularly busied with the affairs of the farm, as was his son who took care of him. On that day he was violently attacked with cholera morbus, and was at once brought to death's door. Such remedies as checked this disease, unfavorably affected his asthma, and he gradually sank under the weight of age and disease, until finally he ceased to breathe.

Through a long life he manifested a spirit of deep devotion to, and high trust in God. For more than fifty years he was a member of the Methodist Episcopal Church; in the early part of his life, holding the office of leader and exhorter. Indeed, his labors were large in the early establishment of Methodism in Vermont, joining the church at the same time as did the Langdons and Lucases, who afterwards emigrated to Cincinnati, Marietta, and Columbus, Ohio, and who became the pioneers of Methodism, civilization, and the settlement of that country in which they were afterwards so much distinguished.

In fine, through a long life, he was an exemplary and faithful servant of God, and died with a good hope, full of immortality. His reason continued until the last, and his power of speech until a very few minutes before he ceased to breathe. Four of his sons and one of his daughters stood around his death-bed; two were compelled to leave for this city, about two hours before he expired, at which time he conversed freely, and with his usual strength of voice. Fifteen minutes before he died, he asked to be raised in the bed, where he was bolstered and supported, after which he never spoke or made any effort, but his breathing, though apparently easy, became shorter with intervals, until the wheels of life stopped forever; he died without a struggle or a groan. A smile was on his aged countenance, and he had the appearance of a healthy sleep. He has left a widow, nine children, forty-eight grandchildren, and six great-grandchildren. We hope his descendants will imitate his virtues, live as useful lives, and meet death as peacefully and as full of good hope.—Olive Branch.

ORGANIZATION AT LEBANON O.

Br J. M. Young, Pres. Ohio Conference.—Some two hours after the rise of Conference a committee from Lebanon arrived at Springfield with a petition from forty two members of the M. E. Church in that place, asking for a minister to come immediately and organize them into a Methodist Protestant Society.

On the Wednesday morning after the rise of conference I started from Springfield in company with Br. O. Warrington. Reached Lebanon Thursday in the afternoon, commenced a protracted meeting at candlelight. After Sermon we invited all who wished to go into the new organization to come forward. Sixty-one presented themselves. We continued to labor here without other aid till the Thursday following, when Br. Joel Dalby came from the City (Cin.) to help us. He labored one week at this place before he left. As a result of our labors, a Station of one hundred and twenty-two members with a prospect of good increase, has been organized. The society divided into five classes, elected Trustees and Stewards and organized a Quarterly Conference. They have purchased a lot and are going to erect a Church forty feet by sixty the Basement above ground. At one of the business meetings a Sabbath school Committee called on four Young Ladies to present subscriptions to the People to raise money to purchase a Methodist Protestant Sabbath School Library, & from the labor of one afternoon they reported forty three dollars. The library is now in possession of the school. The school is nearly one hundred strong and under the care of a valuable superintendent. I trust the Lord will make this school a nursery for his Kingdom.

I returned from Lebanon, spent the Sabbath at Port William and Painterville. Preached Monday night at Mount Pleasant, left Tuesday for Cincinnati Circuit—spent the first night in wilmington with Br. A. Jones. He says he is not afraid of going to hell because some members calling themselves Methodist Protestants are slave holders away down South. Spent one Sabbath on the Circuit—found a pleasant Christian people there—returned home found Br. R. M. Dalby, on the circuit. After mature deliberation it was concluded for Br. Dalby to go to Lebanon Br. Warrington, to Cincinnati circuit and myself to continue on Port William circuit. You will hear from this circuit soon.

Yours in haste,
R. Rose.

Port William, O., Oct. 14, 1846.

Bucyrus, O., Oct. 16, 1846.

Br. Bassett: I would inform the President, and friends of our Zion, that I have been twice around my circuit, and am well pleased with my field of labor. The brethren have received me with open hearts, and have embraced me in the arms of Christian love. Our united prayers are offered up to the God of all grace, that the cloud of his mercy may gather and fill the entire circuit. For this, I have relinquished domestic enjoyments, and the burden of my soul is that God may bless my labors, amongst this dear people. There are many poor sinners here that must be saved by grace or lost forever. My soul cannot bear the idea of meeting them at the Judgment, without having done my duty here. Pardon this digression—my mind is carried to that awful scene that awaits both ministers and people.

Our first quarterly meeting was held at Broken Sword, commencing the 10th inst. We had a very pleasant time, but destitute of ministerial aid from any of our itinerant brethren, we were compelled to conclude our meeting on Monday evening. There were no accessions to the church, but good was done in the awakening of those that slept in sin, and in the reviving of the church. We had an interesting love feast on Sabbath morning, and a very solemn time while commemorating our Lord's death. Bless the Lord for the privilege. My soul magnifies him that he ever instituted that blessed means of grace. Our local brethren were in attendance. Brothers G. Reed and W. Schultz, took hold like men working for God. Upon the whole, I think we have nothing to fear. Peace pervades our borders. The cloud of contention has passed, and has ceased to trouble our Zion in this region.

The Christian Pulpit.

Mr. Edward Jerningham, in an "Essay on the eloquence of the pulpit," full of interesting matter, observes:—"The custom of commencing a sermon with quoting the chapter and verse of a text, has generally obtained: but where the text is long, and has something adapted to arouse the imagination, it appears to me that the omission of the usual form would have a better effect. Suppose the preacher were to take for his text the words of St. Paul, relative to the Resurrection, containing five verses, how powerfully would he burst on the attention of his audience, if, without reference to the chapter and verse, he were to pronounce with an impressive voice and manner, these august words; "Behold, I show you a mystery"! &c. To give another instance, I will imagine a preacher encircled with a congregation, for the purpose of hearing a charity sermon. I will imagine that, instead of the customary dull and dry citation of the chapter and verse, he should command attention with this portion of holy writ: "Come ye blessed of my Father," &c., pronouncing by heart, in a solemn, impressive tone, the seven verses. Would not this be a more decisive method of awakening and captivating expectation? Would it not be sounding the key-note which is to predominate through the whole of the discourse?" (Your present correspondent adopted the mode with good effect in using the passage for a charity sermon; and he is tempted to add here, that he devoutly longs to have less of the "dry bones" and more of the flesh and blood" of preaching and praying in the Christian pulpit.)

"Other texts (says Mr. Jerningham) of a similar tendency will offer themselves to the selection of a discerning preacher." "I must also profess myself a warm advocate for the practice of the pious and learned Dr. Watts, who, at the close of any weighty sentence, was accustomed to suspend his voice, that, by the intervention of an impressive pause, the sentiment might sink deep into the heart. I am reminded to observe here, that the splitting the subject into different members, and informing the audience how each division is to be treated, is an injudicious and defective method. This babbling anticipation destroys expectancy, that active principle of the human mind. How often have I been disgusted with a tedious bill of fare to a meagre entertainment." (Mr. Jerningham's remarks remind your correspendent of another characteristic exponent of sermons, which has often suggested a foregone conclusion to his mind, namely, when the preacher begins his discourse with—"These words"—the text that is—a very frequent begining, he has generally found them to be a prologue to a dry, dull sermon,

> "As the good parson's quiet sermon grows:
> First calmly settles on some moral text,
> Then creeps from one division to the next."
> Hayley.)

"Respecting the length of time that should be devoted to a sermon, no invariable regulations can be adopted, as some subjects require more expansion than others. Are not our preachers, Sir, too fixed and uniform in their half-hour discourses?" In that entertaining collection of Dryden's prose works, enriched with notes by Mr. Malone, I meet with the following information:—"An hour measured by an hour-glass fixed by the side of the pulpit, was the usual length of a sermon at this time."—Anno 1655. When attention is led captive, the road seems short; conciseness may degenerate into improper brevity. The sermons of Dr. Ogden, and of Dr. Gregory, chaplain to the celebrated Bishop of Llandaff, are subject to this flattering objection. A secret charm is sometimes diffused over a composition, for which the English language has no appellation, but which, by the French, is denominated unction. This secret charm is of too aerial a nature to be bound by the chains of a definition. It is not that elegant urbanity which pervades the delightful Letters of Sevigne; it is not that insinuating grace which enamels the pages of Addison; it is not that amenity which, like a silver stream, glides through the discourses of Atterbury; but it is rather that mild magic, that gentle fascination, that endearing simplicity, which characterizes the writings of the Evangelists. He who shall pursue them with enamored perseverance, may (while he strengthens his conviction of their truth by the outward sign) acquire some portion of that affectionate eloquence for which there are no precepts of composition, and of which there is no parallel. —London Inquirer.

Inscription on a Minister's Study Door.—Rev. Mr. Dilserr, a distinguished and devoted pastor at Nurenburg, who died in the year 1669, and who is known as the author of various excellent devotional works, wrote, for the information of his visitors, the following inscription above the door of his study:—

"Stand still, dear guest!—do not knock not or disturb me, unless the highest necessity requires it. Know that the morning hours are dedicated to my God and the business of my office. But, if thou art desirous of conversing with me on a subject that is worthy of any consumption of the precious time, then call in the afternoon; but remember! we must render an account to God for every hour."

If every pastor does not write and fasten this admonition on his study door, how often is he prompted to utter it, when hour after hour is stolen from him by impertinent intrusion! Let his good friends and parishioners remember his morning hours are for God and study, and all other hours only for worthy subjects of conversation.

ANECDOTE.

The Rev. Mr. McNeile, of Liverpool, in a lecture recently delivered by him, introduced the following anecdote:

I will tell you a circumstance which occurred lately in this town. A journeyman house-painter, who had long entertained infidel sentiments, and was addicted to corresponding bad practices, was employed in his trade on a house nearly opposite to mine. From his elevated position, he saw over my blind into my study, and he observed me at my work. The next morning, at an early hour, he saw the same. This attracted his attention; and the third morning he came still earlier, but I was before him. He ascertained who I was and he kept watching me over the blind every morning while his job opposite to me lasted. In the mean time, as I learned afterwards, he began to reason with himself, saying, "This gentleman must be in earnest, however, right or wrong;" and he said, moreover, "The result of all this reading and writing so early, morning after morning, must, I should think, be worth hearing. I will go and hear what he has to say." Accordingly he came to my church. He heard me describe the aching anxieties of the human soul, not to be satisfied with any created thing, but aching still, and longing for repose until it found it in the bosom of the living God. He heard me describe the way in which a God of holiness can admit a sinner to such repose, the way in which a sinner may enjoy that holy communication. His heart was touched; the secret cause of his infidelity was detected; it was not a want of evidence in the revelation of God, but a want of willingness in man to be conformed to the character of God. Before a rising willingness to be holy all the skepticism of his intellect disappeared; and, instead of a sullen infidel, he is, I have reason to hope, a happy, cheerful Christian.

The Clergy.—The New York Convention, by a vote of 77 to 33, give Ministers a right to hold civil or military offices, from which they have been excluded by the Constitution of that State.—

The convicts confined in the Massachusetts State Prison have contributed upwards of four hundred and fifty volumes, besides a large number of tracts, religious periodicals, temperance papers, etc., as a donation to the convicts in the State Prison of Illinois.

The approaches of sin are like the conduct of Jael. "It brings butter in a lordly dish." It bids high for the soul. But when it has fascinated and lulled the victim, the nail and hammer are behind.—Cecil.

Temperance Department.

From Scott's Weekly Paper.

A grand mass meeting of the friends of temperance, convened in New York, on Monday afternoon in the Park, and continued in session through the afternoon and evening. A number of very distinguished advocates of the temperance cause were present upon the occasion, among whom we notice the Hon. James Harper, Hon. T. A. Woodruff, Gov. Briggs, of Massachusetts, Hon. Theodore Frelinghuysen, Alven Stewart, Esq., and others. There was a large stage erected in front of the City Hall, the American flag floated from the central staff on the Hall, and on the balcony, a banner, with the rainbow overarching the head of Washington, the American eagle, and stars and stripes, and a dove bearing the olive branch of peace in its beak. The Hon. Ogden Hoffman acted as President. Interesting addresses were delivered by Rev. Dr. Bowling, Rev Mr. Marsh, Rev Mr. Chambers, of this city, Messrs. Manchester, Cochran and others.

In New York state, they are prosecuting rigorously, all who violated the new Excise law.

The territorial government of Oregon have gone in strongly for temperance By a late act of their legislature, they make the offence of introducing ardent spirits into the territory to sell, trade, barter, or give, or for offering to do either, punishable with a fine of $50 for each and every offence. Section second provides for the fining of any one who hereafter may sell, trade, barter, or give, or offer to do either, punishable by a fine of $20. Section third provides for the indicting, and fining on conviction, of any one who shall erect a manufactory or distillery in the territory, as for a nuisance, by a sum of $100. And the Court shall direct the Sheriff to seize and destroy the distillery apparatus, which order the sheriff shall execute.

A circular, signed, by a committee appointed at a meeting of the friends of temperance in Baltimore, has been addressed to the several candidates to represent Baltimore in the Senate and House of delegates of Maryland. The circular desires to know, whether, if elected, they will or will not give their support to a bill which will submit to the votes of the people in wards or districts, the question, whether or not licenses for the sale of intoxicating liquors within said wards or districts, shall be granted. To this circular, Messrs. Kennedy, Patterson, Harris and Bayley, on the Whig ticket, have given what appear to be considered, satisfactory answers—whilst exception is taken to the replies of Messrs. Keyser and Simms, on the same ticket.

The Common Council of Roxborough, Mass. have resolved to co-operate, with the Mayer of that city, in his endeavors and efforts to suppress the sale of intoxicating liquors. And in case the present Executive power should prove insufficient to prevent its sale, they have pledged themselves to unite cordially with the other branches of Government, in adopting measures to obtain such additional power as may be deemed necessary.

Fifty-five persons have been indicted by the Grand Jury, for selling liquor, at Rochester.

The inhabitants of Worcester, in the same State, a few days ago had a public meeting to suppress the same evil if possible. The people of Massachusetts are waking up in earnest to the importance of the suppression of the rum trade,—to the cause of Temperence. Maine is also as alive to the important subject as her sister State. The new anti-license law went into effect last Wednesday, and prosecutions for breaches of it, no doubt, will soon become quite common.

Steam—its Innovations—Visitors—The Magnitude of the Lake, height, Clearness of its Waters—Agates, &c.

Copper Harbor, Sept. 2, 1846.

My Dear L:—The "Julia Palmer" is now fairly afloat upon the waters of Lake Superior; and the other night, the aforesaid "Fire Ship," as the Indians call her, came plowing into the harbor, much to the gratification of our little community. The event was ushered in by the discharge of cannon, to say nothing of small arms. The following day, I took a trip in her, as far up as Eagle River, and can bear testimony to the comfort of her accommodations and the gentlemanly deportment of her officers.—Julia, though somewhat stricken in years, hath yet a good constitution, and with skilful managers, can ride out the stiffest gale.

Since the introduction of steam upon the lake, I regard one half of the distance between us and the "States" as annihilated.—Weeks will not elapse, as heretofore, without our learning what has transpired in the great world below. The "Serious Accident" will be seriously read by us, on these shores, shortly after its occurence—

> "The grand debate,
> The popular harrangue, the tart reply,
> The logic and the wisdom, and the wit,
> And the loud laugh"

will be duly conned and appreciated here, while the tones of the speakers are still fresh in the recollection of the hearer. Fond du Lac and Sault Ste Marie are brought into proximity, and that voyage, which, a few years ago, required months to perform, can now be accomplished in as many days. Such are the advantages of Steam; but it has its disadvantages. We lose sight of, or see as through a glass darkly, some of the grandest scenery in the world. The towering cliffs, the leaping water-falls, the gloomy cedars, the clear rivulet, the "Grand Sables"—all are passed without observation, and the traveller sees only the termini of the route. The tent and the blanket will soon be superseded by the bunk and the mattrass. Four years ago, we might coast from the head to the foot of the lake, without meeting a white man, except at L'Ance, and La Pointe. Now, we see, every where along the shores, the marks of the axe; that precursor, or rather, accompaniment of civilization.

This region is becoming quite a place of resort. Men come here, not merely in pursuit of copper, but to drink the clear water of the lake, and snuff the pure breezes that play upon its surface. Ladies even, accustomed to all the refinements of civilized life, have favored us with their smiles, and, on leaving, expressed themselves much gratified with their visit. Men of high scientific attainments—geologists, botanists, entomologists, et id omne genus, have resorted here to gratify a laudable curiosity, so that the probability is that the rocks and plants, the fish, and even the bugs of this region will, ere long, be accurately discussed. Among others who have been amongst us, may be mentioned M. Ed. Verneuil, the distinguished President of the Geological Society of France, who, in the pursuit of his favorite science, has explored the greater portion of Russia and Siberia as well as northern Africa.—He was recently in Zanesville, and I hope some one took the trouble to show him the flora of our coal-field. Mr. Caleb Cushing has also arrived, and will penetrate through to the Mississippi.

The exploration of Lake Superior affords a large field for investigation. It is, following the meanderings, about 1600 miles in circumference, and elevated 627* feet above tide water, Its average depth, estimated by Captain Bayfield, is 792 feet; But soundings have been made in the vicinity of Isle Royal to the depth of 1200 feet without reaching bottom. Its waters are cold, and probably, in mid summer, do not attain a higher temperature than 45. Nothing can exceed them in purity and transparency. In coasting, I have often amused myself in looking over the gunwale of the boat, down, down into the depths of the lake. The secrets of the deep lie revealed: veins of spar, rivalling the hues of the rainbow, stretching far out, caverns whose depths the rays of the sun cannot pierce, pebbles of amathyst and agate and cornelian, strewn about upon the rocky floor, and mocking your efforts to grasp them. One realizes the dream of Clarence:

> "Methought I saw a thousand fearful wrecks,
> A thousand men that fishes gnawed upon;
> Wedges of gold, great anchors, heaps of pearl,
> Inestimable stores, unrivalled jewels,
> Are scatter'd in the bottom of the sea.
> Some lay in dead men's skull's, and in the holes
> Where eyes did once inhabit, there were cup'd
> (As 'twere in scorn of eyes) reflecting gems
> That woo'd the slimy billows of the deep,
> And mock'd the dead bones that lay scattered by."

Speaking of agates: they are generally found in the pebbles that are washed up by the lake, and it is amusing to see with what intense eagerness the visitors cull over the pebbles in search of these precious stares. They occur in situ. in connexion with the trap, and generally assume the ribon form. I have picked up some beautiful specimens during the past season for distribution among my friends.

The lake, during the summer, has been remarkably calm, but within the last week, boisterous winds have prevailed. The weather has come off cold, and we may soon look for frosts and snows. Like the bird, I shall soon wing my way to a more genial climate.

The latest copper news here, is the discovery of a mass of detached copper, on the Ontonagon River, far surpassing, in magnitude, the one which was transported to Washington a year or two ago.

The boat is off for the upper part of the lake, and I must close abruptly. F.

THE YANKEE GIRL.

BY J. G. WHITTIER.

She sings by her wheel, at that low cottage door,
Which the long evening shadow is stretching before,
With a music as sweet as a music which seems Breathed softly and faint in the ear of our dreams.

How brilliant and mirthful the light of her eye,
Like a star glancing out from the blue of the sky;
And lightly and freely her dark tresses play
O'er a brow and a bosom as lovely as they.

Who comes in his pride to that low cottage door—
The haughty and rich to the humble and poor?
'Tis the great Southern planter—the master who waves
His whip of dominion o'er hundreds of slaves.

"Nay, Ellen—for shame! let those Yankee fools spin
Who would pass for our slaves with a change of their skin:
Let them toil as they will, at the loom or the wheel,
Too stupid for shame, and too vulgar to feel!

But thou art too lovely, and precious a gem,
To be bound to their burdens, and sullied by them;
For shame, Ellen!—shame!—cast thy bondage aside,
And away to the South, as my blessing and pride!

Oh, come where no winter thy footsteps can wrong,
But where flowers are blossoming all the year long;
Where the shade of the palm-tree is over my home,
And the lemon and orange are white in their bloom.

Oh, come to my home, where my servants shall all Depart at thy bidding, and come at thy call;
They shall heed thee as mistress with trembling and awe,
And each wish of thy heart shall be felt as a law."

Oh, could ye have seen her—that pride of our girls,
Arise and cast back the dark wealth of her curls:
With a scorn in her eye which the gazer could feel,
And a glance like the sunshine that flashes on steel!

"Go back, haughty Southern! thy treasures of gold
Are dim with the blood of the hearts thou has sold!
Thy home may be lovely—but round it I hear
The crack of the whip and the footsteps of fear.

And the sky of the South may be brighter than ours,
And greener thy landscapes and fairer thy flowers;
But dearer the blast 'round our mountains which raves,
Than the sweet summer zephyrs which breathe over slaves.

Full low at thy bidding thy negroes may kneel,
With the iron of bondage on spirit and heel;
Yet know that the Yankee Girl sooner would be
In fetters with them, than in freedom with thee!"

Good Advice to Young Women.—Trust not to uncertain riches, but prepare yourselves for every emergency in life. Learn to work; and not be dependant on servants to make your bread, sweep your floors and darn your own stockings. Above all do not esteem too lightly those honorable young men who sustain themselves and their aged parents by the work of their own hands, while you care and receive into your company those lazy, idle pop-injays, who never lift a finger to help themselves, as long as they can keep body and soul together and get sufficient to live in fashion. If you are wise you will look at this subject in the light that we do; and when you are old enough to become wives, you will prefer the honest mechanic, with not a cent to commence life, to the fashionable loafer, with a capital of ten thousand dollars. Whenever we hear remarked, 'Such a young lady has married a fortune,' we always tremble for her future prospects. Riches left to children by wealthy parents often turn a curse instead of a blessing. Young women remember this, and instead of sounding the purse of your lovers and examing the cut of their coats, look into their habits and hearts. Mark if they have trades, and can depend upon themselves—see if they have minds which will lead them to look above a butterfly existence. Talk not of the beautiful white skin and the soft delicate hand, the splendid form, and the fine appearance of the young gentleman. Let not these foolish considerations engross your thoughts.

Afflictions are God's workmen on our hearts to pull down the pride and carnal security of them; and being so, their nature is changed; they are turned into blessings and benefits.

THE USE OF THE BIBLE.

A little boy had often amused himself by looking over the pictures of a large Bible; and his mother one day said to him, "John, do you know the use of the Bible?" He said, "No, mother." "Then John be sure to ask your father," was the advice his mother gave him. Soon afterwards, when his father came home, John ran up to him, and said, "I should like to know, father, what is the use of the Bible?" His father said, I'll tell you another time, John." The boy appeared disappointed, and walked away wondering why his father did not answer the question directly.

A few days after, the father took his son to a house where there was a woman very ill in bed, and began to talk to the poor afflicted woman, who said that she had suffered a great deal of pain, but hoped that she was resigned to the will of God. "Do you think," said the father, "that God does right to permit you to feel so much pain?" "Oh, yes," answered the woman, "for God is my heavenly father, who loves me, and I am sure that one who loves me so much, would not permit me to suffer as I do, if it were not for my good." He then said, "How is it that you find your sufferings do you good?" She replied, "My sufferings are good for my soul; they make me more humble, more patient; they make me feel the value of the Savior more, and they make me pray more." John had been very attentive to this conversation, and the tears stood in his eyes while the afflicted woman was talking. His father looked at him and then said to the woman, "My good woman, can you tell me the use of the Bible?" In an instant, John cast his eyes toward the woman, while his face showed that he was extremely eager to hear her answer. The woman, with a stronger voice than before, said, "Oh, sir, the Bible has been my comfort in my affliction." "There, John," said his father, "now you know the use of the Bible: it can give us comfort when we most need it."

Biographical.

MRS. SUSAN CLANCY.

Dear Br. Bassett: I have just returned from the house of mourning, and now sit down to communicate to you a few facts concerning the late illness and death of Mrs. Susan Clancy, consort of Rev. George Clancy, who expired in peace this morning, about 3 o'clock, after a lingering affliction of nearly eight weeks.

Mrs. Clancy was taken ill, of bilious remittent fever, immediately after adjournment of the Muskingum Annual Conference, at the house of Mr. Isaac Abdel, whose family, being old acquaintances and friends, she had come to visit. The fever continued about two weeks, when other symptoms supervened, seriously threatning her life. These symptoms, which it would be unnecessary to relate in this notice, continued upwards of two weeks, after which she obtained entire relief from them, the fever having previously subsided. In the meantime, she was attacked of gangrenous ulcers, which, owing to the emaciated condition of her system, and the accidental loss of blood by haemorrhage, continued to increase until her death.

I attended her during her sufferings. Three other physicians were called in consultation, one of whom attended with me a greater part of the time; and no means or pains were spared, which could have been available. Owing to the peculiarity of her condition, in the commencement of the fever, it was apprehended that her life was in imminent danger; and, although the symptoms, at different times, inspired a hope of a favorable crises, the event has proved that such apprehension was but too well founded. She had the unwearied attention of Mrs. Abdel, who, with those of her friends that could be with her, made every effort to promote her comfort and recovery.

The following memoranda have been furnished by Br. Clancy:

"Mrs. Susan Clancy was born in Brooke Co. Va. 1815. Her parents were John and Charlotte Choffey, both members of the Methodist E. Church. They removed to Beach Flatt's Jefferson Co. O., when Susan was quite young. She obtained religion and joined the M. E. Church when she was about 13 years of age, and was an exemplary member of that church until 1837, when she was married, and joined with her husband the Methodist Prot. Church. She was faithful as a Christian; affectionate as a mother; and dutiful as a wife.

"About an hour before her death, she had a hard spasm—was greatly agitated for a few moments. My mind was almost terrified at her going off in that state: but soon the scene was changed. She became calm;—she saw that death was near; and clasping her emaciated hands, said, "Tell mother Clancy to take my little boy and keep him." She repeatedly said, in a lively and quite cheerful tone, "I am happy!" She said, "Tell mother Clancy I hope to meet her in heaven," and added, "I hope to meet sister Abdel there;" and then exclaimed, "Glory! glory! glory!" until her voice sunk, as we thought to rise no more. After a short time she revived, and for some thirty minutes talked delightfully of her precious Saviour, and of meeting her three children in heaven, and said she would see her Saviour there, "and He is best of all."

"All agitation of her body suddenly ceased;—I was looking her full in her face;—she clasped my hand; and with the most pleasant smile I ever saw her wear, exclaimed three times, "Farewell! I am going home." Then clasping sister Abdel's hand, repeating the same, and immediately ceased to brethe, without a struggle, or even a motion of any part of her frame;—so that we knew not the instant she ceased to brethe;—I even spoke to her when she was quite gone, supposing her to be still alive.

"She has left one son, three years old; an aged mother: three brothers, and two sisters; to mourn her loss."

Considering how greatly she suffered, both in duration and intenseness, sister Clancey was very patient. I do not remember to have heard her complain, though I saw her more than twice a day, on an average, for fifty three days.

Her remains were taken this afternoon to the house of her father-in-law, near Alexandria, seven miles from Steubenville where they will be interred to morrow at 12 o'clock M., after a funeral sermon by Rev. E. S. Hoagland.

Had any one particularly acquainted with the deceased from early youth, attempted to give a sketch of her life, which I have done, for want of information, no doubt many interesting and touching incidents could have been related, which would have been both agreeable and instructive. There is in most minds, a pleasing melancholy associated with such reminiscences, especially when they are connected with innocence and purity of character. The naturally suggest to the mind, the days of our own youthful innocence and pleasures, before the vanity, and treachery, and heartlessness of the world had made their impression upon our moral feelings.

[We learn by the subjoined communication, of the death of another respected old friend. Br. John Collier was a man of most inoffensive and amiable disposition. We had the honor to receive him into society in 1835, when for the first time superintendant of Lawrenceburg circuit. We have ever since had an agreeable acquaintance, and ever considered Br. C. a valuable member of society. He was a master of vocal music, and his services were much appreciated as leader of the singing at the Tanners Creek Chapels. But he has gone, we trust to join the anthems above, where we hope to join him by and by. [Ed.

JOHN COLLIER.

Br. Bassett: With sorrowful feelings I sit down to inform you of the death of my revered Father, who departed this life on the evening of the 26th day of Sept. Sometime in Aug. he had an attack of the Bilious Fever, which reduced him very low, but he had recovered so as to go out doors and attend somewhat to domestic concerns, when he was violently attacked with the Diarrhea. His system being so feeble, and being greatly troubled with sickness at the stomach medical aid was unavailing in restoring him. Well, our father is gone, but he has gone to a land of rest. Throughout his illness, which continued about three weeks, he was calm and tranquil—perfectly reconciled to the Lord's will. On being asked a few days before he died if he was happy, replied, "Yes, I am filled with love—love to God and all mankind." This was a cherished sentiment with him, and a common expression in life. Love to God and all mankind.

For a few days before he died, he was scarcely able to articulate so as to be understood, yet when a friend would approach his bedside, he would reach forth his feeble hand, and make an effort to impart a word of encouragement or admonition: and, although at times he was not able to speak, or be understood, yet, the lively and indescribable expression of his countenance, would indicate the deep feeling, and the warm and unutterable emotion of his heart. He retained his reason nearly to the last, and quietly breathed his life out without a struggle.

My father, was born in Yorkshire England in January, 1775, which would make him nearly 72 years old. He was a member of the Methodist Church in England, but after he came to this country he did not join any church, until he joined the Methodist Protestant Church at a camp meeting on Tanner's Creek, in what year, I am not able to say. He emigrated to this country in the year 1819.

Yours in love,
R. Collier.

TREBIZOND.

LETTER FROM MR. POWERS, Apr. 30.

Persecution at Trebizond.

[The following extract will give Christians in this country some idea of the sufferings of their brethren for the truth's sake, in some distant lands where persecution reigns. Ed. W. R.]

For several weeks subsequent to my last communication, our native brethren were constantly annoyed, insulted, abused, and oppressed; and the most persevering efforts were made to induce them to sign a paper prepared by the Patriarch, purporting to be a confession, but which, in truth, was a recantation of the faith. Several were anathematized; some were thrown out of employ; some were deserted by their customers; some were thrust from their houses; in one instance a matrimonial engagement was broken off by order of the vartabed; live coals were thrown upon one in the street; the individual spoken of in my last was left in prison, (he has since been set at liberty;) while all were kept in constant fear of still more terrible calamities threatened by the ecclesiastics. For several Sabbaths our chapel was deserted, none attending exeept the three or four connected with our two families.

All these measures, however, failed to induce the brethren to comply. Only a few had signed the paper mentioned above; and those few, with the exception of one who had taken back his signature, were among the more doubtful and less influential brethren. In the meantime our scattered auditors began to return to our deserted chapel, and our prospects began to brighten again. Thus these persecuting measures had been prosecuted for nearly three months without producing the desired effect. The thousand petty annoyances, practised on the brethren had failed; anathemas had failed; imprisonment had failed; exile had failed. All this was annoying in the extreme to the persecutors, They resolved, therefore, on more stringent measures.

Accordingly, about three weeks ago, a young man who has suffered greatly from family friends, was called before the vartabed; and, on his refusing to sign the above paper, was beaten with rods on the soles of his feet, his father being present, and giving his sanction. The beating not being done quite to the vartabed's satisfaction, he selected some rods himself, and applied them with his own hand. After which the young man was thrown into a miserable stable as a prison; water was plentifully poured upon the cold and damp ground on which he stood; his hands were tied behind him by the two thumbs; a rope was passed round his shoulders, and fastened to a beam over his head; in this torturing condition he was left to stand for the night. Orders were also issued that no one should give him bread. After a day or two spent in this condition, with some mitigations, and being repeatedly importuned to sign, with the most terrific threatening in case he should persist in his refusal, the suffering young man was prevailed on to yield. The persecutors had now gained their object. But this was so new a thing in the history of persecution in this city, that they deemed it prudent to wait a few days, to ascertain whether any remonstrance would come from any quarter. It had been confidently believed that the bastinado would not be resorted to, but in this we were mistaken. Even some of the persecutors themselves were taken by surprise.

After waiting two weeks and hearing no formal complaint, they resolved to prosecute this barbarthis mode of persecution to the utmost, with a fixed and settled purpose to extort a signature of recantation from the last man who should refuse to give it, by beating and torture. Accordingly, on Thursday of last week, several men were called before the variabed and required to sign. One or two did so, and were, of course, released. Two refused to sign, and were forthwith subjected to the bastinado, and thrown into the above mentioned prison. On hearing these facts, others who were called, instead of obeying the summons, fled to my house for refuge. Others came in during the evening and night, so that before the morning ten men were lodged in our chapel; most of whom have found lodging there ever since, as also a seat at my table.

BOMBAY.

LETTER FROM MR. HUME, FEBRUARY 11, 1846.

Results of the Bombay Mission.

This day completes thirty-three years since Messrs. Hall and Nott arrived in Bombay. You know the difficulties which they had to encounter, and the various trials and embarrassments which the mission has experienced up to the present time. Some who would gladly have lived and labored here, have, by the failure of health, been obliged to return to their native land. And some, after toiling for a season, have finished their work and entered into their rest.

And have they lived and died in vain? Have the efforts and the pecuniary means which have been expended here, failed of producing any adequate results? No, there has been no failure. True, converts have not been multiplied as could have been wished, nor as they have been in some other missionary fields. Still a few have become obedient to the faith, some of whom have gone to stand in the presence of Him, whom, not having seen, they loved.

Thirty-three years ago, the doctrine of Christ crucified was unknown to the people of the Mahratta country. No portion of the sacred Scriptures had been given to them in their own language. Not a single tract from which they could learn the way of salvation, was in existence. Unbroken, unmixed darkness covered the land. The first Christian book, a scripture tract of eight pages, was printed in March 1817; and in May, 1817, the missionaries began to print the gospel of Matthew which they had translated into the Mahratta language.

Now the sound of the gospel has gone out into all the land. The people of the most distant villages have heard, at least that there is no other name under heaven given among men whereby we can be saved, but the name of Jesus. They know that the divinity of their gods, and the efficacy of all their religious observances have been called in question. Tracts and portions of Scripture have been widely distributed; and the persuasion is daily gaining ground that all other forms of religion must fall before the onward progress of the gospel. The prevailing religion has been gradually losing its hold upon the people. The influence of the Brahmnis has been greatly weakened, and in many ways, much has been done, to prepare the way of the Lord. Missionaries of other societies, who preach the same gospel as ourselves have come to labor in the field. Both the missionaries and the converts are animated with hope in regard to the future. Christians as well as the heathen feel that great and important changes are in progress; and that these changes are advancing with an accelerating speed.

While the missionaries and the churches, then, have reason to be humbled that so little has been done, they have no reason to be discouraged, Manifest and encouraging progress has been made. Instead of giving way to discouragement and relaxing our efforts, now is the time for enlarging our operations, and laboring with renewed hope and zeal.

The Field at the Present Time.

I have spoken particularly of the past; but we are now more concerned with the present and the future. Where then can you find a more open interesting and inviting field. for making known the gospel to the heathen, than that presented by the Mahratta country? Here is a Christian government, and there is but little danger of wars and commotions. The country is thickly populated, and your missionaries find free access to the people. Compared with the inhabitants of the greater portion of India, they are an intelligent independent, noble race. Hindooism is evidently on the decline. As has already been said, the expectation is becoming more and more general, even among the natives themselves, that it is to give place to Christianity. Much has been done by the translation of the Scriptures, the preparation of tracts, &c,, to facilitate the labors of future missionaries. You have here an efficient and extensive printing establishment, which is as able to meet the wants of one hundred missionaries as of eight or ten. And you fail to obtain the full benefit of such an establishment, while your missions here are left in a feeble state. In few heathen countries can the population be so generally acted on by means of the press as here, especially in the Concan, where a large portion of the people can read. In addition to what is done by the government and the missionaries, schools, supported by the people themselves, are found in all the villages of any size. In some places there are from three or four to eight or ten such schools. Here then is an opening for tracts and Scriptures, such as is not generally found in heathen lands.

Bombay itself presents a wide field for missionary operations, which as yet is very imperfectly occupied. Here are some seventy thousand Mahommedans, for whom there is not a single missionary. No one regards them as his peculiar field, devoting to them his time and energies, And the same is true of some seventy-five thousand persons speaking the Goozerattee language. Of these about twenty-five thousand are Parsees, and the remainder Hindoos; but in both cases they constitute an intelligent, wealthy, and influential class of the community. I do not mean that these are wholly neglected. The gospel is preached to them, and books are distributed among them, to some extent, by missionaries already here; but the labor bestowed upon them is incidental and limited.

But I need not enlarge further at present. May the Lord of the harvest speedily send forth laborers into this harvest. And may the Spirit from on high be poured out more abundantly upon those already here, so that the gospel preached by them may run and be glorified!

INTERESTING MISSION INTELLIGENCE.—A large assembly met at Boston last Sabbath evening, at which the venerable Dr. Beecher was present, after his recent perilous voyage from England. Letters from Syria Missions were read, containing apprehensions of fresh persecutions there. A special meeting of American ecclesiastics and rulers had been called by the Greek Bishop to devise plans for ridding the country of the Missionaries. Several American converts had been grossly outraged; and the house of the pastor at Constantinople stormed. Four Protestant organizations at Trebizond, are drawn together by sympathy under the impending persecutions, which are evidently strengthening in high places. Sir Stratford Canning, the friend of Missions is unfortunately absent from the country. The enemies of Christianity represent Turkish power as in danger from the Missionaries. The new and feeble churches expected to have greater trials and sufferings than heretofore. Mr. J. Bandt, British Consul at Erzroom, had kindly protected a missionary and converted American priest there from violence. The Greek newspapers are bitterly violent against the missionaries. Dr. King at Athens, dare not leave his own enclosures. American travellers advise him to leave, but he prefers awaiting the result of his trial before the highest Court of the nation.—N. Y. Sun.

WESTERN RECORDER.

PUTNAM, OHIO.

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 24, 1846.

MEXICO—SANTA ANNA—MORE FIGHTING EXPECTED.—Our latest intelligence from the south represents Santa Anna as about taking the field, at the head of the armies of Mexico: It is supposed that he is to have from twenty to thirty thousand men. We apprehend that we may hear soon of a requisition by our President for the balance of the fifty thousand men, as proposed at last Congress. So we are having more than "a speck of war." Is it not time that we should at last have a little more peace among ourselves?

Santa Anna, in assuming charge of the Mexican forces, talks quite valorously. In a letter addressed to Gen. Ampudia, dated Ayotla, Sept. 14, 1846, he thus writes:

> I come, then, to carry my views into operation, and in compliance with the mandate of my country. She calls me as Commander in Chief of the Army, and in that capacity I stand ready to serve. The enemy occupies our harbors—he is despoiling us of the richest of our territories, and threatens us with his domination! I go, then, to the head of the Mexican Army—an army the offspring (eijo) of a free people—and joined with it; I will fulfill my utmost duty in opposing the enemies of my country. I will die fighting, or lead the valiant Mexicans to the enjoyment of a triumph to which they are alike entitled by justice, by their warlike character, and by the dignity and enthusiasm which they have preserved of a free nation. The war is a necessity of immediate importance; every day's delay is an age of infamy; I cannot recede from the position which the nation has assigned me; I must go forward, unless I would draw upon myself the censure due to ingratitude for the favors with which I have been overwhelmed by my fellow-citizens; or, unless I would behold her humbled and suffering under a perpetuation of her misfortunes.
> Your excellency will at once perceive how great an error I should commit in assuming the supreme Majesty, when my duty calls me to the field, to fight against the enemies of the Republic. I should disgrace myself, if, when called to the post of danger, I should spring to that of power! Neither my loyalty nor my honor requires the abandonment of interests so dear to me. The single motive of my heart is to offer my compatriots the sacrifice of that blood which yet runs in my veins. I wish them to know that I consecrate myself entirely to their service, as a soldier ought to do, and am only desirous further to be permitted to point out the course by which Mexico may attain the rank to which her destinies call her.
> In marching against the enemy, and declining to accept of power, I give a proof of the sincerity of my sentiments; leaving the nation her own mistress, at liberty to dispose of herself as she sees fit. The elections for members of a Congress to form the constitution which the people wish to adopt, are proceeding. That Congress will now soon convene, and while I shall be engaged in the conflict in armed defence of her independence, the nation will place such safeguards around her liberties as may best suit herself.
> If I should permit myself for a single moment, to take the reigns of government, the sincerity of my promises would be rendered questionable, and no confidence could be placed in them.
> I am resolved that they shall not be falsified, for in their redemption I behold the general good as well as my honor as a Mexican soldier. I cannot abandon this position. The existing government has pursued a course with which the nation has shown itself content, and I have no desire to subvert it by taking its place. I feel abundant pleasure in remaining where I am, and flatter myself that the nation will applaud my choice. I shall joyfully accept such task as she shall continue to impose upon me; and while she is engaged in promoting the objects of civilization, I will brave every danger in supporting its benefits, even at the cost of my existence.
> Will your Excellency have the goodness to tender to the Supreme Government my sincere thanks for their kindness? I will personally repeat them to-morrow,—for which purpose I propose to call at the Palace. I shall there embrace my friends, and hastily press them to my heart, bid them a tender farewell, and set out for the scene of war, to lend my aid to serve my country, or perish among its ruins.
> I beg to repeat to your Excellency assurance of my continued and special esteem.
> ANTONIO LOPEZ DE SANTA ANNA.

☞We learn by letter from Dr. D. B Dorsey that Br. G. Brown, President of the Pittsburgh Conference, was so far convalescent that he was about to start on his route of appointments.

Rev. Mr. Alden, Chaplain at the Navy Yard, Brooklin, is dead.

A DISCIPLINARY QUESTION.—Br. Robinson, in behalf of enquirers in Bucyrus Circuit, requests us to state whether the church has a right to an appeal from the decision of a Committee, in case the committee clear the criminal. In answer, we have just to say, we know of no provision to this effect, and we think that whether advantageous or not, it would be a new thing in our economy. There should be an exercise of discipline in case of offences, to reclaim the offender, or put him away if incorrigible. And the church (i. e. society or class) should see that a judicious committee be selected to serve upon a triel. But in case the committee acquit the accused, even if they err in their judgment, and others think him guilty, the church cannot reasonably be reproached upon this account, nor will it be likely to suffer injury by bearing with the supposed offender, until some other cause of action may occur. And we have generally noticed that church members who were the most uneasy and urgent to get some one expelled, and not willing to remain in society unless this can be effected, were very likely to have faults themselves. "Let him that is without sin among you, first cast a stone at her." "If we would judge ourselves, we should not be judged." We speak in the way of general remark, not supposing in the least, that it will have application to members in Bucyrus circuit, for to the best of our knowledge, they have no faults at all: But we are of opinion that there should be mercy in law, and in people's hearts too. "The merciful and they only, 'shall obtain mercy.'

Aid Society, Muskingum Conference.

Br. I. Thrap, of Sandusky Circuit, has amused himself somewhat, at the expense of somebody in reference to the statement published with the Conf. Minutes in regard to the Aid Society. He says "no part surprised me more than the liberality with which the brethren present are said to have contributed to the support of the Preacher's Aid Society. Twelve of them are said to have subscribed, and some of them paid, fifty dollars each, making six hundred dollars. Thirteen others are said to have subscribed twenty-five dollars each, making three hundred and twenty-five dollars more, besides other fractional sums coming to five dollars—the whole making $935,00. Well done for the P. A. Society! But Br. Basseet, is not this too good to be true? My colleague thinks that instead of fifty dollars, it was but fifty cents each; and that instead of twenty-five dollars, it should be twenty five cents. If he be correct, you must be a smart set of fellows about that 'are office, or else you must have a smart publishing committee to prepare extracts for you. How is this matter?"

Really, this is somewhat of a joke, any how. When we got the above letter, we forthwith went and examined the manuscript Minutes, and found that the printer had followed copy—there was the dollar mark $ opposite most of the fifties and twenty-fives. So Br. T. as you did not get to the conference where all this liberality was displayed, we suppose that you are enquiring into this matter, so that you may add a round sum yourself to the amount subscribed. As you are a man of no small magnitude, and of magnanimity in due proportion, you will certainly be disposed to add your fifty, which will make nearly $1000. Dont be behind, Israel.

Seriously, we have a word of apology for the publishing committee, and for ourself. The business of the Aid Society was attended to at a night session, last day of the Conference. The entries were hastily made. On the morning after adjournment, the members were dispersing to their various destinations. The secretary called upon us at an early hour, and offered to hand us the entire minutes of the conference, (before recording in the Journals,) to save postage and the trouble of an extra transcribing. He marked the parts which were to be published, so that we supposed all would be understood. The whole was sent by private hand to Meadow Farm, where pains was taken to transcribe the parts to be published, and the same appeared in our paper whilst we were at the Pittsburgh Conference. The Publishing Committee, as above related, had not time to transcribe or revise the Minutes. The Secretary and his Assistant, are very neat and accurate pensmen, and we know they will enjoy the joke if there be any. But the entries were hastily made by night as above stated, and in the hurry of adjournment. If there be inaccuracy, as Br. T. supposes, both the Secretaries, and we, are excusable. And let some one who knows, please correct this money matter, if it is incorrect.

AGENTS AND SUBSCRIBERS. A REQUEST. As we aim at accuracy, we should be glad if our correspondents, agents, and subscribers, would inform us of any instance, in which we have names wrong either of persons or post offices. Some new counties have been organized embracing post offices to which our paper is sent. We should be glad to be informed of any changes which should be made in the address of persons. And we will be glad to make any corrections in our list, so as to have the name of every subscriber spelt right.

MICHIGAN CONFERENCE.—Br. James Gag writes from Prairie Rounde, Michigan, September 8th as follows:

"Our Conference has closed its session, and harmony and union characterized its deliberations and actions. It is impossible for this Conference to go any further with Slavery and slaveholders, but if the northern Conferences will concentrate their energies together, then this Conference will go with them unitedly. The proceedings of the Conference will doubtless reach you soon."

Br. G. writes on business, sending us names of four new subscribers, and some money in advance. He does not give us the appointments, save that his own field of labor for the coming year is Laporte, Ia. and requests us to say that Laporte, Ia. is his Post Office address.

SUDDEN DEATH.—Creig Cowden, one of the principal dairymen of Orangeville, Wyoming co., died suddenly of apoplexy on Sunday evening last.

☞Further Minutes of Ohio Conference came too late for insertion this week. We suggest to the secretary, that it would be well to announce the names of the Standing District Committee, at his convenience.

GNADENHUTTEN.—Br. C. Caddy who recently passed through this village. states that a physician assured him that every family in the place was, or recently had been sick. "Chill and fever, is considered the epidemic of the country along the Tuscarawas river, and in those regions through which the Sandy and Beaver canal is designed to pass. Many hands are now employed upon this canal. The many stagnant pools of water along this half finished work, may contribute no small share in producing so much sickness among the people."

Presidential Notice.

We are requested to state that Br. G. Clancy, President of the Muskingum District, will visit Georgetown circuit on Saturday and Sunday the 31st inst, and 1st day of November. Br. C's. health is much improved, and he will in a short time announce futher appointments through the Recorder. So says Dr. Dorsey.

ZANESVILLE CIRCUIT.—We are requested to announce that the first Quarterly Meeting will be held at Browvsville, commencing, three weeks from this day, (Saturdy,) on which occasion the new meeting house will be dedicated.

LITERARY NOTICES.

AMERICAN PULPIT.—The October No. of this admirable work has come to hand, containing, as usual, two sermons. The first is by Rev. Horace Bushnell, on the "Uses and duties of stormy Sundays," for the benefit we conclude, of fair weather hearers. What a well chosen subject. The text is Psa. 118. 8. "Fire and hail; snow and vapors; stormy wind fulfilling his word." We must try and republish that sermon, so soon as we find room. The second is by Rev. D. Curry, on the "Duty and necessity of Decision in Religion." We think very highly of the American Pulpit. It is not a denominational work, but gives sermons of able clergymen of each evangelica. Denomination in the U. States.

LADIES' NATIONAL MAGAZINE.—We have received the November number of this fine work. It contains three good engravings, one mezzotint, one lithograph, and one line engraving. "Ruth gleaning" is elegant. The publisher is already out with a prospectus for 1847, promising great improvements. Amongst these are to be "Historical Pictures, Scriptural Scenes, and a Floral Department." C. J. Peterson, publisher, 98 Chesnut St. Philadelphia.

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

THE STORM.

At about 8 o'clock yesterday morning, a storm commenced which has gradually increased in violence. Chimnies have been blown down—roofing to some extent injured—signs tossed about, &c. Should this prove to be the extent of the damage we shall feel thankful, but we are apprehensive that before to-morrow this time we shall be called upon to record serious casualities upon the coast, as the tempest is driving every thing in that direction. As we have not yet had the usual equinoctial, and the present having all the ordinary characteristics, we suppose it may be set down as the same. It may be as well for us to remark here however, that the observations of the Royal Society of London, for some two centuries past, do not confirm the theory of the Equinoctial storm: —N. Y. Sun, 14th.

MORE OF THE STORM.—The Delaware rose higher on Tuesday than it has done in 20 years, small boats were paddled on the wharves—the low-lands inundated, a portion of the Baltimore Railroad much damaged—passehgers having to be conveyed by steamboat.

Canal Boats Lost.—The storm of Tuesday did considerable damage in Baltimore—by the overflowing of the river, the flooding of cellars and stores, injuring the rail tracks, and breaking down the telegraph line, also by damaging the harbor. Some canal boats were lost. At half past 7 o'clock Tuesday morning, the steamer Cambridge, Capt. Tucker, when off North Point, (the wind blowing heavy with rain,) saw the steamboat Gov. Wolcott, with several barges in tow. Three of the barges had broken loose. When the Wolcott was first seen she had a white flag flying. The Cambridge ran for her, sent off her boats, and took off five men from a sunken barge, and put them on board the Wolcott. Another boat picked up four trunks floating from a barge that had broken loose and sunk. Barrels of flour were seen floating around. Two horses swam ashore from one of the barges. Capt. Ferguson, of the Wolcott, stated that the first barge which broke loose, was laden with iron, and that four men, belonging to her, were drowned. The Wolcott was on her way from Havre de Grace to Baltimore with canal boats in tow.

A great freshet rose also in the Potomac, more serious than any that has occurred in many years. It rose over the wharves, sweeping every thing in its way, and washing away Riley's wharf to its foundation. The Chesapeake and Ohio Canal is seriously damaged, and this in the height of the business season. Alexandria and Georgetown have suffered greatly. Great quantities of goods have been ruined in the warehouses of the latter place. A large part of the Southern ship house at the navy yard was blown down.

At Albany, Troy and Buffalo, and intermediate places, the storm of Tuesday was very severe. The unfinished steeple of the Baptist Church in Troy was blown down. At Boston there was considerable injury done to the vessels at the wharves, and a number of chimneys blown down. Indeed, to the eastward, in New England, north as far as Lake Champlain, west to Buffalo and south to Virginia, the storm was accompanied by the same disastrous occurrences which were noticed here. St. Michael's Church, Philadelphia, was blown down.—N. Y. Sun, 16th.

Mr. Fox.—The announcement of the death of Mr. Fox, late British Minister, has created some surprise. Few knew that he remained at Washington; and many believed that he had returned home. He died at Washington on Tuesday last. He was a nephew to C. J. Fox, the celebrated minister, and was a polished and elegant writer, and a gentleman of great attainments; but exceedingly retiring in his habits and avoiding intercourse generally with his neighbors. It is said he read much, sitting up all night and sleeping all day.

Shipwreck and Loss of Life.

Of all the disasters produced by the great gales which were experienced about the middle of last month, the most deplorable one, as far as the loss of human life is concerned, is reported by the ship Minerva, Capt. Brown, which arrived at New York yesterday, from Palermo. On the 26th ult., in lat, 37° 30′, long. 48° 38′, she fell in with the wreck of the brig Rienzi, which sailed from Provincetown on the 5th of April last, on a whaling voyage, with a crew consisting of Capt. Small, two of his sons, thirteen seamen; and five other persons.

The Minerva took from the wreck, James L. Dyer, the second officer, and four seamen—or rather their skeletons, for they had become reduced to skin and bone. All the others, 16 in number, had perished. She was completely wrecked by the gale on the 15th. Capt. Small, one of his sons, and four others were drowned in the cabin, some of the crew were drowned in the forecastle and others were washed overboard. Subsequently, two boys died of hunger and fatigue. All the provisions the survivors had for ten days, which they had succeeded in getting from the hold after it had soaked in salt water for 40 hours. The day before they were taken off, they caught a shark with a bowline. They ate its liver raw, and tried to drink its blood, but found it too bitter. Almost all the crew were between 16 and 22 years of age. Capt. Small has left a large family.

The following are the names of the crew belonging to the Rienzi:

Capt. Samuel Small; Joshua Small, Captain's son; second mate, James Dyer; James H. Small, Captains son; boat-steerers, Edward Weeks, G. B. Cook and James F. Cook, all of Provincetown, Mass.; Henry Canron, of Milford, Pa.; Robert Merrill, of Wethersfield, Ct.; John Wheelock, of Springfield, Mass.; Geo. Buntin, of Manchester, N. H.; John Martin, of Lowell Mass.; Geo. L. Howe, Appleton Lathe, Geo. Campbell, Geo. W. Mann, Geo. Shieles, all of Worcester, Mass.; Lloyd Brown, of New Bedford, Mass,; Geo. Porter, of Fredickton, N. B.

Great Fire at Columbus, Geo.—Nearly Four Blocks of Buildings Destroyed.

We have to record another most desolating visitation to our beautiful city, by means of Fire, which broke out this morning about 11 o'clock, in the blacksmith shop of Marcus D. Jones, on Oglethorpe street, a door or two from the corner of St. Clair street, and in the rear of the City Hotel.

There was a strong wind prevailing at the time from the eastward, which communicated the flames immediately to the livery stable of Mr. James Sullivan, kept by Mr. Bradford, on the south, and the corner building on the north, occupied by Messrs. Reed's and Sutton and Love, as a Gin manufactory and carpenter shop. Thence it spread with the rapidity of lightning towards Broad street—laying waste the City Hotel, the Market House and the whole of that square, except the old Theatre building on Crawford street, the Foundry of Messrs. Janneys' and a small house on the corner below.

Vast quantities of goods were removed into the middle of Broad street from the buildings on the East side, and were many of them consumed where they were piled up.

The Fire then crossed Broad street, communicating by the intense heat to the store-house of the Messrs. Sartwells and Mr. A. Calhoun's, whence it spread right and left as well as westward, to Front down to Crawford, excepting only the dwelling of Mr. Fountain, on the corner of St. Clair and Front streets.

Ranging downward across Crawford street, the devouring element swept the old Columbus Hotel, and all that block of buildings bounded by Broad, Front, Crawford and Thomas streets; also, the building of Mr. Toby and the Rev. Dr. Cairnes, on the east side of Broad and below Crawford street, except the residence of Mrs. Broadnax. On both sides of front street, also, from Hooper and Ridgeway's warehouse, down to Thomas street, including Bridge Row, all the way down to the River banks, or within a few yards of the toll-gate house have been laid waste the fire or by blowing up of the houses with gunpowder, excepting perhaps one or two small buildings on the south-east corner of Thomas and Front streets.

Over 50 houses were blown down without accomplishing any good purpose. There was no water to be had, and every thing being as dry as a powder-horn, and the buildings mostly of wood, the conflagration was only stayed by the want of more material in its progress.

Consternation and despair sit upon the countenances of many of our citizens. Some have lost their all, and will have to depend upon the charitable aid which the community may render. The calamity was greater than at our late Fire in December of 1845, because of its falling on a class of citizens less able to bear it—our small Dealers and Grocers, but few of whom had any insurance on their goods.

Great Freshet on the Potomac.

The Southern mail boat has just arrived, nearly three hours over her time, having been detained by an unprecedented freshet in the Potomac river, which is said to exceed any similar visitation for the past twenty years. The mail, however, brings nothing of interest, it having failed to connect at Petersburg, Va.

A heavy storm of rain commenced to fall in this vicinity at 2 o'clock this morning, and has continued without intermission throughout the day. This afternoon a rapid rise commenced in the waters of the Potomac, and in a short time it rose over the wharves, sweeping off every thing that would float, and finally washing away Riley's wharf to its foundation.

The damage on the Chesapeake and Ohio Canal is said to be very great, not only above Georgetown, but on the cross-out to Alexandria. It has occurred just in the height of the business season on the canal, and its effects will be seriously felt.

The water in Georgetown has arisen to an unusual height, and great damage is said to have been done to the wharves, as well as to the goods in a number of the warehouses on Water staeet. Considerable damage has also been done at Alexandria.

At the Navy Yard I learn that a considerable portion of the Southern ship house has been blown down.

THE HORRORS OF DRUNKENNESS.—It is only from a startling fact that a strong moral may be drawn. Perez Hitchcock, condemned at the Green Circuit to imprisonment for life for murdering his father was a drunkard. It appeared in evidence before the court, that when the neighbors went to the house after the murder, they found the wife of deceased, sitting intoxicated, by the body of her dead husband, plunging her fingers into his eyes, almost if not quite tearing them from their sockets, exclaiming with horrid oaths, that it was just what he deserved, and he ought to have been killed long since! Here insanity in its worst form may be justly inferred. What a lesson to the inebriate!

PROCLAMATION.

EXECUTIVE OFFICE, OHIO,
October 5, 1846.

In pursuance of a resolution of the General Assembly of the State of Ohio, passed March, 2 1846, requesting the Governor within the present year to issue his proclamation to the citizens of this State, recommending to them the observance of a day, previous to the first Monday of December next, of thanksgiving to Almighty God for his blessing to us as sa people, I, M. BARTLEY, Governor of the State Ohio, do hereby respectfully recommend to the citizens of this State, to set apart Thursday, the 26th day of November next, as a day of Thanksgiving and Prayer to Almighty God for his beneficence in a bountiful dispensaiton of His blessings to us as a people.

The antiquity of this laudable practice, its authenticity, its infinite importance, and its beneficial effects upon the minds and habits of those who have hitherto revered it, is a sufficient guaranty that the citizens of the State will, on the day designated, suspend their secular business, meet at their various places for religious worship, consecrate the time to thanksgiving, prayer and gratitude to Him from whom emanates all temporal and spiritual blessings.

M. BARTLEY.
Governor of Ohio.

MELANCHOLY ACCIDENT.—By the inscrutable Providence of an all wise God, we are called upon to announce the instantaneous and shocking death of SAMUEL WESLEY BRADFORD, youngest son of Mr. Samuel Bradford, a worthy citizen of this city. The young man was engaged in driving the car on the Railroad leading from the State stone quarry to the State Prison. He was standing on the front part of the loaded car, with his farther at his side, holding the brake lever. The horses were moving at a moderate trot, when they took fright at a piece of paper lying on the track, and suddenly bolted from the course, disengaging themselves from the car. In endeavoring to manage them, the young man was drawn by the lines from the car some ten or twelve feet forward on the track. His father, perceiving his immediate danger, instantly, with all his energy, applied the brake lever—but, alas! all his efforts were unvailing. Although headway was arrested, yet steadily the car approached its victim, and the beloved child, conscious of his danger, turned his terror stricken eye imploringly upward to his father; but alas! he was unable to prevent the catasprophe—the massive iron wheel of the stone laden car did its horrid work, amidst parental anguish and distress. The young man was about 19 years of age.—Ohio Statesman.

HONOR TO GERRIT SMITH.—A Utica correspondent of the Herald, Sept. 5th, says:

"I have just seen a copy of a deed of some forty acres of land in Hamilton County, New York, given by the celebrated land holder, Gerrit Smith Esq. to a colored man residing in that county. He has made out two thousand deeds of a similar character to the one I saw, conveying lands from forty to fifty acres to each, as gifts to industrious colored men in this State, and designs, I am informed, to make out a thousand more. The considerations in the deeds are as follows. "For and in consideration of the sum of one dollar to me, in hand, paid, and being desirous to have all share in the subsistance and happiness which a bountiful God has provided for all, has granted sold, &c."

"You are aware that, during the past season, Mr. Smith has been selling off large portions of his vast landed property at auction. The present movement reduces his 800,000 and upwards of acres considerably, an object which he has long desired to accomplish."

Thus, while other men of wealth are studying and planning to add acre to acre, and farm to farm, here is one who is quietly giving away lands by the hundred thousand acres to make the poor and despised independent and comfortable. Blessings on the man and deed! There are topics on which we widely differ from Mr. S. but his course, in this respect, is one which every true man must applaud and rejoice at.—Tribune.

THE GALE.—Charleston has been like a beseiged city for three days. Nothing could enter and nothing leave the port. It is now over to all appearances, the wind having gone round to the South West yesterday morning. Monday night was a wild time, the wind continuing with unabated violence all night. The solid brick walls shook, slates from the roofs rattled on the pavements, blinds crashed and signs and piazzas suffered shipwreck. We have heard, however, of no serious damage, and so well prepared was the shipping to meet the danger, that the injury is trifling compared with the anticipations of those who merely considered the strength of the gale.—Charleston Mercury.

LATEST FROM OREGON.—Mr. Bonney of Oxford, Ohio, arrived at Independence, Missouri on the 1st instant, one hundred and forty days from Oregon. He left Oregon on the 13th May, and represents the people there as being prosperous and generally well satisfied with their new homes; the elections were to take place in June, for members of the Legislature of Oregon, and represents that considerable interest was felt as to the result, the great question at issue being as to whether the sale of ardent spirits should be permitted in the territory or not. Mr. Bonney brought in one hundred and twenty-five letters, principally from the Oregon and California emigrants who started the present year, He says the emigrants he met were generally healthy and in good spirits, and their teams looking well. He met five hundred waggons on his route in. Some were going to Oregon and some to California: the emigrants to the points above named separated at Independence Rock on the 12th of July last. Governor Boggs went to Oregon in consequence of the Mormon emigration to California. Mr. Bonney was robbed on his way by the Indians of his horse, provisions and clothing, and travelled about seventy-five miles on foot alone, when he was overtaken by Mr. Sublette & Co. and taken to Fort Laramie.—N. Y. Sun.

DEPARTURE OF GENERAL ARMSTROEG.—This distinguished gentleman and veteran soldier, the American Consul at Liverpool, left yesterday afternoon in the Great Western for that port. He was accompanied to the ship by a committee of citizens, and as the gallant vessel left the wharf, the citizens assembled and gave the old hero nine spontaneous cheers, which Gen. Armstrong acknowledged with becoming taste and dignity.

RAILROAD ACCIDENT.—In spite of all precaution these accidents are increasing. A man in South Boston was walking on the side of the road, and just as the locomotive came up he stepped directly on the track. He was of course knocked down and run over; both his legs were cut off, and the head spilt horizontally just above the ears. Deacon Pond, of Hopkinton, has been killed on the Worcester road—the locomotive came upon him suddenly, when he was run over.

John Quincy Adams has been unanimously renominated to represent the Eighth Congressional District of Massachusetts.

THE CHOLERA IN INDIA.

The ravages of the cholera at Kurachee have been most disastrous. Between the 14th and 23d of June, about 8000 human beings were cut off, including 850 Europeans, of whom 815 were fighting men. Besides this, 595 Sepoys, and it is believed about 700 native camp-followers, and inhabitants of the town, have died. This disease commenced its destructive course on Sunday, the 14th, when the weather was unusually stagnant and oppressive. The Bombay Times says:

"Before midnight nine of the eighty-sixth were at rest; and men began to be borne into hospitals in such numbers that it was difficult to make arrangements for their reception. It was a fearful night. With morning came the tidings that the pestilence was overspreading the town, and fifty had in 24 hours fallen victims. The Eight-sixth were the earliest, and continued to be the severest sufferers. They and her Majesty's Sixtieth, had for six months been in tents close to each other; the day after the disease appeared, they were marched out for change of air, and encamped by the sea shore near Clifton. The Rifles were next attacked; then the Fusiliers; the Artillery and Native Infantry began to suffer after this. For five fearful days did the destroyer lay his hand most heavily upon them; and in this time more than a thousand men were carried to their graves! The pestilence now began to abate—it had done its worst, and seemed about to withdraw; within less than a fortnight 900 Europeans, including 815 fighting men were carried away, 600 Native soldiers, and 7000 of the camp-followers and inhabitants of the town, had been hurried into eternity. The conduct of the Governor, [Sir Charles Napier,] is stated to have been beyond all praise; anxiety for the sick conferring and alacrity on limbs that the hand of time might have stiffened. Only two officers had died. So sudden was death with some, that they were seized, cramp, collapsed, dead, almost as fast as I have written the words. Previous health and strength were no guarantees; men attending the burial of their comrads were attacked, borne to the hospital and buried themselves the next morning. Pits were dug in the church-yard morning and evening; sewn up in their beddings, coffinless, they were laid side by side, one service read over all. Public works were suspended during 15th and 16th. Medicine seemed powerless; nothing that medical science could suggest took effect—they were, in fact, dealing with corpses. It was not until the third day that medicine assumed the sway; since it has done so, I should say two thirds of the cases have been saved.

The City of Monterey.—This place, now in possession of Gen. Taylor, is the capital of the State of New Leon.—It is on the Fernando river, about 220 miles from its mouth. The Indians on a Visit to the President.—The Union, noticing the the arrival at Washington, of a delegation of Winnebago Indians, says:

On Monday last they made a formal visit to the President, and were introduced by Col. Medill, Commissioner of Indian Affairs. They are twenty-three in number, and the finest-looking—best and most appropriately dressed and painted band of Indians we have ever seen. The President received and welcomed the delegation in the usual bland and courteous manner, and it was evident they soon felt as if they were really in the presence of the "Great Father of the red man." After he had spoken to them of the object of their visit,—and expressed a desire to listen to anything they had to say, Shaw-go-nik or Little Hill, orator of the delegation, responded. He said the Winnebagoes had heard the voice of their Great Father a long distance off—that their Father, the governor of Iowa and their agent had informed them that their great Father wished to see a delegation of their people on business—that the chiefs and braves now here were chosen to represent the Winnebago nation—that the principal chief, "Wen-ne-shick," was now very old and infirm, and could not accompany the delegation, but his brother was here in his place. He said, they wished their Great Father to have their business transacted without delay—that they were very anxious to return home, as many of their families were sick.

The President then informed them that he would appoint commissioners to meet them on the next day, (Tuesday,) and on Wednesday morning they would be ready to proceed to business; and that they might rely that full justice should be done them in any negotiations they might make. With some salutary advice, the President then told them he would be glad to shake them by the hand again, after all their business was transacted, and they were ready to go home. The agent (Gen. Fletcher) then announced that the brother of Wen-he-shick, had brought a pipe from the old chief for the President, which he desired now to present.—Ah-hoo-zhib-kaw, a young chief, possessing much natural grace and elegance in form and manner, then rose, and after making a pertinent little speech, in which he called the PIPE the "emblem of peace and friendship, sent by the Great Spirit to the red man," he presented it to the President. He had previously charged the pipe with their favorite kin-ne-kin-ick, and lighting it, desired the President to smoke.—The pipe was then passed to the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, and to all the Indians, and in the circle around the room, each taking a whiff as a mark of good will.

A Colored Home for indigent and sick poor among our colored population, was opened on Wednesday of this week. It is comprised in three buildings, the principal one is occupied by the women, the second by the men, and the third by little children and their unhappy mothers. It was founded about seven years ago, by a company of benevolent ladies: the most conspicuous was Mary Shortwell, a member of the Society of Friends. Until about two years ago it was merely a home for the unfortunate; but at that time Dr. Fitch conceived the idea of connecting with it a regular system, which has made the institution eminently successful. The entire number of occupants, at th present time, is 193, exclusive of children of whom there are 9, and there are also 73 men.—N. Y. Sun.

An Assault on a Clergyman.—The Pittsburg American of Friday last, says—"Dr. Upfold, pastor of the Episcopal Church of this city, was violently assaulted and abused, as we learn, by Maj. Dunn, this morning. The Major it seems is a member of the church, or professes so to be, and had applied to be admitted to the communion table, against which several communicants remonstrated with the pastor. The Doctor took Dunn to one side, and advised him of the opposition, and had finally to tell him that if he persisted in coming to the table, that he would have to pass him by. Against this the Major remonstrated with some demonstration of violence, from which the Doctor escaped at the time, by closing the vestry door as a barrier between them. This morning, Dunn met Dr. Upfold, and commenced a violent assault upon him, inflicting upon him a blow on the head and another on the side. The leading churchmen are greatly excited, and Dunn, if not already arrested, will be, and held to bail for so great an outrage. Dunn, we since learn, is in jail."

Mysterious.—The Three Rivers Gazette Canada states that the body of a man named Samuel H. Nye, and inhabitant of Norwich, Vt., was found last Monday week in the Champlain woods, by a person named Grandmaison, his wife and his two sisters-in-law. No one can explain his death. The corpse was putrified, scarcely any thing but the bones remaining. As appears found, his son is now in the Army of occupation.

Collision on the Hudson River.—The steamboat Buffalo, Capt. Captain Hancox hailed the steamboat Santa Claus as she passed on her way down to the city, and that vessel rounded to, but turned about again and proceeded on her trip. The steamer Columbus, Capt, George Riggs, next came up with the wreck. Capt R. promptly brought his boat along side, took off the passengers and crew and offered to tow the Buffalo down to the city.—N. Y. Sun.

Catastrophe.—Three young men named Cheney, Thompson and Connolly, a few days ago went on the Lake in a small boat, which was upset. They clung to it from 7 to 11, when Cheney died from cold and fatigue. Connolly lashed his body to the boat; Thompson, who was but a boy, became deranged, and let go his hold. Connolly held him until he expiried, and then lashed his body to the boat too. The next morning they were drifted to the shore, but the persevering Connolly was senseless. He was found and taken care off.—Burlington (Vt.) Corres. of the Courier.

The Best Recreation.

The celebrated Hayden was in company with some distinguished persons. The conversation turned on the best means of restoring their mental energies, when exhausted with long and difficult studies. One said he had recourse, in such cases, to a bottle of wine—another, that he went into company. Hayden being asked what he would do, or did do; said he retired to his closet and engaged in prayer—that nothing exerted on his mind a more happy and efficacious influence than prayer. Hayden was no enthusiast. There is much truth in his remark. God is the strength of his people. Luther used to say, that, to pray well, was to study well. The celebrated Elliot left us, as the result of his laborious and useful life, the striking sentiment, "that prayer and pains-taking were able to accomplish all things." I doubt not that a first and leading defect of many, very many Christians, lies in their not praying as they ought—here they are weak, and this weakens them in all things.

Industry and Integrity.—There is nothing possible to man which industry and integrity will not accomplish. The poor boy of yesterday, so poor that a dollar was a miracle in his vision, houseless, shoeless, and breadless—compelled to wander on foot from village to village, with his bundle on his back, in order to procure labor and the means of subsistence, has become the talented and honorable young man of to-day, by the power of his good right arm, and the potent influence of his pure principles, firmly held and perpetually maintained. When poverty and what the world call disgrace stared him in the face, he shuddered not, but pressed onward and exulted most in high and honorable exertion in the midst of accumulating disasters and calamities. Let this young man be cherished, for he honors his country and dignifies his race. High blood—if this course not in his veins, he is a free born American, and therefore a sovereign and a prince. Wealth—what cares he for that, as long as his heart is pure and his walk upright—he knows and his country knows, and his country tells, that the little finger of an honest and upright man is worth more than the whole body of an effeminate and dishonest rich man. These are the men who make the country—who bring to it whatever of iron sinew and unfailing spirit it possesses or desires—who are rapidly rendering it the mightiest, most powerful, as it is already the freest land beneath the circle of the sun.

Round Shoulders.—Persons who carry weights on their heads, as fish women in the street, are remarkable for holding themselves erect and straight, and never have a stoop or curved spine. One of the most effectual means of removing stooping, and even of checking incipient lateral curvature of the spine, is by making the patient carry weights on the head, gradually augmented; this compels all the muscles by which perpendicularity is produced and preserved to exert themselves, and by this exertion they grow; and as the body cannot be allowed either to bend forward or to either side, the muscles gradually pull all the bones and ligaments into their proper position, and keep them, as well as themselves, in due posture. In fact, lateral curvature is caused by disproportioned strength, or exertion of different lateral sets of muscles, and by relaxation of ligament, and can only be cured by producing a contrary state, by exercise and well-balanced perpendicularity of the spine; never by artificial machines nor by mere rest. The peasantry is those parts of the country where it is customary to carry burdens on the head, are remarkable for their erect stature and ease of motion. This is well seen about Aveyron in France.

MISCELLANY.

Names of Judea.

BY T. B. THAYER.

1. We frequently hear of it as the Land of Canaan. It is so called in a great many places of the Old Testament. This name is derived from the youngest son of Ham, who was the son of Noah; and of this individual we have a notice in the 10th chapter of Genesis: "Canaan begat Sidon, and the Amorite and the Hivite," &c., "and afterward were the families of the Canaanites spread abroad. And the border of the Canaanites was from Sidon to Sara." The descendants of Canaan, the grandson of Noah, spread abroad over this country, and in honor of their ancestor they called it after him, The Land of Canaan.

2. The Land of Judah was first applied to that portion of the country allotted to the tribe of Judah, but afterwards from their superiority, it was applied to the whole territory. From this came the name Judæa, which the country received and retained under the Romans, and by which it is frequently called at this day.

3. The Land of Israel was a distinctive name, derived from the Israelites who were the descendants of Jacob, who was afterwards called Israel, as recorded in Gen. xxxii, 28. This appellation is of most frequent occurrence in the Old Testament, but is so called only on one occasion in the New; Judea being the common term used there. The term, Land of Israel, embraced the country on both sides of the Jordan, comprising all that territory which God covenanted to give Abraham and his posterity. This leads in the fourth place, to the name which it received from this circumstance, which was,

4. The Land of Promise. This has reference to the promise contained in Gen. xvii, 8. "I will give unto thee, and to thy seed after thee, the land wherein thou art a stranger, all the land of Canaan, for an everlasting possession." In consequence of this covenant of the Lord God with Abraham and his descendants, it received among the people the appellation in question. Hence Paul says in Hebrews xi. 9; speaking of Abraham, "He sojourned in the land of promise," alluding to the country of which we are speaking.

5. The next term applied to this country is that of Holy Land. We find it used by the prophet Zechariah in chap. 12. "The Lord shall inherit (or give to) Judah his portion in the Holy Land, and shall choose Jerusalem again." It is so called also in the apocryphal books of Wisdom and Maccabees. The Jews divided the world into two portions, the land of Israel, and the land out of Israel; the first, their own country, was holy, and all the rest polluted and unclean. And so great was their veneration for the land of Judea, that its very dust was considered sacred; and when they came from any other country, they stopped on the borders, and wiped the dust from their feet, lest their inheritance should be defiled with it; and yet more, they would not suffer any vegetables to be brought from a Gentile land, lest they should bring some dirt with them, and thus defile the holy heritage! Our Lord doubtless refers to this, when he commands them, Matt. x. 14, to shake the dust from their feet when returning from any city which would not receive them; signifying in this way that the Jews themselves, if they rejected the gospel, were no longer to be regarded as the chosen of God, but were to be viewed in the same light as the heathen.

The term "Holy Land" was much in use during the Crusade which cost Europe so much blood and treasure. The fanatics who gloried in these inglorious adventures, though shouting loud the rescue of the Holy Land, were guilty of the most unholy measures for accomplishing their object, and for gratifying their vengeance against their foes. On account of these murderous events the name Holy land acquired at this period of Christian history a painful celebrity, and the associations which it called up in the mind were only those of invasion, rapine, slaughter and revenge. Now, it is hoped, that when uttered, it is connected with other thoughts and feelings.

6. Lastly, this country was known by the name of Palestine; it is so called by Moses, in Exodus xv. 14: "Sorrows shall take hold on the inhabitants of Palestina." It is derived from the Philistines, according to Horne, who migrated from Egypt, and having expelled the aboriginal inhabitants, settled on the borders of the Mediterranean, and afterwards became so considerable as to give their name to the country. Palestine is the name by which this country is generally known at this day, being that used chiefly by travellers and geographers.

GAMING.

There is not, at present, a more fashionale vice than gamin.g Nothing, is more frequent on our steamboats than gaming, except on the Sabbath. At the same time, professional gambling is universally condemned by all moral people.—There is not a more unprincipled class of men than the regular gamblers. There is not a practice more directly identified with fraud than this.

But whence come the regular gamblers? Plainly from among those who professedly play for amusement. The same relation which moderate drinking holds to black-leg gambling. It is there that the young man learns the art and mystery of this pest of society. It is there that he acquires the taste for the amusement. There both his ambition and his thirst for gain become awakened. And there, in fact, he becomes a confirmed gambler—just as the moderate drinker becomes a confirmed drunkard.

It is now well understood that monied gambling is thoroughly dishonest—as much so as pocket-picking, or anything else in the line of fraud. And from some recent developements which have been made by a reformed gambler, (Mr. Green) it would seem to be difficult to conceive how human ingenuity could go further in the art of deception than it has been carried by regular gamblers.

We ask if gentlemen will countenance such depredations upon society? Will they make an amusement—a play thing—of a practice so immoral—so dishonorable—so ruinous in society?

The practice of gentlemen playing merely for amusement, is one of the principal means, not only of furnishing new recruits to the ranks of professed gamblers, but of keeping them in countenance, and of drawing their victims within their grasp. It is they, in fact, who uphold the entire system.

But why should intelligent, well educated men want such an amusemen? Do the figures on a card suggest any noble or elevating ideas? Have they time, under the excitement of the game, for any such ideas at all? Nothing like it. It is inimical to the pursuit of the useful arts and sciences, to the social virtues, and to the doctrinces and duties of religion.

Gaming may supply the place of sensible conversation and intellectual improvement. It may teach a man low cunning and practical cheating. But it can never make him a philospher or an artist—a christian, a philanthropist, or an honest man—a good citizen, a good neighbor, or an estimable head of a family.

The practice of gaming on steamboats, in the public saloon, is not only demoralizing in a high degree, and a puble nuisance of no ordinary magnitude, but it is a violation of the rights of decent passengers, who must be rendered uncomfortable by being confined to company and too practice which they believe to be morally wrong.—Pitts. C. Adv.

MR. ROGERS' PERSONATION.

Dr. Thomas Goodwin, such time as he was President of Magdalene College, Oxford, told me, that in the time of his youth, being then a student at Cambridge, and having heard much of Mr. Rogers, of Dedham, in Essex, purposely he took a journey to hear him preach on his lecture-day, a lecture, then, so strangely thronged and frequented, that, to those who came not early, there was no possibiliy of getting room in that very spacious church Dr. Rogers was, as he told me, at the time he heard him, on the subject of the Scriptures. And in that sermon he falls into an expostulation with the people about their neglect of the Bible. He personates God to the people, and tells them, "Well, I have trusted you so long with my Bible; you have slighted it, it lies in such houses, all covered with dust and cobwebs; you care not to look into it. Do you use my Bible thus? Well, you shall have my Bible no longer." And he takes up the Bible from his cushion, and seemed as if he were going away with it, and carrying it from them; immediately turns again, and personates the people to God, falls down on his knees, cries, and pleads most earnestly, "Lord, whatever thou doest to us, take not thy Bible from us; kill our children, burn our houses, destroy our goods, only spare us thy Bible—only take not away thy Bible." And then he personates God again to the people: "Say you so? well, I will see how you will use it, whether you will love it more, whether you will value it more, practice it more, and live more according to it." But by these actions, and this discourse (as the Doctor told me) he put all the congregation into so strange a posture, as he never saw any congregation in his life; the place was a mere Bochim—the people, generally as it were, deluged with their own tears, and he told me, that he himself, when he got out, and was to take horse again to be gone, he was fain to hang a quarter of an hour upon the neck of his horse weeping, before he had power to mount; so strange an impression was there upon him, and generally upon the people, upon having been thus expostulated with for the neglect of the Bible.

Infidel Literature.—A great deal of the popular literature of the age is tinctured with infidelity. Its poison is insidiously infused; but it may, nevertheless, be readily discovered by a careful observer. Libertinism, Intrigue, Fraud Revenge, are painted in such beautiful tints, that the inexperienced, taught to call them by other names, esteem them almost as Virtues instead of Vices The effort seems to be to lead the young mind

Is God in this House?—In Greenland, when a stranger knocks at the door, he asks, "Is God in this house?" And if they answer, "Yes," he enters. Reader, this little messenger knocks at your door, with the Greenland salutation, Is God in this house? Where you, like Abraham, entertaining an angel unawares, what would be the report he would take back to heaven? Would he find you commanding your children and your household and teaching them the way of the Lord? Would he find an altar in your dwelling? Do you worship God with your children? Is there a church in your house?

Honesty.—A certain poor widow, one winter's day, had just consumed her little stock of wood, without knowing where she could obtain any more. She put her children to bed soon after, and sat shivering over a few dying embers, in full view of a large wood pile belonging to her rich, hardhearted neighbor. The thought darted into her mind, "Had I but one handful of that wood to keep me from freezing, how glad I should be; he has enough, and would never miss it." After many struggles, she concluded to go, after her neighbor had gone to bed, and get one handful, that she might be able to get herself some breakfast. She went and picked up the wood, but the thought of stealing so overwhelmed her, that forgetting where she was, she spoke aloud—"Have I come to this? Must I steal? O, I cannot. But if I don't I must freeze." She threw down the wood, and walked away. Again the horrors of winter drove her back, and again she picked up the wood, and again she threw it down, saying, "I can't steal, and if I perish I will perish." She went home and went to bed. The rich man stood at his door and heard all that the poor woman had said, and it softened his heart. Early next morning he sent her eight loads of wood ready cut, and other articles, telling her that she was welcome—adding, "You fairly beat the devil out of me last night."

A Shower.—A merchant was one day returning from market. He was on horseback, and behind his saddle was a valise filled with money. The rain fell with violence, and the good old man was wet to the skin. At this time he was quite vexed, and murmured because God had given him such bad weather for his journey.

He soon reached the border of a thick forest. What was his terror beholding on one side of the road a robber, who, with leveled gun, was aiming at him and attempting to fire! But the powder being wet with the rain, the gun did not go off, and the merchant giving spurs to his horse fortunately had time to escape.

As soon as he found himself safe, he said to himself, "How wrong I was not to endure the rain patiently, as sent by Providence. If the weather had been dry and fair, I should not probably have been alive at this hour; the rain which caused me to murmur came at a fortunate moment, to save my life and preserve to me my property."

Saving Tomatoes.—The editor of the American Farmer gives the following method.—On the approach of frost, take up the vines, with the fruit on them, and hang them up under cover, in some out-house, or dry place, and you will have a large addition to your winter store. The small green fruit will ripen, (as to color,) and the larger ones will prove, at that season of the year, very acceptable. We throw the vines over a pole, and place it in our barn, or any convenient place, and there let them hang, taking from the vines the fruit as it is wanted for use. In this way, they keep well, and a large quantity can be secured with very little labor.

Curious.—A person in Texas, suffering from the fever of the country, had been vomiting incessantly for forty-eight hours. A cup of very hot water was given to the patient in a mistake for warm water, to ease the stomach which was drank off, when the sickness and vomiting were instantaneously relieved.

Three Wonders in Heaven.—"If I ever reach heaven," said the eminently pious Dr. Watts, "I expect to find three wonders there. 1. To meet some I had not thought to see there. 2. To miss some whom I had expected to meet there; but 3. The greatest wonder of all will be to find myself there!" If such were the views and feelings of such a man as Dr. Watts, who lived so near the verge of heaven, and breathed its holy atmosphere as it were on earth, so as to be able to say with the most cheerful confidence, "I bless God I lie down at night unsolicitous whether I awake in this world or another," how much greater will be the wonder in the case of many careless and almost prayerless Christians, to find themselves in heaven at last.

Slavery in Mississippi.—By a provision in the Constitution of Mississippi, the introduction of slaves into the state is prohibited after the present year. This prohibition extends not only to the introduction of slaves as merchandize, settlers within the state cannot import them for their own use. This state of things induced the Legislature, at its last session to authorize the people to vote on a proposition to change this provision. It excites general attention. The New Orleans Bulletin thinks that the popular sentiment is against the change.—Christ. Reflector.

POETRY.

PROGRESS OF THE GOSPEL.

BY N. C. BROOKS, A. M.

O'er other lands has dawned immortal day,
And Superstition's clouds have rolled away;
O'er Gallia's mount, and on Iberia's shore,
The Rithic altars roll their smoke no more;
Fled is the Druid from the ancient oak—
His harp is mute—his magic circle broke;
And Desolation prayes in Odin's cells,
Where spirit-voices called to join the feast of shells.

O'er Indian plains and ocean-girdled isles,
With brow of beauty, Truth serenely smiles,
The nations bow as light is shed abroad;
And break their idols for the living GOD,
Quenched are the pyres as shines salvation's star,
Grim Juggernaut is trembling on his car,
And cries less frequent come from Ganges, waves,
As infant forms sink in untimely graves.
Where heathen prayes flamed by the cocoa-tree,
They supplicate the Christians' DEITY;
And chant in living aisles, the vesper hymn,
Where giant god-trees rear their temples dim.

Still speed thy truth! still wave thy spirit sword!
Till every land acknowledge THEE the LORD;
And the broad banner of the cross, unfurled,
In triumph wave above a subject world.
And here, Oh GOD! where feuds thy church divide—
The sectary's rancor, and the bigot's pride—
Melt every heart—till all our breasts enshrine
One faith, one hope, one love, one zeal divine;
And with one voice, adoring nations call Upon the FATHER and the GOD of all.

ON PRAYER.

BY ISABELLA FARRETT.

Sweet is the sound of Sabbath bell,
Calling afar from turrets high;
In gentle strains, to all it tells
The sacred hour of prayer is nigh.

The sound is heard abroad, at home,
'Tis borne upon the wings of air;
It bids the young, the aged, come,
And worship in the house of prayer.

Oh! let us then the call obey;
And raise our thoughts from earth to heav'n
And to the holy temple, pay
Our grateful thanks for blessings given.

Why should we covet this world's wealth;
Its fleeting pleasures, pomps, or power?
Its riches cannot purchase health,
Nor pleasures stay life's parting hour.

Far happier they who still pursue
The path our blessed Savior trod;
His precepts keep before their view,
And seek communion with their God.

Tho' smooth the stream of time may flow,
Tho' bright and joyous life may be,
Yet purer bliss the heart will know,
That seeks communion, Lord with Thee.

And when the sadden'd spirit sighs,
Beneath its load of grief and care,
And when no solace earth supplies,
There is a sweet relief in prayer.

With fervent zeal, with prayer sincere,
Then let us seek redeeming love,
To light our path, to guide us here,
And lead us to the realms above.

CAUSE OF PEACE.

Written for the Western Recorder.

PEACE OR WAR.

Which would be the most advantage to community, to expend money in training men in the art of war, or in teaching them the principles of peace?

In the first place, which will be likely to make a nation the most prosperous and happy, to instil into the minds of the citizens the principles of virtue or those of vice? If we can prove that an uncivilized, barbarous and warlike nation, trained in all the artifices of war, that military genius can invest, and living up by practice to those principles which they have been taught, have ever been either prosperous or happy, we might plead some excuse for military training. And if there is no advantage resulting from war, would it not be vanity in the highest degree to spend money or time in acquiring an art that is useless, or wholly productive of evil? That no good can spring from war in any way whatever is beyond doubt. And its result has been nothing but evil, from all the evidences we have had of its murderous and bloody course from its origin to the present day. Cain was the first murderer that we have on record. And was he or his posterity either prosperous or happpy on account of his spirit of hatred, enmity, and revenge, or of his having committed the crime, namely of killing his brother? was he made an officer of state, or was he set to rule or to preside over a nation? Was his brow crowned with a wreath of unfading laurels? which is the customary reward of killing men in the present day. No. He was cursed by the Creator himself. He was cast out as a "fugitive and vagabond in the earth," unfit for society. But says one, since it has become fashionable to kill our brethren in war, it has become necessary in certain cases, and therefore it is less crime than it was in the days of Cain. (Powerful logic indeed—it ought to be well considered.) And how how much better has been the fate of the successors of Cain, of those who have carried out his principles of murder; by war and bloodshed, we have a number of evidences of their success in the end; having been no better. Philip one of the Kings of Macedon, who was desirous of rendering his name illustrious by having his kingdom to equal if not excel any of those of his predecessors. And being entitled to the name of a great warrior appeared the only way for even a king to distinguish himself for greatness in those days of thirst for blood. (Which we are sorry to acknowledge is too much the case in the present day.) The man who makes use of his eloquence instead of his sword, and wields in the defence of his country, who wears out his existence in defending the principles of right according to the laws of God and man. The principles of dealing justly with nations as well as with men, are overlooked, and those military heroes picked up to govern states and nations and to fill the important offices of the union, whose blood stained hands have been the means of slaughtering thousands of their fellow mortals and brethren by creation, and all this in a gospel land supported by Christians! (Think of this professors.) Philip therefore succeeded in making a number of conquests, and of setting states and nations at variance with each other and causing them to fight amongst themselves until they had lost all regard for their own states and governments and through false and delusive promises they become induced to submit to him, promising them that he would lead them on to conquer a more powerful nation. But before he set out, he was killed by one of his own subjects. Thus ends the life, the hopes, the prospects and the ambition of one great warrior, and likewise the vain deluded hopes of his followers. Now where is the happiness or advantage that these people derived from sacrificing their peaceful homes to the ambition of war? Where is the advantage that any nation or people has ever gained by being engaged in war? In time of war we often hear the boast of nations of their having taken heavy prizes. "Glorious victory—sixty thousand dollars prize money taken." But when we learn the true character of the case we find that it cost the country sixty millions to get it, besides a hundred and twenty thousand lives lost, and each of these the near relative of some human being. And without a speedy termination of the present war we know not how soon these sounds and worse than these, will reverberate from shore to shore of our once happy and peaceful republic. For another specimen of heroes of war, let us reflect for a moment upon the fate of Alexander the Great. What was his end? did he die happy, or even respectable? The response to this surely is, no. Or did he enjoy a long life or a happy one, through all his conquests, even while he lived? As an evidence that he was not happy in life; after he had conquered the whole world, he wept because he had no more worlds to conquer.

And that he did not enjoy a long life will be seen by the time of his death; which happened at the early age of thirty-two years, by beastly intemperance. Some unfriely and disreputable end is generally the lot of all such ambitious men. Their thirst for conquest grows so strong, that it becomes as irresistible as the tide or whirlwind, until they are launched into the vortex of ruin, by their own wicked deeds. What was the end of Buonaparte, who feared neither mountains, frost nor snow, neither God nor man? What did his bravery advance or secure to himself, after his being the means of destroying thousands and tens of thousands of human beings? His martial ambition, secured to him a place of destination on the lonely Island of St. Helena, there to end his days without a friend to comfort him in his solitary abode, or even to soothe him in the hour of death; and all the pity that is felt for him is that he did not even then receive the punishment due him for the misdeeds of his life.

Again, to prove the advantages of war, will any person contend that a continual war would prove advantageous to any nation or people, and if not, is there then, not something wrong in it? If a business is good, it is generally made better by continuation and improvement. It is evident that the continuation of war would not only prove a disadvantage to any community, but would shortly end in the extermination of the races thus engaged. If continual war is not profitable, how would half the time do, to be employed in that business? Would the other half be sufficient to rebuild and re-establish the burned, the pillaged and desolated cities, villages and countries? If not, how much time would be really necessary to spend in war for the good of government? If the less time spent in war the better, would it not be well to endeavor to arrange the affairs of government if possible in a way that we would be likely to have no war? To effect this we must forever banish from the halls of Congress, the State Legislature, and all the important offices of the nation, those hot headed politicians, those heroes of war, those lions of prey, whose thirst for blood is insatiable, who would labor to devise plans to set nations at war, "who would bind burdens on men's shoulders that they themselves would not touch with one of their fingers, would cause brothers to wade in the blood of each other that they may reap the spoils, the gold, and treasures of the prize, who care not for the good of the country, whose selfish motives are alone for their own aggrandizement." And select in their stead, men of sober thought and serious reflection, men who are patriots indeed and not in word only, men whose patriotism is not proved by the blaze of their sword, but by their morality and proper course of conduct, who would be willing to wear out their existence in striving to promote the welfare of their country, in striving to save instead of destroy it, in striving to establish the prosperity and happiness of the union, and whose just and equitable forms of government would insure the love of mankind generally, and peace and friendship with all nations, and insure to themselves the promise which is, "Blessed are the peacemakers for they shall be called the children of God."

But again says one, we do not contend that continual war would be advantageous. We only contend for war when it is necessary to defend us from foreign invasion. Our own fears or rather our threats are often the cause of our difficulties. Our own suspicious conduct is sufficient to tempt our transatlantic brethren to invasion, and likewise those of every other nation not immediately connected with us. We prepare for war when all is peace. We show by our preparation that we intend fighting. We keep our standing armies upon their borders just as though they were wild beasts of pray instead of human beings. As though we were not all the children of one common Father, just as though we had no confidence in their fidelity, their integrity, their honor as a nation. They then of course become suspicious of us, they then as well as ourselves keep in constant readiness for battle, and thus all confidence and good feelings are lost on both sides, and then we are not far from an engagement. The first trivial circumstance that takes place creates a war. We look upon each other as enemies instead of friends and brethren. And in this way we keep up war, from generation to generation. Is it necessary for Christian nations to keep in constant readiness for fear of each other? If we were ignorant brutal savages it might thus be necessary. But in a Christian and gospel land let us entertain higher notions of human intelligence and human perfection. Perhaps one will say that I am deviating from the subject, that it was not the origin of war that we were about to enquire into, but which would be the most advantageous to government to expend money teaching men the art and principles of war, or the principles of peace. Then fully to investigate the subject it becomes neccessary to prove from which the greatest advantage results to community war or peace. Before we choose for our children a profession, would it not be well for us to consider whether the principles of this profession would justify them in pursuing it? If the principles of war are justifiable and the greatest advantage results from it to community it will then be expedient for us to teach our citizens and our children, the art of killing men, the art and manner in which those wholesale butcheries are carried on to the best advantage, to effect the slaughter of the greatest number, in the shortest time. And when persons are studying a profession, or an art or learning a trade after they have obtained the theory before they can be perfect in it, it becomes neccessary for them to put it to practice (as the graduates of West Point &c.) We then of course would not like to practice upon our own citizens we are therefore under the necessity of marching our graduates over the line of some neighboring State or nation, to provoke a war to try their skill and dexterity, to try who has made the greatest proficiency in the art, and which will be entitled to the name of being the greatest hero. If it can be proven that it is expedient for us to teach our citizens and children the art of war, they must become graduates in the military schools, some must be prepared, to take their station in the standing armies, others to march to a foreign land to strew their bones to whiten the battle field with millions of the slain. And as to their becoming graduates in the schools of vice and wickedness during their march and military training we have no doubt. Some of the reformed drunkards have stated after chumefuting their ten fold and multiplied crimes, that they had been piously educated from their youth and that they had taken their first lessons of guilt from having been stationed in the United States Army.

To confirm the doctrine that war is right, and that it is a christian duty to support it, we are told that government could not be sustained without it, and that we must maintain the honor of our nation by the sword. So long as we attach the name of honor to murder and bloodshed we may have it to do, for as long as it is considered dishonorable to settle difficulties between nations by any other method than a resort to arms, honor can alone to the sword be due.

But could we only reverse the matter and consider it honorable to settle national controversies by a court or council of nations, or by some means in a fair and equitable manner, becoming the dignity of the nations thus concerned, we might then say the honor of our nation must be preserved by peace. But if a resort to brute force is the best and most successful way of doing business, then down with our acadamies, colleges and other institutions of learning, and up with military schools all over the world and pay proper attention to the best interests of the country. As it regards a government that cannot be sustained without war, one thing is evident, that a government that cannot be sustained without war cannot stand long with it. It must soon fall beneath the ruins of overwhelmning destruction. Again, what causes our alarm in a day of light and reformation? Do Christians and brethren fear each other, or do we fear that a Buonaparte or an Alexander will rise from the grave and his followers with him and wage a war of extermination upon the whole human family? If we have any thing to fear from the ravages of war it must be something like this—we prove the Buonaparte ourselves, by invading the territory of other nations to which we have no right, by fighting for conquest, for gold and for spoils. If we adopt his motto and follow his example, we may too soon justly reap his reward. Do not the enlightened inhabitants of the United States understand their own true interest better than to involve the nation in a destructive war for the self aggrandizement and selfish motives of a few aspirants? Will we suffer our men to be driven to the field of battle to fight out a war which is acknowledged by a great part of the people to be wrong, to be a usurpation of power on the part of the people of the United States, and a gross violation upon the rights of Mexico? Will we disgrace our country by such outrage as this? Our nation, that is looked up to as an example to the world for justice, peace, morality, and christianity. There appears to be many opinions in regard to this Mexican war. We say our country is in the wrong, yet urge her to perseverance in an acknowledged error.

We call to arms hosts of men, which is calculated to create an excitement in other nations or sufficient to call down their wrath upon our heads, for our injustice towards a weak and unoffending republic. Had we not better pause and reflect before we pursue a course of rashness. Had we not better call her to a path of rectitude and then it will be time enough to urge her perseverance and correct the faults of other nations. Some of our members of Congress are "for fighting Mexico on our soil, oh hers every where, until we drive her across the Rio Grande," and are "then for withdrawing our army to the east side of the Nueces and settling by treaty all points of dispute with that weak and distracted country upon the most liberal terms." Such a man or set of men deserve a vote of thanks for their liberality. After having imbued their hands in the innocent blood of a nation until they were satisfied with vengeance, they would then talk of liberal terms. There appears to be a few members in the house of Congress who are willing to defend the interests of their country at all hazards regardless of name or popularity, whose voices are heard in appeals for their country, who defend the principles of right who maintain the honor of the nation by the flaming sword of justice, by demanding nothing but what is right, which principle is calculated to secure the peace of the world. Those men who deserve laurels, that heroes of battle never won, whose names will be remembered long in the annals of history for having preserved the peace of the two great nations, the United States and Great Britian, had they been placed in power no doubt but the blood of our citizens that has been shed on Mexican soil, and likewise that of the Mexicans would have been spared, and the way closed which is now open to shed the blood of thousands more of both nations. These have preserved the peace of two great nations relative to the Oregon question, a subject that has been tremblingly waving in the air for years, knowing not whither it would fall nor where it would rest, a question of deep importance to both nations, and a subject that must have required much skill and dexterity, through so much opposition, to have effected a settlement of, in so able, and so satisfactory a manner.

There are other men in the house of Congress who if they were as true patriots as they would wish to be called, could be the means of doing much good for the country. But their patriotism seems to be turned wrong end foremost. Instead of loving their country they love themselves. They would send their fellow citizens to shed their blood and die on the field of battle, that they may reap the spoils and have the honor of settling the controversy after their dissolution, instead of settling it first, where all might have shared the honor of the transaction which could have been done no doubt, without difficulty had it not been for the prospect of the gold, and spoils of the vanquished. They are true lovers of their own popularity—they are like lions sleeping in their den's afraid to prowl for fear they might not be heard on the side of popularity. They possess no principles of their own, or at least no good ones, or they would not fear to bring them out, they would haul them before the world regardless of consequences, or they are like bats that stick under a piece of bark in the day time, and at night fly about to see what is going on, to see which side is likely to conquer that they may know who to fall in with. And such is the way that government has been imposed on from year to year. Such men sent to represent the rights of men women and children, who care only for the wages and how they may glide smoothly along that they may insure to themselves again the price, of betraying the confidence of the people. And such will ever be the case until our citizens are taught the importance of informing themselves relative to the affairs of government, and to consider the responsibility they are under and what they are doing when they go to the ballot box. Each one goes for his party, forgetting, too often, the consequences.

It appears to be a matter of doubt with some people whether or not, christian professors have a right to interfere in political matters. This calls to recollection a circumstance that took place in a church just before an election. A Rev. Mr. W. said that he thought political matters a very unfit subject for christian professors to be concerned in. A Rev. brother replied, if this be the case, that christians take no part in political matters, and make it no matter of concern, into whose hands the affairs of government should fall, Satan would soon have things just as he would wish. Who more than christians should be interested in the welfare of government, those who profess to have an interest in moralizing and christianizing the world, and who could have but little to hope for in either case without a wise and prudent government, "the success or failure of which will pour liberty or despotism upon a world." Could the most moral, wise and prudent men in the union, be called together, to legislate upon the important affairs of the nation, we should have a wiser and better government. The many evils that now unhappily exist would shortly be known no more. And when we have arrived at a reasonable degree of perfection in our own nation, we may expect but little difficulty or wrangling with the other nations of the earth. Or could the most intelligent men of the United States meet with those of Great Britain and other enlightened nations of the earth, to consider difficulties and to hold council in matters of dispute no doubt but their wisdom and honor would be sufficient to settle all national controversies by a tribunal of justice. A resort to arms would no longer be known, the history of war in ages to come would be but a tale of the past. No two intelligent nations could desire war—they could not wish to destroy the vast improvments, the prosperity and happiness of so many years of peace and quietude. Where would an Alexander or a Buonaparte find in this day the hosts that followed them then, not only cheerfully but enthusiastically followed them through every scene of danger, destruction and death? until worn out with famine and fatigue they made their graves wherever they chanced to fall? None but ignorant, savage, and war-like enthusiasts could ever have been led thus far to gratify the ambition or any such bloodthirsty men. Now to ensure the blessings of the country, peace on earth and good will to men, look well to the ways of government, and let men of integrity be chosen to fill the important offices of State. Be ever aware of those men who preach long sermons, to urge men to the field of battle and who are ever ready, or pretend to be, to go at the call of danger, and who are ever ready and willing to sacrifice their domestic obligations to the ambition of war. The duties they owe to their families, their wives and children who depend on them for their happiness and support through life are forgotten. The patriotism of such men is always to be doubted. Weighed in the balance, it is always found wanting. True patriots are men who regard the true interests of their country.

True patriots would count the cost of an unwarantable and unjustifiable war with a neighboring nation. They would consider the burthens of the people by taxation and otherwise, besides the loss of lives, and the blood that would be shed upon the occasion the paupers, the cripples, the maimed the distorted and distressed objects who have merely escaped with their lives who are thrown upon government and society for maintainance the balance of their miserable existence. The amount of the incalculable expenditures of war would obtain more territory by civil purchase than all the people of the United States could cultivate or even inhabit for generations to come, and it will be unnecessary to fight for territory if we create a war to kill off the people when they get too numerous, as say some of our advocates for war. According to this plan we will always have territory enough, the amount of military expenditures in time of peace, for time spent for equipage, for arms, and the enormous expenses of keeping up standing, armies which money if expended for the education of the youth of the country, soon men would be able to judge for themselves the wisest policy of government, instead of hundreds and thousands of persons in those (so called) intelligent states that are unable to read or write or to distinguish one letter in the alphabet from another. Or if it was expended for the purpose of moralizing and christianizing the world it would be sufficient to extend the moral influence of man, from the rising of the sun to the setting of the same. Now if we are perfectly satisfied that no good can result from war, let us try the result of peace. Is there any evil to be apprehended from its duration? Have not all the internal improvements of this nation been made during the interval of peace? Was not all the surplus revenue of the treasury accumulated during peace? Have not all of the State Houses all the Court Houses, all the churches whose steeples are reared as it were to the very skies been built during peace? Has not a link of brotherly love been formed between nations during peace that nothing but tyrants can break? In fine, has not everything that has ever been done either good or great, been done in time of peace? And is not destruction the whole business of war? Have not its ravages caused the land to mourn and the earth to weep tears of blood? To trace military training to its first origin and brutal state, let us reflect as far back as the ancient mode in Greece of training children to hardships and war. Those children were considered the property of government instead of the parents—and any that did not make a robust or healthful appearance were put to death in their infancy, and others after having arrived at a certain age were doomed to undergo a certain punishment by whipping, to try which could endure the greatest suffering with the greatest patience. Many have been known to expire under this operation without a murmur or a groan: and to this the parents were eyewitness. What parent is there now in existence in a Christian land that would not turn pale, whose heart would not sicken, whose blood would not chill in his veins, whose every feeling would not revolt at such a scene? Military training is modified in the present day because light and reformation has overspread the minds of human beings and caused them to look with abhorrence upon such scenes of brutality. And when war shall be viewed in its true light by the Christian nations throughout the earth it will be looked back upon with as much abhorrence as Grecian customs are in the present day. Time fails me to express and language to describe, all the horrows of war. But let it suffice to say, that peace has been productive of every good, and war of nothing but evil. Is it not then as plain as daylight that the greatest advantage to community must result from striving to inculcate the principles of peace throughout the world? let us teach other nations that we are all brethren, and that it would be Cain-like for us to massacre each other, and that we will rely in confidence, upon their honor in regard to their dealing justly with us, and never give them cause to suspect our fidelity in return, treat them as christians and friends. Let war be considered dishonorable, let it be considered degrading to any enlightened nation to resort to arms to settle difficulties. Let them be tried in the courts of justice, or by the honor of nations, let them be settled by fair and honorable principles, let this example be set, and it will probably have as great an influence in time over the different nations of the earth, as the conduct and character of heroes of war have had in ages past. It appears that what excited Philip's warmest ambition was that his kimdom should equal if not excel any that had preceded. Had their actions been virtuous no doubt but Philip would have labored as hard to excel them in acts of virtue and benevolence.

Now to teach men the principles of peace and to deal justly with all men, will not this hasten on the time that scripture describes, when their "swords shall be beat into ploughshares, and their spears into pruning hooks, when the lion and the lamb shall lie down together. When nation shall not rise against nation, neither shall they learn war any more?" SARAH TAYLOR.

MR. EDITOR: You will please publish the following from brother Kenedy of New-Richmond, as setting forth in his own language, his position on the slavery subject, in his official capacity at the last Gen. Con. to be read as a correction of any improper impressions that may have grown out of my indefinite allusion to him on this subject in the first number of Spectator, as published in the Recorder of June 11th 1846.

"My position on the slavery subject at the last Gen. Conference of the M. P. Church." "I attempted to give the difference between the two classes of abolitionists. The one party go in for dividing Church and State, this I called the Garrison party. The other believe that the Constitution of the United States, is, an Anti-Slavery document, and that Slavery may be abolished without any alteration of it; so I believe. And further, that the constitution of the Methodist Protestant Church is an Anti-Slavery document, except the word white, and that slavery may be abolished from the church without any alteration of the constitution. MILTON KENNEDY.

Springfield, Ohio, Sept. 11. 1846.

I wish here to state further. That I was wholly dependent upon information of others, for all the statements made in relation to the New-Richmond affair, having no personal knowledge of the matter, as I have not as yet been at New-Richmond. And now permit me to say again, that I have no unkind feelings towards brother K. and know not that he has any towards me. I can say with sincerity, I wish him well.

Yours truly,

JOEL DALBEY Jr.

REV. T. W. STEPHENS.

This brother, formerly a member of the Pittsburgh Conference, requests us to publish the subjoined statement of his reason for his withdrawal at the late Conference. The Conference did not see fit to order its publication as he requested, but we publish it to accommodate the brother's wish, taking the liberty to add too or three notes. [ED.

Brother President.—I arise to ask of this Conference a certificate of my standing.

I think the time has arrived when I should retire from the Itinerancy of the M. P. Church for the following reason, which I shall now mention with the leave of Conference. (Leave) Well sir, when I united with the M.P. Church I thought it to be an organization, expressly for the purpose of recognizing & defending the rights and liberties of all its members Ministerial & lay, this upon more mature deliberation, I found to be a mistake, in the distinction between the rights of white members and that of colored members, as recognised by the constitution & discipline of the Church.

When I discovered, that the constitution & discipline, made a distinction in the rights of members merely because of Color, I occasionally enquired of our ministers whether the government of the church, should not be equally free for colored members as for white members, & I was usually answered that it should be, and that it would be, that the subject of mutual rights was being much agitated, and that they expected it would soon be effected, but it was not done, still I hoped it would be, and when I entered the Itinerancy (seven years ago) it was generally expected, that the next general Conference would do something permanent in acknowledgment of defence of the Mutual & Equal Rights of all the members without respect to Color, but the conference did not do it. After the rise of the general Conference of 1842 in Baltimore some left the Church believing that the government never would be made truly representative, while many others anxiously expected it would be done at the general Conference of—46 but in this they were disappointed.

Under the present (almost unalterable) law of the church which requires two thirds of the several annual Conference to act before this matter can be accomplished & there being more than one third of the annual Conferences (Immovably located) in the slave states, opposed in their feelings & actions to the Mutual Equal Scriptural Rights of their Colored members (1) making it evident that under these circumstances it never will be done. (2.)

And now Sir, believing that the gospel of our Lord Jesus Christ, never was intended to introduce an invidious distinction, but to be the basis of a common brotherhood of Mutual & Equal Rights to all nations & Colors, and being fully convinced that the constitution and discipline of our church is not scriptural in this respect, and having witnessed the unwillingness of our Ecclesiastical assemblies, to exclude this unnecessary, unreasonable and unscriptural distinction from our book of Discipline, I now in the fear of God & with good will to my brethren of the Pittsburgh Annual Conference, ask a certificate of my standing—my name entered on the Journals as withdrawn, and my withdrawal with the reason published in the Western Recorder. THOMAS W. STEPHENS.

Sept. 5th 1846.

NOTES BY THE EDITOR.

(1.) This is saying more than facts will justify in reference to "more than one third of the Annual Conferences." Witness the resolutions of the Maryland Conference, our largest Cconferences in the South. Better anti-slavery men are not to be found than in some of our Southern Conferences: We know not a few, who are practical abolitionists (emancipators.) And if whole conferences are not yet willing to recognize the "scriptural rights of colored members," let them be further enlightened (not denounced) and we do not despair of seeing them come to right "feelings and actions," on this subject.

(2.) O, never despair. We are sorry our friend has given up the ship. Only see have we not in the north from 17 to 18 Conferences out of 30. Who knows but that in the onward progress of anti-slavery sentiments, some two southern Conferences will ere long give their voice for altering the Constitution. It is right and reasonable to hope for this. Would we not then have two thirds?

MR. EDITOR: A correspondent writing from Virginia, in the Recorder of Sept. 3d, seems to think "that the slave while in the hands of a religious master and well treated, is not a sin against God." He thinks if I understand him rightly, that severe and cruel treatment of the slave, by "hard hearted masters," renders it sinful. Now, Mr. Editor, permit me to enter my protest against this doctrine. I contend, that if an individual has a right to deprive his fellow man of liberty—to dispossess him of every attribute of a man—his right to himself—his right to acquire property, and his right to seek his own happiness in whatever way he may choose, that he does not interfere with the rights of others,) he has a right to administer just such treatment as he conceives will subserve his own interests. He has a right to treat his slave, as he would an incorrigible animal; if mild means will not answer, he may have recourse to something more severe.

To talk of a slave being well treated, when he is stripped of all his rights—reduced to the level with the brute creation—a mere thing—is an idea which I am totally incapable of comprehending. He may be treated well as a slave, but not as a man.

Perhaps I should hazard nothing in saying, that it is these good slave-holders—these moderate drinkers of the system, who give by their example and influence, the greatest support to slavery. What a pity it is, that those who are reputed as good men, do not come out and rid themselves of the evil.

I will here say, that it is my firm conviction, that an individual who holds slaves from choice, and for the sake of gain, who is enlightened upon the subject, cannot be innocent. But nevertheless, I believe that there are others who sustain the relation of master to slave, who are disposed to give unto their slaves that which is 'just and equal,' but are prevented by legislative disabilities, from giving them legal emancipation. Surely, such persons, while they are using their legal influence against slavery, and endeavoring to give their slaves their freedom, I cannot condemn. And I am not yet convinced, that the majority of those who voted for the Resolution passed at the General Conference, intended to give any sanction to any other form of slavery than this.

But your correspondent thinks "that the meddling with it does it more harm than it does good." He wants the subject let alone. Why, my good friend, agitation is the only weapon truth ever had to use. Would you strip her of that? Where would have been the Temperance reformation, if the subject had not been agitated? Agitation is God's plan. The friends of the slave must not be idle. Let them use soft words, and hard arguments; possessing the wisdom of the serpent, and the harmlessness of the dove.

LETTER FROM LEBANON, OHIO.

Mr. Editor: by an unforseen Providence I am intrusted with the pastoral care of a newly organized society in this place of which, no doubt Br. R. Rose has apprized you; but other interesting circumstances have since occurred of which, perhaps, you will be glad to hear.

This day, Thursday, Oct. 22d, 1846, was appointed for the laying of the corner stone of our new Church in this place. An unusually large assembly for such an occasion were present to witness the scene.

The corner stone was a cubic foot in size, beautifully wrought, having an excavation in the upper side sufficiently large to receive a glass jar, about 7 inches deep and 5 inches in diameter, of a cylindrical form, cast for the express purpose, over which there was a stone cap placed, which being sunk to a level with the surface of the other stone, made it appear almost like a solid block.

The object of the meeting was briefly stated, after which, the following document was read by Br. George Pyle.

Lebanon, Oct. 22d, 1846.

On Monday evening, Sept. 14, 1846, about Forty members of the Methodist E. Church, met in the Masonic Hall, Lebanon, Warren County, Ohio, to take into consideration the propriety of organizing themselves into a Methodist Protestant Society. After much deliberation, they unanimously resolved to adopt the Constitution and Discipline of the Methodist Protestant Chrch. Where upon Brs. Otis Stanford and George Pyle were appointed a Committee for the purpose of procuring a Minister of said Church to organize them into a Methodist P. Society. Accordingly, on Thursday evening, Sept. 17, 1846, the services of the Revs. Reuben Rose, and O. Warrington, being secured, after a sermon by the Rev. O. Warrington, under the superintendance of the Rev. R. Rose, a society was organized, consisting of 61 members. The services of the Rev. Joel Dalbey jr. also being secured, the meeting was protracted 12 days, during which, the number of the members was increased to 122.

On Oct. 9th, 1846, R. M. Dalbey was employed as pastor of said Society for one year; by whom up to this date, (Oct 22d, 1846) 11 more have been received, making in the aggregate 134.

(N. B. The above may not be the exact wording of the Original Manuscript, but is the same in substance.)

To the above, were appended the names of all the members of the Society; designating The Trustees, Stewards, Class leaders, building Committee and the Sabbath School Committee.

After the above was read, there was an opportunity given to any who wished, to unite with the Methodist P. Church at that time, to have their names recorded and deposited in the corner stone. Where upon 6 persons availed themselves of the opportunity; whose names in part, made up the aggregate above mentioned.

After the depositeswere made the services were concluded with prayer.

The depositesthere were The HOLY BIBLE, M. P. Hymn book, The Constitution and Discipline of the M. P. Church. The sacred Melodeon. The Rev. Wm. B. Evans' Questions and Answers. The Rev. A. H. Bassett's Annual Register of the Methodist P. Church, one No. of the Methodist Protestant. The 1 No. of Vol. 8, Western Recorder. Permanent Sabbath School documents No. 1. One No of the Temperance Organ. One No. of the Western Star, and one No. of The Sober Second Thought. And finally the names of The Rev. John M. Young President of the Ohio Conference. The Master builder and Master Carpenter of the Meeting house; The acting Governor of the State of Ohio and the Governor elect; Senator, Thomas Corwin, and the names of the Pastors of the different Churches in this place.

The Meeting House is to be made of brick, 40 by 60 feet in size, with a basement story; and a gallery in front, and which will have cost when completed, about 2,500 dollars. And such is the zeal of the building Committee, as well as the entire Church, that, if the progress of the work be not retarded by some providential circumstance, they expect it to be dedicated about Christmas. I do not know that, I ever became acquainted with any people more anxious to advannce the interests of our cause than the Society at Lebanon; while at the same time they seem as destitute of animosity to the Church from which they seceded as any Society with which I have ever been acquainted.

The time was, when in this place, the known friends of the Methodist P. Church were few indeed, but now, many a score may be found who are not ashamed to avow the rectitude of our principles. We pray for still greater prosperity. My sheet is nearly full, and I must close, after announcing, that, our 1st Quarterly Conference will be holden on Saturday Nov. 14. 1846; which we expect to succeed with a protracted meeting of several days; at which we solicit the Ministerial labors of Br. Joseph White of the Xenia Ct. and Br. Joel Dalbey jr. of Cincinnati Station, and all other brethren that can make it convenient to attend.

I am as ever yours &c.

R. M. Dalbey.

Thanksgiving Day.—Governor Wright has united with the Governors of Ohio, Maryland, Michigan, New-Hampshire and Massachusetts, in designating the 26th of November as a day of Thanksgiving, thus making six States which unite in the cummunion of this observance. Last evening's mail from Hartford enables us to add Connecticut to the great communion of states. Governor Toucy has issued a very impressive and eloquent proclamation, and much shorter than Governor Wright's.

Ministers' Department.

Written for the Western Recorder.

JESUS CHRIST A TRUE MINISTER.

The priesthood of Aaron was a ceremonial ministration, calling the attention of the people to a dispensation of religion & a system of worship, the light of which was as the pale and feeble moonbeam, falling upon the dark mountains and into the dark valleys of Israel. The fires burned low upon the altars, and the worshipers were few, when there was heard in the wilderness the voice of one saying, Prepare ye the way of the Lord. The last prophet of the old dispensation had lifted up his voce as the first preacher of the new, testifying of the approaching Jesus, that this is the Son of God. The multitude upon the wild bank of the Jordon, had witnessed the approach of a meek stranger to the Baptist for the rite of his ordinance, and had seen, to their astonishment, on his return from the water, a dove light upon him, and heard as from heaven a voice, saying, This is my beloved Son. The remote district of Galilee had slept in its sweet valleys by the side of its glassy lake, guarded by the sacred hights of Hermon and Tabor, and watched by the snowy peaks of Lebanon, while for many years the undisturbed worshipers had weekly gone up to the synagogues, reverently listening to the reading of the law and its expositions, when there appeared with the rulers and ministers a young man, speaking in the power of the Spirit, and his instructions were clearer and more eloquent and overpowering than those of any priest, any ruler, any minister. No one read the law like him. No one so clearly showed its meaning. No one ever spake with such holy pathos. All were astonished—All convinced. "And there went out a fame of him through all the region round about; and he taught in their synagogues, being glorified of all." Such a preacher! Who ever heard his equal? His unparalelled loveliness, his unsurpassed depth of thought; his stirring eloquence, are already the theme of delighted converse in every circle. He came to Nazareth. Here he was known. Here he had been brought up. His father and his mother were here. He is the son of Joseph the poor carpenter. His relations—all poor—were here, and known. It is Sabbath; and Jesus, as his custom was, was in the synagogue, where he belonged and from childhood had attended. But now he is thirty years of age. Now he takes his station with the ruler, the minister and the readers. On this occasion, the minister surrenders service to the son of the carpenter. He stood forth in the presence of the audience, opened the book, and read; "the Spirit of the Lord is upon me, because he hath anointed me to preach the gospel to the poor; he hath sent me to heal the broken hearted, to preach deliverance to the captives, and recovering of sight to the blind; to set at liberty them that are bruised, to preach the acceptable year of the Lord." Now he fully commits himself to them as a teacher sent from God. He claims this prophecy as relating to himself. "This day is this scripture fulfilled in your ears." This was the text. Then followed a sermon. Such a sermon! Such truth Nazareth's synagogue never before witnessed. "All wondered at the gracious words which preceded out of his mouth." According to the text and the sermon, he must be a preacher. The aged Simeon spake truly of the infant; "a light to lighten the Gentiles." That prophesy of long standing has not been kept on record in vain; "the people which sat in darkness saw great light, and to them which sat in the region and shadow of death, light is sprung up." The boy of twelve summers gave no uncertain promise of future brilliancy when he stood in the midst of the wisdom of his nation until hoary learning became dumb before him, and the embarrassment of the Jewish sage was only relieved by the approach and departure of his anxious parents.

CONTEMPLATE THE PREACHER.

He has been about all Galilee, teaching in their synagogues, and preaching the gospel of the kingdom. Now he is in the open field at the base of Hermon, but his fame is in all the land, and there is now gathered multitudes of people, from Galilee, and from Decapolis, and from Jerusalem, and from Judea, and from beyond Jordon. What a congregation! He ascends a little the hillside. He opens his mouth and speaks. O! what gracious words! "Blessed are the poor in spirit, for theirs is the kingdom of heaven." Then followed that memorable sermon on the Mt. Now he stands by the lake of Genezareth, and the people in increased multitudes gather around him, as if they would crowd the preacher into the sea, with every anxiety to hear the word that he spake. Chosing therefore a boat, a little removed from the shore, for his pulpit, while the broad canopy of heaven is the dome of his church, he holds that multitude in breathless silence, while he shows to them the doctrine of his kingdom. Now in the open plane; now in the wilderness; now in the house of some friends, is he seen preaching and showing the glad tidings of the kingdom of God. Nothing is more common, in the eventful history of the three years ministry of our Lord, than to find the people gathered together to hear him.

He is not a mere declaimer; for see how he meets the Jewish sectaries. There they are contending. A house divided against itself. Pharisee against Sadducee and Sadducee against Pharisee. The Sadducees approach with their doctrine of anihilation. The Pharisees exult to see them overcome by a few words from the Galileen, and think him quite worthy to be their champion. But no sooner is the one party put to silence than he turns upon the other, and in as few words, shows to them their blindness, and hypocricy, until they become enraged against him. Pharicees, Sadducees, Herodians, Scribes, Doctor, and Lawyers, are all shown their errors, and are all offended with him. Tho' he spake as never man spake, there is no place found for the stranger among the palace lodged-heads of the Jewish faith within the city. But two miles yonder in the suberbs, is a poor family. A brother and two sisters. With them is a place for him to rest his weary limbs, in the company of his disciples, during the night, and daily did the preacher appear in the temple reasoning with these infidel objectors, and showing the truth of his gospel. With what boldness does he speak. Public sentiment all turned against him, it matters not. It has no influence with him. He must set forth the whole truth tho' a world be condemned. No proffers from mitred or crowned heads; no flattery; no threatning, can deter him. Now he speaks the words that burn;—"ye generation of vipers how can ye escape the damnation of hell."

How circumstancial is that preacher. He has a word for every occasion. He is always making use of some circumstance to impart and enforce some important truth. See as he sets by the well of Samaria, when the woman approaches to draw water, how he discourses to her of the water of life. So, when the disciples have forgotten to take bread, he cautions them against the leven (doctrine) of the Pharisees and Sadducees. So, when he had fed the five thousand with five loaves and two fishes, he urges them to labor not for the meat that perisheth, and shows that he is the bread of life. And so he improves the occasion. He always says something that is applicable, and his teachings are never thrown away by being foreign to the occasion.

How consecrated is that preacher. What faithfulness appears in his ministry. "I must be about my Father's business," was a motto always before him. No worldly speculation entered his mind. His soul was intent upon the illumination of the world. Tho' destitute of all things, having not even where to lay his head, his work was of more importance than the seeking after them. Let Herod enjoy his palace, and his subjects take their ease, but he must finish the work which his Heavenly Father had given him to do. The work of the ministry is an important work. The fullest consecration cannot be too much. Here it was had. Hence those frequent journeyings from place to place, and this constant teaching and exertion. See, now he has ceased speaking, how he visits those sick. They are peculiarly the objects of his attention. How tenderly he draws near the abode of wretchedness. With what infinite satisfaction does he lend his divine assistance wherever it is needed. See, he has just been a son of thunder to the generation of vipers; and now, with what lovely tenderness does he turn to be the consolation of his believing disciples.

That was a holy preacher,—yet not exclusive. There was meekness in that mind, charity in that heart, and affability in those manners. No one is too wicked to share his attention. He is sent unto the lost sheep of the house of Isacal. He came not to call the righteous but sinners to repentance. Tho' it may seem strange to a self-righteous Pharisee, who would say to a fellow stand thou there for I am holier than thou, yet he enters the houses of the publicans and sinners. He eats with them. He lodges with them. He converses with them. He is familiar with them. This is the field of his labors. To win them over to his doctrine and prove their Saviour is his object. And now he enters the house of Levi to eat and drink with publicans and sinners. And now he approaches Zaccheus, a chief among the publicans, demanding that he must abide at his house. Then let it not be said if the modern preacher that he is too familiar with the wicked, that he keeps improper company, if his conduct only be proper in that company. Let him maintain holiness, but seek an acquaintance with all, and by a proper affability, extend his ministerial influence; but let him remember his calling.

Jesus Christ, as a minister of his own gospel, is the great example for all succeeding ministers of that gospel. As such, in every particular, his ministry is instructive, and the more it is studied and imitated, the greater advantage will be derived from it.

PROGRESS OF THE CAUSE.

It is frequently asked, what, after all the efforts of total abstinence men, has been effected?

We are surprised that any one should ask such a question; yet it may not be unprofitable for us to consider it briefly. To enter into detail would be needless, inasmuch as a perusal of our paper from day to day, must have convinced our readers that our cause is making wonderful progress. Let us, however, make a few general remarks, summing up the results of the benevolent efforts of the friends of the temperance reform.

1. A resolution has been produced in the sentiments of the community. The great majority of our citizens now regard the sale and use of ardent spirits as a beverage, sinful and ruinous; whereas, in years gone by, the business was believed to be innocent, and perhaps calculated to promote the welfare of the people. Hence, every house used to be a miniature groggery. Now, spiritous liquors are, if kept at all, hidden from visiters. It is no longer popular to treat.

2. The public mind has been enlightened as to the true nature of alcohol and its certain tendencies. Hence its sale and use, as a beverage, are not senselessly, but with sound reason, opposed. Even children are able to state why they are signers of the pledge.

3. The press—the popular mouth—speaks out loudly against the traffic; and where it does not, the people do not acknowledge it as their organ. Here is a mighty change.

4. Binding associations have been organized and are succesfully operating, in every part of the country, for the suppression of this evil. These are to prove a great agency in consumating the work of reform.

5. Practical good has been done too, in the redemption of many actual drunkards, the causing of many moderate drinkers to lay aside their cups, and the preventing of many a youth from forming the habit of drinking, by procuring, in proper time, his signature to the pledge, and his energies in the work, of temperance. Many a widow's heart has been made to leap for joy, and many a child to be glad in the smile of a reformed father, perchance, mother! Indeed, we could detail hundreds of benefits of this kind, which have grown out of the efforts of total abstinence men.

6. Besides all this, groggeries have been put down, fashionable tippling houses broken up, and even the fires of many a distillery put out.

We name nothing further at present. It is not our desire to impress our readers with the idea that all our work is done. No, indeed; would it were. But we do wish to encourage them to believe that the cause has been and is yet, making great progress, not only in our own, but in other lands. We have mentioned only a few items of the beneficial results of the efforts of the true friends of the cause.

There are yet distilleries in operation, and hundreds, yea, thousands of rum shops scattered, like death-spots, all over the fair surface of our favored country. But the same cause that has lessened the number of these, will entirely destroy them, under the blessing of God. There is no time for sleep now; let us work while it is called day. Put forth your energies, O ye noble temperance men; and let us never rest until the enemy is driven away back to the regions of death whence he came.—Columbian Fountain.

SANDWICH ISLANDS.

LETTER FROM MR. COAN, JANUARY 21, 1846.

Schools—Church—Temperance.

This letter of Mr. Coan goes much less into the details of his missionary labors, than some of his previous communications. A few facts furnished by him, however, will be read with interest. Since he last wrote he has made four extended tours, examined all the schools, conducted one or two protracted meetings, and held a meeting of several days with one hundred deacons, for consultation, instruction, prayer, &c.

Our common schools are more than fifty in number, embracing more than two thousand children, which is nearly all, of a suitable age, in Hilo and Puna. A few only are kept out of school by the papists; they have not, however, a regularly organized school in this field.

The state of the church since I last wrote, has been peaceful; and religion, on the whole has prospered. There is more enlightened action among the people. Their knowledge is increasing steadily, and with it the stability of their Christian character. Nearly three hundred have been added to the church since my last date—while very few have been suspended. Death however, is making rapid inroads upon our numbers. Not less than three hundred of our church members have died during the past year. I can now look upon a grave yard of more than two thousand of my flock, whom I have baptized, and to whom I have administered the emblems of Christ's body and blood.

In some parts of my field there is stupidity, and worldliness, and moral dearth; and in others there are heavenly showers, producing life and growth, But our struggle against the world, the flesh and the devil, is hard. And it must be constant, or we lose ground, and defeat will clothe us with shame and disaster. There is no discharge in this war, no rest in this work. This is right. We ask for no discharge till death brings victory and a crown through the merits of Him who died for us.

The Port of Hilo is rapidly increasing in importance. It is becoming a place of much resort for whalemen and ships of war, and is visited by them nearly every month in the year. Seven ships are now here, and they are going and coming constantly. Sixty whale ships, five men of war, and twenty brigs and schooners, have arrived here during the past year. Probably the number of whalers will double during the present year. The arrivals of the past year have brought about four thousand seamen into this port, and these, on a rude people, like the Sandwich Islanders, will exert a mighty influence for weal or for woe. Happily for our peace, we have no grog-shops on shore, and most of our foreign residents here have signed the total abstinence pledge.

Attempts are often and perseveringly made, however, to introduce this destroyer among us. Not long since a barrel of rum was smuggled on shore by a Portugese victualler, and buried in a taro patch behind his house. But the cask could not lie still, even in its grave. Like human carcases in the vicinity of some old medical college, its repose would be disturbed at night, and would send out an ill odor. You might as well try to hide a pole cat. At length suspicions were excited; search was made; fresh dirt was found in the man's yard; an exhumation took place; and daylight was poured upon deeds of darkness. The guilty were fined, the tiger was chained and peace restored. The same man was fined fifty dollars once before for a similar offence. Not many days ago a barrel of gin was reported on board a vessel which had just come into our harbor. This belonged to a Chinaman who resides here, and an attempt was made to smuggle it on shore. This however, was prevented and the gin was sent back to Honolulu, from whence it came,

Sailors search in vain to obtain the maddening poison here, and we have, therefore, been very quiet, notwithstanding the thousands who have thronged our shore during the past year. One midshipman from an English man of war feeling a litule afraid to speak the word "rum," went from shop to shop among our traders, inquiring, "Do you keep any thing here?" "What thing!" asks the grocer; "any thing to distract the brain?" On being answered, "No," the poor fellow went off, sadly disappointed, and cursing the port, by calling it "a wretched dry place," notwithstanding our abundant rains, and our sparkling cold water.

Mr. Coan notices the conduct of the officers in command of several ships of war, English and American, which were at Hilo last year, in terms of commendation. "In June last the British frigate Talbot, Sir Thomas Thompson commander, made us a visit. All were kind and courteous." In August the U. S. Sloop of war Portsmouth, commander Montgomery, and the flag ship Savannah, commodore Sloat, arrived. "These visits were peculiarly pleasant. We found the commodore to be a man of an excellent spirit, a lover of peace, order and justice, and a respector of the Christian religion. In his frank, open hearted kindness, he reminded us much of commodore Jones. We were also highly pleased with Captain Montgomery." In addition to other favors, sixty five dollars were contributed by the commanders and officers of these ships; to aid Mr. Coan in his missionary operations. In the following month the English ship of war Collingwood, rear-admiral Sir George Seymour, visited Hilo. He showed the missionaries every kind attention, and gave thirty-two dollars for the benefit of the two schools at Hilo. Twelve dollars were added by the captain and chaplain.

CEYLON.

From a letter of Mr. Hoisington, dated July 1, the following extract is taken:

"We have just commenced a new term in the Batticotta seminary, after a vacation of four weeks. The last one was a term of unusual interest. There was some advance, I trust, in spiritual things. Just before the close of the term, I propounded for admission to the church seven students, and one old man, a hopeful convert from Romanism, who is no way connected with the service of the mission. I have good accounts of them all, and expect that they will be admitted to the church at our next communion."

A letter has been received from the students of the seminary, written by D. L. Carroll, expressing their "grateful sentiments" for the benefits conferred upon them by our missionaries, and offering their "warmest thanks." "We have been the recipients," they say, "of the good that has been done by the operations of the American Board of Missions. We have had the happiness to enjoy the blessings brought to us by the preaching of the gospel. "The people that sat in darkness, saw a great light; and to them which sat in the region and shadow of death, light is sprung up.' Civilization and learning are making happy progress, and true sience sheds its benign rays. The innumerable discoveries in the useful arts, which have raised the civilized world to the elevation it holds, are brought within our reach. We are enabled to throw off the shackles of superstition, and walk in the glorious freedom of the gospel."

EVANGELICAL ALLIANCE.

Yesterday, (Tuesday, August 25th,) pursuant to notice, the first public meeting of the Evangelical Alliance was held in Exeter Hall, which, although the tickets of admission were one shilling each, was well filled, both in the hall and galleries. The platform and a portion of the area set apart for their use were crowded with the members of the Alliance from this and other countries. Among the ladies in the side galleries were the Countess of Ducie, the Countess of Effingham, Lady Culling Smith, Lady Campbell Lady Olivia Sparrow, Hon. Mrs. Kinnard, Hon. Mrs. Trotter, Mrs. Farmer, Mrs. A. D. Campbell, Madame Tholuck, Miss Patton and Miss Cox, of New York, the family of Chevalier Bunsen, &c., &c.

Sir Culling Smith, Bart., took the chair. The proceedings were commenced by the Rev. Dr. Alder, who gave out the hymn,— and read the 133d Psalm, after which the Rev. Dr. Byrth, rector of Wallasey, engaged in prayer.

"All people that on earth do dwell."

The Chairman said—Ladies and gentlemen, I feel deeply in responsibility of opening the subject of the present meeting. So deeply do I feel that responsibility, that I am conscious nothing but the help of God, sought by your prayers on my behalf, can enable me rightly to discharge the duty which this day devolves upon me. I would desire, in addressing you, to myself against extremes on both sides. I would desire to accept the caution given to the conference recently by a beloved brother—that we should abstain from self-laudation, and from exaggerating the importance of the present movement; and I would desire on the other hand, by the help of God, to be preserved from discouragement, and to take as elevated a view as I am justified in taking of the importance of our present proceedings. I would desire to remember that I am in the presence of a great assembly, convened under very peculiar circumstances; but on the other hand I would desire, if possible, to obliterate you all from my sight, and to feel—if I might do so—that I am only in the presence of my God. I think, brethren, that I shall best discharge my duty this morning by very briefly referring to the circumstances under which, and the object for which, we are now assembled. Let me state to you that our meeting to-day is the result of a series of meetings which I shall briefly recapitulate. About this time last year an invitation was sent from Scotland to a number of Christians in this country, requesting them to meet at Liverpool. The result of that invitation was that, in the first three days of October, last year, about two hundred and twenty different denominations of Christians, met at Liverpool. At that meeting, known to all of you by its name and by its character—known to you also as the scene of a wonderful manifestation of the presence of God, and an out-pouring of his Spirit, it was resolved to appoint four commitees —one in Scotland, one in Ireland, one in the north of England, and one in London. These committees were to meet from time to time in the aggregate; they have so met two or three times to confer together upon the object at which we aim; and they issued invitations not only to brethren in this kingdom, but in foreign countries, to assemble for conference in this metropolis. They again met in committee on the 12th of the present month, when they were assisted by a large number of foreign brethren whom I see around me, and who aided them in the preliminary preparations for the subsequent conference. On the 19th of the present month—a day which I hope may be long remembered in the history of the Church —the conference assembled at the Freemason's Hall in this city. It consisted of somewhat less than one thousand members, convened from our own country, and from various parts of the world, including, I believe, Christians from all the Protestant nations of Europe, and—I am thankful to say—many of our trans-Atlantic brethren. The result of their deliberations is not yet completed. From day to day we have been meeting to deliberate on the great object for which we were convened. We feel confident in our own minds that the Spirit of our God has aided us in the conclusions at which we have arrived. Most important conclusions had been reached up to last night; other important subjects of consideration still lie before us; and we come here to-day to state the results at which we have arrived up to the present time—not to propose resolutions to this large assembly, but to communicate to you the facts and results to which the goodness of our God has led us. And now, brethren, for what purpose has this great mechanism been put into motion? What was the great motive that influenced the brethren in Scotland? What was the great pass-word that assembled us at Liverpool? What is the talisman which has here brought together brethren from Germany, from France, from Switzerland, from Sweden, and from the United States, to deliberate first in committee, and then in conference? Why have we ventured to call upon you to assemble here to-day? What common truth is it that we think we possess, and which we have come to-day to lay before you, before Europe, before the Church, and before the world? We come to exhibit to you, if we may be permitted to do so, a great fact. All true philosphy is founded upon facts. While philosphy traveled through the region of speculation it failed to effect its great mission in the world; but when Bacon and Newton taught that philosophy rested upon facts it became a practical science. Chistianity is a great fact; it turns upon historical facts; and we come to tell you a great fact which we all believe, and which we hope a majority of you believe also. That fact is this—that every believer in the Lord Jesus Christ is spiritually one with every other believer. We care not whether he dwells on the east or on the west of the Atlantic, whether he speaks the English language, the German, or the French, we believe he has a common sentiment, and that in his heart he speaks a common language, that he has a common hope, a common faith, a common destiny with every brother believer in the Lord Jesus Christ throughout the whole world. It would not be becoming in me, as your chairman, to develop to you this fact, which will be referred to by others. We must consider what we propose to do, founded upon this principle. Starting from this point, we propose to put this fact before various classes. We wish to bring it before the Church—to remind the Church of its own character, its own unity, and to stir up belivers to hail one another in the Lord. We desire to lay this fact before the Romam Catholic in a spirit of deep affection, and before the unbeliever with equally deep affection. We address ourselves to these two classes, one of which believes that it possesses the unity we claim, while the other believes that unity exists not, and that there is no certainty in religous truth. We desire, by God's help, to convince these two classes; first, the Church of Rome—they who believe too much—and next, they who believe too little, that there is a one truth, and to show our unanimity in believing that truth. How do we propose to do shis? If I were to develop the mode of effecting this object I should be trenching upon subjects which have not yet been entirely concluded upon in our conference. One advantage of our continued meeting will be this—that matters which cannot be fully communicated to you today, may be communicated to you to-morrow and the next day. It is not legitimate for the chairman or for others to speak of matters as settled which are yet sub judice; but I may state that our foreign brethren are fully agreed with the committee in thinking that it will be possible so to hold up this standard of unity throughout the world, that whoever believes in our common truth may be able in some shape to be organized and united together in presenting that common truth to the world. Our object is, that on both sides of the Atlantic, and on both sides of the channel, brethren believing in our common Saviour, may have an opportunity of uniting together and consolidating their forces for the maintenance of our common truth. With these preliminary remarks, let me say that those by whom I am surrounded, throw themselves, first upon God for his blessing, without which the best concerted projects cannot succeed; next upon the Church, for its sympathy, hoping that if we possess truth—as we think we do—it will commend itself to the conscience of every one who holds the same principles with ourselves; and then we throw ourselves—delightful thought! —upon the world—upon the Jew—upon the Mohammedan—upon the heathen, to give us a patient hearing. We promise them that we will bring forward this subject in love. We will endeaver to convince their intelligence, to reach their hearts, and satisfy their conscience; and our desire and hope is, that, by the blessing of God we may be able to do so. We think we have the word of God with us; we think we have the Spirit of our God with us, too; and if I am asked whether the feeling of Christians is with us, I would quote the words inscribed in memory of Sir Christopher. When upon the cathedral of the city "Si monumentum quæris circumspce." (The Hon. Bart. resumed his seat amid loud applause.)

Sir culling, after some conversation with the Secretaries, again rose, and said he was requested to state that the respective speakers would expatiate upon "topics," and not upon resolutions to be put from the chair; and he was also called upon to exercise his authority as chairman, by requesting the speakers not to extend their addresses beyond the period of fifteen minutes each.

The Rev. Edward Bickersteth, rector of Watton, was then called upon, and was greeted with loud applause.

The Rev. Dr. Steane read the following topic, upon which Mr. Bickersteth had been requested to address the meeting:—

"Topic 1.—That this conference composed of professing Christians of many different denominations, all exercising the right of private judgment, and, through common infirmity, differing among themselves, in the views they severally entertain on some points, both of Christian doctrine and ecclesiastical polty, and gathered together from many and remote parts of the world, for the purpose of promoting Christian union, rejoice in making their unanimous avowol of the glorious truth, that the Church of the living God, while it admits of growth, is one Church, never having lost, and being incapable of losing, its essential unity. Not, therefore, to create that unity, but to confess it, is the design of their assembling together. One in reality, they desire also, as far as they may be able to attain it, to be visibly one; and thus both to realize in themselves, and to exhibit to others, that a living and everlasting union binds all true believers together in the fellowship of the Church of Christ, "which is his body, the fullness of Him that filleth all in all."

Mr. Bickersteth said—My christian friends, blessed be our God, the Evangelical Alliance for promoting the manifestation of Christian union has at last been formed and established! God has graciously prospered the work. Our present duty is to bring before you those conclusions to which we have harmoniously come. We have seen more than ever that God has been with us in every step of this work. Glory be to his name alone, we have seen that, notwithstanding the differences of Christ's disciples, there is among them a deep, real unity. Though our differences in judgment have been most frankly expressed to one another, we have been drawn nearer and nearer to each other in mind and in heart throughout the whole course of our discussions. I testify that I have seen nothing of any design to injure any particular Church, and still less my own Church. God has given us great kindness and consideration for our peculiar circumstances, as established or non-established, as British or as foreign Churches. This, my brethren, is no political movement, it is no party movement, it is a spiritual, evangelical movement, to unite the children of God in supporting great vital truths against great vital errors. By God's blessing we shall injure no particular Church. By God's blessing we shall help all. I rejoice that so many clergymen of the Establhed Church are joining our ranks. We are naturally slow and backward in new movements. Only forty-eight clergymen joined the Church Missionary Society at its establishment; only two hundred and seventeen were connected with that Society in the eighth year of its existence, nearly forty years ago when I first joined it, but it is now supported by four thousand clergymen. Blessed be God, before the Evangelical Alliance was formed, two hundred and fifty clergymen joined it. I trust the Evangelical Alliance will so command attention by it own character that my beloved brethren, in my own Church and in other Churches, will rejoice to join it; but we will blame no one of any Church simply for not joining it. We will, by God's grace, give them credit, wherever we can for the purest motives. We deny not their zeal with us for Christian union. There are hundreds and thousands of ministers and brethren longing to join us, when they see their way clear. Hearts are bursting with desire to be with us, and we stand with open arms to receive all who love our Lord Jesus Christ in sincerity. The "topic" intrusted to me to address you upon relates to the essential unity of the Church of Christ. It is a magnificent and glorious truth. I tremble almost to touch it. The false assumptions from it give Popery all its strength, the corruption of this truth into mere external forms leads to the denial of the power of godliness. Our desire is to bring it out in its reality, and to manifest it as far as we can before our Lord cometh in his glory. There is, then an in visible but essential, a hidden, but a real unity, in the Church of Christ. This will be manifested in its fullness when the Lamb's wife—the bride—shall be presented faultless in the presence of the divine glory. But there is a progress and growth in the Church, and in the manifestation of its unity. We may see the same principle in the highest of all beings—the God whom we love and serve—in his manifestation of himself in his works: The great God is essentially invisible, dwelling in "the light which no eye can approach unto," whom no man hath seen, or can see. Yet the invisible things of Him, from the creation of the world, are clearly seen and and understood by his eternal power and Godhead. He is really, essentially, and gloriously one, yet he reveals his glorious Godhead in the persons of the blessed Trinity; and further, in all its wonderful works he manifests his glory. At the first creation all was "without form and void, and darkness covered the face of the earth." The invisible God then existed the same, but there was no manifestation in the world of his glory. Then, as God, "the spirit moved upon the face of the waters;" the hidden glory became manifested in ten thousand varieties; and air, and earth, and sea, and sky became vocal with praise of the glories of our God. The essential unity of the Church of Chirst is the same invisible reality yet to be manifested. It is a mystery which has hitherto been hidden as to its full visible manifestation. For six thousand years this Church has been growing. There is an infinite variety of gifts and graces given to the people of God, but the same Spirit works all in all; there is a deep, real, full oneness amidst every diversity. As this spiritual unity and glory of the Church of Christ is manifested and developed, the hollowness, the deceitfulness the insignificance, the emptiness, of the false, pretended mere outside unity in which the Church of Rome has boasted, will be evident to all men, and the world will believe that the Father sent the Son to be the Savior of the world. One blessed effect of our alliance has been to make manifest this glory. Nearly one thousand Christians from America, England, Scotland, Ireland, Wales, Prussia, Hamburg, Switzerland, Germany, and the Channel Islands, have met together, acknowledging their essential unity, and exhibiting it in a united confession or summary of the great truths of the Gospel.

The Rev. Dr. BEECHER, from Cincinnati, said he had to endeavor to establish a most important truth—to show that the basis that they adopted, and to which some thousand names he supposed had been subscribed, was a sufficient and real basis for the whole Church of God on earth to stand together upon. The analogy of the whole divine workmanship, material, mental, and moral, illustrated this most significant and wonderful fact—the simplicity and sublime efficacy of all which God does. Everywhere, in matter and mind, he had systematized his work, and he produced complex effects innumerable, by simple, central powerful causes. In the heavens he had kindled up that light which, by its silent power dispensed light and heat among the active inhabitants of this world. The Lord God was a sun; he was the fountain of life, the object of attraction, the source of motion, to all intelligent minds in the universe. According to this anology God had organized and united the sacramental host. It was the prayer of Christ that his people might be one, as the Holy Trinity of heaven are one, and it had always been regarded as a duty by the real members of the Church of Christ, to maintain this unity of the Spirit in the bond of peace. That unity had been sought, yet it has not been found; but to-day they were planting their feet on the basis of this unity. The failure had not been because there was no such unity, or because it was not clear and definite, but, because, through human infirmity it had not been sought aright. Some have sought it by intellectual unity of creeds without reference to the heart;—others by the heart—good nature—without intellectual unity; others had sought to accomplish it by force, by the extinction of intellect, and reckless disregard of holiness; but these means have been ineffectual. He thought they were all inculpated in the folly and crime of having, while seeking this sacred union, required not much of one another, of having required not only substantial unity, but a unity in circumstantials and minutiæ before they could meet or work together. They had now just found out that there was a difference between essential unity and minute circumstancial agreement, and that where the heart was right the mind would be substantially right with respect to the revelation which God had given them. This unity was called the unity of the Spirit, because the Spirit had revealed it, and had produced it; and it included three essentials—substantial unity in intellectual belief, cordial unity of love for the truth, and for the God of truth, and for the developments of that truth in the Gospel of our Lord Jesus Christ—and practical unity as the fruit. He rejoiced that Christians were now united on these principles, and that their union would continue not only on earth, but throughout eternity. He would only say in prospective faith, "Glory to God in the highest, peace on earth, and good will toward men. Halleluiah! halleluiah! for the Lord God omnipotent reigneth, and the kingdoms of the earth have become the kingdoms of our Lord, and of his Christ."

The CHAIRMAN then said that he was permitted to deviate from the prescribed course of the proceedings, and to fulfill a duty to the meeting, and derive sincere pleasure for himself, by calling upon one to address them who was not only noble in rank, but noble for the stand he had made in defense of the common truth which they held, in an assembly more difficult to address than the present, and who had not in that assembly been ashamed to acknowledge the Evangelical Alliance. He begged to call upon the Earl of Roden to address them.

The EARL of RODEN, who occupied a seat at the back of the platform, then rose, and was greeted with renewed cheering. The noble Earl, at the request of the Chairman and other gentlemen, advanced to the front of the platform, and spoke as follows:—I cannot refuse the kind invitation I have just received from my honorable and valuable friend in the chair, to take a small share in the interesting proceedings of this day; for I felt it a great privilege to be permitted to come from the most distant part of the sister island on purpose to witness the scene I have the happiness to see before me—such a cloud of witnesses from all parts of this kingdom, from almost all countries, and comprising persons of all denominations, uniting together this day in a solemn, important, and blessed cause, with the view of knitting together the hearts of all those, who love our Lord Jesus Christ in sincerity. It is now many years since I was first privileged to join that great, that valuable, that giganic and blessed institution—tha British and Foreign Bible Society, on the very same principles, and with the same feelings, with which I am permitted to come before this meeting to-day, and unite myself with the Evangelical Alliance. I cannot but think, sir, that we are assembled together upon a most solemn occasion. Many of us meet here for the first time, some from one part of the world and some from another; some belonging to one branch of the Church, and some to another; and we are assembled together, I trust, with one single purpose—not for the elevating of Chuches; not for setting forth any particular systems; not to speak of ourselves but to elevate him who is God over all, blessed for ever—him to whom every knee shall bow, and whom every tongue shall confess to be the Lord, to the glory of God the Father. I trust, sir, that is the object which has brought this great assembly here to-day; and is it not a solemn thought that we who have assembled on this occasion, we who have never seen each other's faces before, we who live in such distant parts of the world, may never meet again till we meet in the presence of that blessed Lord in whose cause I trust we have united. I felt fully, sir, the force of what you said with respect to the time allotted to the addresses of each individual, and I should be sorry to infringe upon the rule which has been laid down. I will, therefore, conclude, by wishing that you, and all who are engaged in this great undertaking, may receive that blessing which cometh from on high, without which all our efforts and endeavors are nothing worth.

Professor THOLUCK, of Halle, spoke at some length on the essentials of unity, showing the advantages of mutual exhortation, fellowship, and prayer. There was no Church or Christian party that might claim the absolute truth in every respect, on every point. There was no Christian Church which had not had to learn something from other Churches. The present movement was calculated to bring about a manifestation of that union of Christ's people of which they had known the existence, but the reality of which they now felt. It was the first time in ecclesiastical history that such a union had been so far accomplished. An additional proof that the movement was under influence from above, might be found in the fact that, very recently, the Evangelical Church of Prussia had unanimously decreed that while particular local usages or opinions might not be interfered with, a general standard for fundamental truth should be raised, which would exclude from the ministry any candidate who was not sound in the faith on vital points. The Rev. and learned Professor proceeded to read "The Form of Ordination for Candidates for the Ministry of the Evangelical Church of Prussia," observing that it would be found in substantial and happy agreement with the doctrinal basis adopted by the Evangelical Alliance. By his kindness, we are enabled to subjoin a copy of it:

FORM OF ORDINATION FOR CANDIDATES FOR THE MINISTRY OF THE EVANGELICAL CHURH OF PRUSSIA.

Whosoever, is lawfully called to the office of in the Evangelical Church, and is to be consecrated thereto by prayer and the imposition of hands, is required publicly to testify, That he holds the common faith of the Protestant Church.

Wherefore, First, He is required to take, as the rule of his doctrine, neither of his opinions, nor any human dogmas whatsoever, but the word of God as found in the prophetical and apostolical Scriptures.

Secondly, He engages faithfully and diligently, with God's help, to continue steadfast in that exposition of holy Scripture, which, according to the law of tongues, is of the Holy Ghost, in harmony with the confession of universal Christendom, and with the confessional works of the Protestant Church, as witnesses of the fundamental truths of salvation, and ensamples of sound doctrine.

(Here will follow the assent of the candidate to be ordained, upon these things being required of him.)

And here I especially demand of you:

Whether you, in common with the universal Church of Christ on earth, confess God the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost!

Whether you,

1. Confess in common with the whole Protestant Church, Jesus Christ, the begotten Son who made himself of no reputation, and took upon himself the form of a servant, as the one, only Mediator, seeing that, as a prophet sent of God, mighty in words and and works, he hath proclaimed peace and, as everlasting High Paiest, hath by his death reconciled us unto God, having given himself for our sins, and risen for our justification, hath sat down on the right hand of the Majesty on high; and hath everlasting rule as the Head of the Church, which he gathers and preserves through means of the word and sacraments by the Holy Ghost, which is sent by him into our hearts, teaches us to call Jesus "Lord," and to know the grace which is given to us in him? And

2. Whether, in the faith of this glad tidings of the free grace of God in his well beloved Son, you will confess and bear witness that we are altogether sinners, yet become children of God by the faith of Christ; whereby we, being justified before God by mere grace, without merit of works, receive the promise of the incorruptible inheritance, which is treasured up in heaven; and that we by the same faith, which, working by love, bringeth forth mighily the fruits of the Spirit; and day by day renewing the heart, are prepared for the day of Jesus Christ?

The Professor concluded a very affective address (of which we regret that we are able to give only an imperfect outline) amidst loud cheers.

The Rev. Dr. STEANE then read the second topic as follows:

"TOPIC II.—That this conference, while recognizing the essential unity of the Christian Church, feel constrained to deplore its existing divisions, and to express their deep sense of the sinfulness involved in the alienation of affection by which they have been attended, and of the manifold evils which have resulted therefrom; and to avow their solemn conviction of the necessity and duty of taking measures, in humble dependence on the Divine blessing, toward attaining a state of mind and feeling more in accordance with the word and spirit of Christ Jesus."

This topic was expatiated upon by the Rev. Dr. ROBSON and the Rev. Dr. BUCHANAN, both of Glasgow. Taking for granted the essential unity of the Church, they severally noticed its "existing divisions," and the evils thereby engendered, both within and without. The former earnestly enforced the duty of prayer: the latter concluded an animated address by observing:—Two hundred years ago the Pilgrim Fathers were driven, by a forced conformity, across the Atlantic: we now saw these Pilgrim Fathers return to their fatherland, to embrace their brethren in the Lord, and engage in a common Christian cause against the common enemy.

The Rev. PASTEUR BAUP, of the Canton de Vaud, gave some affecting details relative to the suffering and persecuted Church with which he is connected. In some measure, its ministers were the martyrs of union. He enforced the duty of humilation before God, from the fate of his own country, where, in the time of prosperity, they had been wanting in devotion and thankfulness.

The Rev. EDWARD BICKERSTETH could not at this stage of the proceedings refrain from adverting to the presence of his reverend friend, the Rev. WM. JAY, of Bath, whose works and labors of love had so long blessed the whole Church of Christ. He congratulated him on his having been preserved through seventy-seven years to witness the proceedings of this day, and expressed the cordial affection of the whole meeting toward him. He trusted that his friend would cheer their hearts by a few words.

The venerable and reverend gentleman, who sat on the right of the President, was evidently much affected at these marks of respect and esteem, but declined to come forward publicly.

After a pause Mr. BICKERSTETH said:—Our beloved friend and brother is so overcome by his feelings as to be unable to address you: but his heart is in the movement.

TO BE CONTINUED.

FOREIGN NEWS.

From the N. Y. Sun.

ARRIVAL OF THE STEAMER CALEDONIA.

FIFTEEN DAYS LATER FROM EUROPE.

ALBANY, Wednesday evening.

The steamship Caledonia, from Liverpool, October 4th, arrived at Boston last night at eleven o'clock. Her advices were received here this evening by the Morning Train from Boston, and the Eastern Telegraph being deranged, we forward the news to you by our telegraph, in anticipation of the arrival of the mail at New York.

Flour has advanced three to four shilling per barrel.

Cotton without change.

The steamer Great Britain went ashore an the coast of Ireland, the night of the day on which she sailed from Liverpool. All the passengers were saved.

Several of the passengers engaged berths in the packet ship New York.

Large shipments of all sorts of food to Ireland are being made by the British government; while agents faom France, Holland and Belgium are in Liverpool, buying flour in bond at 32s. per barrel on speculation; under the impression that all the ports of Great Britain will soon be opened for the free admission of American and other foreign supplies.

There has been quite an advance in Flour in the English markets. Free flour brings from 34s. a 34s. 6d. Bond from 32s. a 33s. There was much activity in wheat. United States red, brought from 8s. 3d. to 8s. 9d. White 8s. 9d. to 9s. The advance in flour is from 3s. to 4s. In Indian Corn the quotation is 46s. per quarter. In Cotton there is no change.

Dr. Cox, of Brooklin, was to preach in the Scotch Church, Liverpool, 4th Oct., on the providential escape of the passengers of the Great Britain.

The passengers by the Great Britain having met after the disaster, Dr. Cox being called to the chair, measures were adopted to obtain a reimbursement of their passage money, and means to defray other expenses attending their unhappy situation. The owners of the ship have, in the most handsome manner, returned the passage money, and expressed their sympathy for the passengers.

A proposal was made to the agents of the Halifax and Boston Mail Packets to send out the Acadia: but on referring to their contract with the Admiralty, they felt obliged to refuse upwards of sixty of the passengers who engaged to take their berths. Passengers by the Caledonia (says the Boston Courier) think the Great Britain steamer will not be got off.

The London Circular to Bankers, a publication of high authority in monetary circles, expresses satisfaction at the prospect of a much larger crop of potatoes in England and Ireland, than was expected. The spread of the disease has been arrested.

There has been a spell of fine weather, much like our Indian Summer, which has had the effect of arresting the progress of the potatoe disease. Two American vessels with potatoes were unloading at the Dublin quay, and selling at 10d. per stone. This is the begining of a great importation. There has been considerable activity in sugar; large sales at advanced prices have been made. Beef and pork are in excellent demand, at increased prices. Wheat, Flour and Indian Corn are selling at exorbitant prices, nor is there any probability of a fall.

The London Times and Morning Chronicle are out with an indignant protest against the Montpensier union with the Infanta of Spain.

The steamship Brittannia, from Boston, arrived at Liverpool on the morning of the 30th ult. in thirteen and a half days. She encountered severe weather, which protracted her passage.

The rate of discount in the London money market remained unchanged, but the demand for money had improved, and the funds were dull and neglected. The state of Ireland and the relations of Europe, arising out of the Spanish marriage, have had an extensive effect upon the market.

The state of the Cotton trade is a subject of much anxiety and a good deal of comment. Since the beginning of May, five months ago, prices have advanced enormously, at least 25 per cent, or a penny per pound.

The Iron market has ruled firm since we last addressed our readers.

The potato crops of England and Ireland have proved vastly better than was dreamed of. Much relief has been felt in consequence.

A MOHAMMEDAN DISCOMFITTED.

Mr. Drose, who is sustained by the Berlin Missionary Society at Ghazipoor, a few miles below Benares, declared in the presence of several Mohammedans, who pledged themselves to prove from the Holy Scriptures that Mohammed was indeed a prophet sent by God, that in case they succeeded he would himself become a follower of the prophet of Meca. Preparations were immediately made for a learned contest. The missionary was conducted to a Mohammedan schoolhouse, and a chair was brought to him. The Mohammedeans who were present, sat down at the same time on their carpets. They appeared, however, to be waiting for some one else; for the eyes of the assembly were directed, from time to time, to the door. At length a man of very noble aspect arrived, richly dressed, and carried by four bearers, in a palanquin. He was the most learned moollah in the place. All rose up respectfully. There had been already prepared for him a sort of platform, covered with carpets; this he mounted with uncovered feet. He then beckoned four of the most distinguished Mohammedans to himself, laid his hands upon them to bless them, and caused them to be seated, two upon his right, and two upon his left. Next he sat down himself, and looked around, earnestly and deliberately, till the missionary spoke to him.

The contest now began. Several copies of the New Testament were produced, and the fourteenth chapter of John was found. Upon every verse a dispute arose, wherein, the Mussulman endeavored to convince the missionary that Christians misunderstood their sacred writings. Finally he came to the thirtieth verse: "Hereafter I will not talk much with you, for the prince of this world cometh." It passed through the mind of the moollah, like a flash of lightning: The prince of this world is no other than Mohammed; who, as the seal of the prophets, was to become a teacher after the Nazarene, and win over and govern the world by his doctrine." He read the passage again, then expatiated in triumphant language on the glory of Mohammed, who was here spoken of, and closed by calling upon the missionary, in an earnest and imposing tone, to believe in him whom Christ himself had foretold as a prince and lord of this world. But alas! for the moollah. Mr. Drose showed that by the prince of this world the Scriptures meant simply the Devil. He became white with anger, and gnashed his teeth through inward rage. In the net which he had hid, was his own foot taken; and he was snared in the work of his own hands!

WESTERN RECORDER.

PUTNAM, OHIO.

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 31, 1846.

CINCINNATI IN DANGER.

Rev. M. M. Henkle one of the Editors of the Nashville Christian Advocate, with whom we have enjoyed an agreeable acquaintance for many years whilst he resided in the north, and especially whilst he was a minister of the M. P. Church, attended lately the session of the Kentucky Conference, of the M. E. Church, South, at Covington, opposite Cincinnati. He writes home for his paper interesting sketches of his journeyings and observations. Whilst at Covington, he gives a description of that "hospitable and flourishing little city," and also of Newport, that "flourishing town" on the east bank of Licking river, and soon to be connected with Covington by a bridge. In the same connection, he gives a glowing description of Cincinnati. The view from Covington, he remarks, is exceedingly fine. He speaks of the 'animated quay, navy of steamboats private and public buildings, numerous spires &c. He observes that Cincinnati is truly a wonderful place, 'famous for industry and enterprise," and abounding in good schools, colleges, churches, foundries, factories, printing offices, and Dutch doggeries," (good ones, eh?) He remarks that "the glory and bulwark of the city are its churches, schools and workships." "But he continues, I fear, Ichabod will be written on that crown of glory and bulwark of strength, if the spreading desolation of licensed drunkeness and legalized loferism be not soon stayed." Now, whilst we coincide with Br. H. in all the fine things he has to say of the Queen City, we must lament that the bad things to which he refers, are also, too true. "Vile drinking houses," we agree, are a "pestilence and plague spot of any communhity." But we somehow, could not help observing that whilst our brother could contemplate the plague spot, pestilence, spreading desolation of licensed drunkenness and legalized loferism" of Cincinnati, for which he fears, Ichabod will be written upon her, he could discover nothing in the least exceptionable in reference to the "flourishing little city,' and flourishing neighboring town, across the way. Perhaps they are free from the "plague spot," 'Dutch doggeries, licensed drunkedness, and legalized loferism, Are they? But if so, we ask, have they not instead, licensed tyrrany, and legalized oppression? Are not men there licensed to lord it over their fellows, and make them chattels personal? Are there not those there who live lives of unrequitted toil, and of untold privation and maltreatment, all of which is legalized, and wither, and die, and go to the bondman's grave, in sight of the soil of freedom? If you know nothing of these things, there are those who do. Say not, that in Kentucky, slavery exists in its mildest form. To a certain extent, doubtless this is the case. But is it legalized only in this form? You will not say that it is. We could refer to incidents of the cruelties of slavery, of late years, within about a days journey of Cincinnati, which would disgrace a Cuban nabob. And you are not to tell us that these are fictitious stories, made up by northern fanatics. Kentuckian citizens shall be our witnesses; and we hesitate not to say, that notwithstanding we so frequently hear of northern misrepresentation of the cruelties of slavery, the toughest tales of all, by far we ever met with, have been related to us by slaveholders themselves. Then give us ths Queen city after all. Though she has "Dutch doggeries," she sits in the land of the free. Though "licensed" (permitted) men are not compelled to be drunkards, they are free. Come, Br. H. We will labor, and write, and preach, against this licening drunkenness and loaferism, till we get the "plague spot" removed. And you, in your enlarged sphere of usefulness, will labor, and write, and preach, against the system nd practice of Slavery in Covington and elsewhere, till you get the evil overthrown. Will you? Come, old friend, would not this be mutually minding our own business? They complain down your way, of "nothern interference." Now we do not wish to be meddling. And therefore we would be glad to see southern brethren getting on valiantly with the reform, we think to be needed. You will excuse this small interference in the present instance as we have taken it so patiently that you stood upon the southern side of the Ohio, and looked over the water upon us, to see what evil and good there was to be said of us. Don't forget, we have plead guilty to all you say. May we expect you to reciprocate? Br. H. we would be glad to see you. though you have left us M. P's, and us northerners, call on us if ever again you come this far towards the Artic pole.

COLUMBIAN MAGAZINE.—The November number is before us, elegantly illustrated, with three engravings, one of which is mezzotint. Very fine work this—highly adapted to the popular taste, Israel Post, publisher, 140, Nassau St. N.Y.

DIVISION OF THE M. E. CHURCH.—The Nashville Christian Advocate, gives an exhibit of the correlative statistics of the Northern and Southern divisions of the M. E. Church. Twenty four Annual Conferences are embraced in the Methodist Episcopal Church, (North.) viz. N. York, Providence, N. England, Maine, N. Hampshire, Vermont, Troy, Black River, Oneida, Genesee, Erie, Pittsburgh, Ohio, North Ohio, Michigan, Indiana, N. Indiana, Rock River, Iowa, Illinois, Baltimore, Philadelphia, N. Jersey, Liberia Miss. In these are embraced 3,262 travelling preachers, 299, superannuated, and 4,874 local preachers; and 651,171 membesr.

The Methodist Episcopal Chuech, South, embraces sixteen Annual Conferences, viz: Misouri, Indian Mission, Kentucky, Holston, Tennessee, Memphis, Arkansas, Texes, East Texas, West, Mississippi, Alabama, Georgia, Florida, S. Carolina, N. Carolina, Virginia. These embrace 1,385 travelling preachers, 96 superanuated, and 3,607 local preachers, and 461,533 members.

The Advocate futher represents that by the returns for a year past, the Methodist Episcopal Church has experienced a decrease in membership, of 39,460; whilst the Methodist Episcopul Church, South, has experienced an increase of 12,597.

We see that the statistical tables of the N. C. Advocate, are copied by the Pittsburgh C. Advocate, from which we infer that no exception is taken to the correctness of the data.

THANKSGIVING.—The proclamation of the Governor is short, and we keep it in type two or three weeks, to keep our friends reminded of the day set apart for the public observance. Heretofore, we have noticed with surprise and regret that the announcement of a day of Thanksgiving was generally made at so late a date, that the citizens of the State, beyond the chief cities and towns would scarcely be apprised of it, till the day was past. Seldom, in country places, would ministers learn of the fact in time to make any arrangement for public services. But we are pleased, that in the present instance, due notice is given, and we believe that the people of Ohio in general will be without excuse, "O that men would praise the Lord for his goodness and for his wonderful works to the children of men."

OREGON. INFORMATION WANTED.—Br. J. C W. Evans, of Pennsville, O. writes us that several Methodist Protestants of that place think of emigrating to the far off, "sun set country" (Oregon) described by Br. E. E. Parish in his letter lately published in the Western Recorder. He enquires in reference to our correspondence with Br. P. and by what means they might get a letter to him, and obtain an answer. He wishes to be informed in reference to the expenses of the journey—what it cost Br. P. and whether those who emigrate to Oregon will be entitled to bounty in land, and how much.

We regret indeed that it is not in our power to satisfy at once the enquiries of our friend. The letter of Br. Parish published in our paper, as above stated was addressed to Br. Springer, and was published during our absence at the Pittsburgh Conference, so that we have not seen the letter.—We have not access to Br. Springer just now, to enquire of him, but we are told that Br. P. gave no instructions how a letter could reach him, nor any information further than what was published. Any of our readers, who may be in possession of facts, to meet the inquiries of the Penville friends will confer a favor by communicating, and we will be pleased to publish for their benefit. We will state however that Br. Thomas Mapel of Waynesburg, Pa. the father in law of Br. Parish, stated to us at the Pittsburgh Conference that he had been visited by a man direct from Oregon, who brought information that Br. P. had sold out his property there and was going right off upon a mission to California! We hope soon to learn of the establishment of a line of post routes across the Rocky Mountains, by order of Congress. We wish to send the Western Recorder occasionally to our old friend Parish, if indeed he stops in his progress, somewhere this side of the jumping off place.

LIFE OF REV. N. SNETHEN.—We give the following extract of a private letter from W. G. Snethen, Esq. for the purpose of facilitating the object in view.

Washington, D. C. Oct. 15, 1846.

"Dear Sir: I am writing the life of my revered father, and am desirous of obtaining any of his unpublished letters which you or other brethren whom you may know, possess, for the purpose of consulting as far as possible, the record of his own pen &c. If you will loan them to me, and get any brother who may have such to loan them, I will return them safely, when I am done with them."

We trust that this request will receive the attention of those brethren who have in hand letters or papers of the lamented Snethen. We apprehend that Dr. Dorsey of Steubenville, and Br. J. Whetstone and others of Cincinnati, would be able to furnish some valuable papers. We say to Mr. S. we will transmit a parcel, so soon as we have time to hunt them out from our mass of letters. We further inform him that Rev. C. Springer of Meadow Farm, O. was for several years publisher of the M. Correspondent and also conducted the Western Recorder, from its commencement until last year. He is therefore better prepared to give you informrtion in regard to the writings of father Snethen in these periodicals.

REVIVAL.—By private letter from Br. N. Linder, we learn that quite a reviving season was experienced at the quarterly meeting of his Ct. at Farmington, O. Eight united in church fellowship. He adds, "the Georgetown Ct. is looking for better days. We are all of one heart, and are united in our efforts.

GREAT FIRE, AGAIN.—Yesterday's mail brought intelligence of a great destruction of property, through the villany of incendiaries, at Apilachicola, Fa. on the 16th inst. Three houses were fired simultaneously, and it took four hours great exertions to subdue the flames."

LOUISIANA CONFERENCE.—The minutes came to hand yesterday, and will be published without delay.

INDIAN MASSACRE.—Accounts have just reached us from Fort Washita in the far off west, that a great slaughter of the Witchetaw tribe of Indians, had been perpetrated. It was supposed that the Camanches or Pawnee Mahas, had nearly destroyed the remains of the Witchetaw tribe.

SEARS' MAGAZINE.—The numbers in advance for November and December, of this work, have just come to hand, filled with instructive and valuable matter. We are always gratified that Mr Sears' gives attention the the different branches of natural Science, rendering his work useful, as well as entertaining. There are some good illustrations in this double number. Rob't Sears' 128, Nassau St. N. Y.

GRAHAM'S MAGAZINE.—The November number of this elegant work is received. The illustrations, are two copperplate engravings, and two other representations of Game birds of America. Considerable attractions are promised for the new volume, 1847. G. R. Graham & Co. 98 Chesnut St. Philadelphia.

PRESBYTERIAN OF THE WEST.—This interesting weekly, has lately commenced a new volume, with new type and enlarged sheet. It makes now a very handsome paper, and we esteem it a valuable exchange. It is the western organ of the old Scool branch of the Presbyterian denomination, and will keep us advised of the transactions and prosperity of our respected brethren of that order. Published by H. M'Grew, Cincinnati, Edited by Rev. Messrs Dunlap & Smith. We receive regularly also the Watchman of the Valley, (New School) and the Cumberland Presbyterian, of both which, we have heretofore spoken favorably.

☞Rev. A. M'Caine, of S. Carolina, has prepared three letters, animadverting upon the resolution of the General Conference respecting Slavery, the first of which is received. We are surprised that our old friend should institute a question whether their publication would be admissable in our columns. Certainly our readers as well as we, will be pleased to give Br. M. a hearing. And as Dr. Reese, of Alexandria D. C. the author of the resolution in question, is the regular receipt of our paper, he will be fully competent to give any attention to the animadversions, he sees proper through our columns.

DIED in this villiage, On Saturday morning the 24th inst. of inflamation of the stomach, Emily, daughter of Benjamine and Elizabeth Scandlin, aged 10 years. We learn that she experienced a remarkably happy death.

IMPORTANT FROM MEXICO.—By information received at Philadelphia from Havana, it appears that Santa Anna had left the Capitol, and was marching to Montrey with four thousand troops.

DISCIPLINES, &c. We expect in a few days to have a supply of the new edition of the M. P. Discipline, from the Book Concern, Baltimore, and will be pleased to supply the demands of the surrounding circuits. We have also ordered a supply of Hymn Books, but have just been informed, by the Agent that, the last edition is exhausted, and that we will have to wait a little for a new edition of the Hymn Book to be issued from the press. As we have to pay for the books without credit, it will be necessary for brethren ordering smaller lots from us, to make arrangements to pay for them on the receipt of the books. We make this statement in answer to enquiries of some brethren who wish to know if we can wait till they make sale of the books. Certainly a small amount can be borrowed for a short time in any Circuit, for so safe an investment. We would be glad to accommodate brethren, but are under necessity of observing the above stated arrangement.

☞The communication of Dr. Knight, given below, was unintentionally omitted last week.

Written for the Western Recorder.

THE RULING PASSION.

The ruling passion of the nineteenth century is, the tendency to perfecting the physical and moral welfare of man. Science, arts, private and general industry, every thing tends towards the end; every one is carried along by this general movement, man as well as government. Among human sciences there is one which, for the last eighteen hundred years, investigates the wants of humanity, and ever meditates upon them. To this science humanity owes in a great measure, the physical welfare which it now enjoys. This science is medicine, the dominion of which embraces surgery, pharmacy, and the veterinary art. Thus it is that the medical family folds, as it were, within its arms, society in general. It ploughs the waves with our vessels. It accompanies our soldiers in the camp, and on the field of battle—it watches at the domestic fire-side, in hospitals, and in prisons. Human vicissitades meet it nearly every where, and every where they find it prepared to make the greatest sacrifice. The more important, the more indispensable, the service which the medical body renders to society, the more attentive a government should be to the institution whice it regulates. Thence the anxiety of our government to improve the laws which govern medical institutions. Yes, it is our duty to acquire as much information as possible, in order that we may be of the greatest possible utility to our fellow citizens. And is it not the duty of our government to protect us in the application of the knowledge we have thus by hard labor acquired, and to see that all the members of the social body are benefited by it. One of our greatest men once said, "I know nothing in the world more contemptible than a cowardly soldier or an ignorant medical man; the first is contemptible, because he compromises the fate of his country in the day of danger; the second, because he compromises hourly, the life and welfare of his fellow creatures." But thanks be to Heaven, there are no cowardly soldiers in the United States, and is not government under obligation to society to employ all its power to render it impossible that there should be such a person as an ignerant medical practitioner.

SCHOOL EXAMINATION.—We regret that a pressure of business prevented our attending the school examination last week in this place, though we were favored with a special invitation. We are assured by gentlemen who attended, that it was quite interesting, and resulted creditably at once to the instructors and most of the pupils. We insert with pleasure the subjoined report of Br. Chandler, the principal.

MR. BASSETT: The following report of the character of the pupils in the Boy's School in this place, for the quarter ending on the 23d inst. was read at the close of the term. Will you please give it a corner in your paper, for the information of parents who were prevented from being present to hear it read? The credit marks are for punctuality, and conformity to the rules of the school. The black marks, for want of punctuality, and for violating rules. The first column of figures, shows the number of days each pupil was a member of the school;—the second, the number of credit marks each one obtained; and the third, the number of black marks, if any. The highest number of credit marks that could be obtained in the first and second classes, was 120; and in the third, 102. The average age in the 1st class was 13; in the 2nd, 10; and in the 3rd, 8 years. Respectfully yours,

Z. M. CHANDLER.

*Ashland and Mahoning counties return their votes for Governor to the counties from which they were taken, and have been included with them.

P. S. Since the above was placed in type we learn that an error has been discovered in the vote as set down for Columbiana. The townships of Mahoning were not added. When added they make a difference of several hundred and bring the majority to about two thousand.—O. S. Jour.

A Baptist Church established at Oregon City, Oregon. The New York Recorder gives extracts from letters from the Baptist missionaries to Oregon, the Rev. Messrs. Fisher and Johnson. They travelled on the Western route, being 7 1-2 months on the road, and making a distance of 2500 miles. They say the winter is remarkably mild, that their grains and vegetables do well, and their turnips grow to an extraordinary size. Their opinion is that towns must rise up, on the Columbia river, and vast cities on the Pacific.

State Temperance Convention.

To the friends of Temperance throughout the State of Ohio.

COLUMBUS, Oct. 20, 1846.

The Board of Managers of the State Temperance Society have resolved that a Convention of Delegates from the different Societies throughout the State, be held at Columbus on the 2nd Wednesday of November next, in the Methodist Episcopl Church, at 9, A. M.

The Convention is for the purpose of adopting measures to obtain such an expression of public sentiment upon the License Question, as will secure the favorable action of the coming Legislature.

It is very desirable that the Temperance Societies throughout the State be generally represented at the Convention, as business of great importance is to be transacted.

ROBBERY OF GOV. CORWIN.—Some villain entered the room of Gov. Corwin, on Monday last, at the Pearl Street House, Cincinnati, by means of skeleton keys, and, without awaking him or disturbing any of the inmates of the house, robbed him of his gold watch and $27 in cash. The scoundrel also entered another room and abstracted the contents of another gentleman's pocket book; contents not stated.—Lebanon Star.

A Spurious Ten Dollar Bill, purporting to be on the State Bank of Indiana, has just been shown, having for its Vignette a female sitting, and a sailor standing near, pointing to the ocean, on which a vessel is in sight. There is no such vignette, or any thing resembling it, on any bill of this Bank, and the public only need to be advised of it, to prevent its circulation. It is probably filled to various Branches, the bill shown is on Indianapolis Branch.

PAINFUL ACCIDENT.—A few days since a little child, a daughter of JAMES WATSON RILEY, ESQ., was very badly injured while crossing one of our streets. She fell accidentally, and before she could get up a two horse wagon run against her, one of the horses stepping on her face and breaking her jaw bone. Hopes of her recovery are entertained; but we hope the accident will prompt parents to keep a close watch over small children and induce greater care on the part of teamsters driving through the city.—*O. Dr. William C. Warner, aged 42, member of the Vermont Legislature from Bristol, took a dose of strychnine by mistake, and died in ten minutes afterward, at Montpelier, on Sunday morning, 17th.

The steeple of the Central Congregational Church, at the Falls in Norwich, was blown down during the late storm. After turning a somerset, it fell through the roof to the floor of the church, making a hole just large enough to admit of its passage.

When a crack is discovered in a stove, through which the fire or smoke penetrates, the aperture may be readily closed in a moment, with a composition consisting of wood ashes and common salt, made into paste with a little water, plastered over the crack. The good effect is equally certain, whether the stove be cold or hot.

A simple servant boy one evening went up to the drawing room on the bell's being run. When he returned to the kitchen he laugheed immoderately. Some of the servants asking the cause of his mirth, he cried, "What do you think? there were sixteen of them who could not snuff the candles, and were obliged to send for me to do it."

From statistical documents presented before Congress, it appears that the capital employed in the manufacture of paper in the United States is $18,000,000. The number of mills, 700; the annual product $17,000,000, and the number of operatives employed, 100,000.

THE HAPPY MAN.

The happy man was born in the country of Regeneration Unto Life; was educated in the school of Perseverance, working at the trade of Diligence, and sometimes performing acts of self-denial. He is clothed in the garb of humility, and has a better suit to appear at Court, called the robe of Righteousness. He breakfasts every morning on spiritual prayer, and sups every evening on the same. He has meat to eat the world knows not of; and his drink is the sincere milk of the word.

He has a large estate in the country of Christian Contentment, and his delightful mansion is called Salem, or the abode of peace. His associates are the excellent of the earth, such as excel in virtue and piety; and he holds communion with the Father of all spirits. Where truth inhabits, there he is found; on his lips is written the law of kindness, on his tongue the dictates of truth. His breast is fortified with the armor of Christian Righteousness, and in his heart there is no guile.

Faith bears a shield before him—while Mercy presides at his right hand, and Justice at his left. Should darkness at any time envelope his goings, the law of God is a lamp unto his feet, and a light to his path, and none of his steps shall slide. Thus he pursues the onward tenor of his way through the wilderness of this world to the celestial Canaan, where only righteous men dwell, and where the spirits of just men made perfect are ever with the Lord. In a word, he has sin under his feet, the world behind his back, grace in his heart, heaven in his eye, and a crown of glory over his head. Happy is the life of such a man, and happy is his death.

Would you attain such happiness, strive earnestly, work diligently, pray fervently, live holy, die daily, watch your heart, guard your passions, redeem your time, love Christ, persevere to the end. "Mark the perfect man, and behold the upright, for the end of that man is peace."

THE BABOON AND THE HOTTENTOT.—Many are the extraordinary anecdotes related of the baboon. One was told me by Mr. Moffatt of a Koranna, who possessed a tame baboon, which in common with all the monkey race, entertained an intense dread of snakes. Its master, from mere wantonness, forcibly entwined a dead snake around the babboon's neck, when the animal sat motionless for upwards of an hour, stupified with fear, and on the snake being removed, stole timidly into the hut of the Koranna. After a short lapse of time the baboon was, according to custom, called on by its master to scratch his head, but, although summoned several times in an angry voice, it refused to move. The Koranna rose and struck it with a stick, and immediately the enraged and aggrieved animal sprung upon him. The neighbors, hearing the scuffle, ran to see what was the matter, but could distinguish nothing through the dust raised in the hut except hot cinders, which were kicked about in all directions from a fireplace in the centre of the abode. The screams of the man and the baboon were intermingled, till at length the latter dashed out through the bystanders and escaped to some mountains. The Koranna had been rather seriously bitten in the encounter, and was some weeks in recovering, but ultimately regained his strength, and, bent upon revenge, scoured the mountains in search of his antagonist. He at last descried his baboon, which he could discern from any other, peeping over a crag, and levelled a gun at him; but the animal instantly withdrew his head, and held forward one of his companions as a target instead of himself, chattering loudly as in defiance, so that the man was compelled to return foiled and disappointed.

From the Nashville Christian Advocate.

THE WORK OF GOD IN NASHVILLE.—The work of conviction and conversion, we rejoice to say, still progresses in our city. Almost daily some one lets us know that he or she desires to flee the wrath to come. There have been a good many conversions and additions to the church since my last notice. Our young members are very lively, and are delighted with their class and prayer-meetings. The number of conversions since the revival began exceeds 400, 385 of whom have joined the Methodist E. Church, South, a few have joined other churches, and several others are now waiting to join the Methodist. We devoutly thank God for what he has done, and are deeply humbled, when we think that there are thousands yet in our city who are living in sin, regardless of the calls of God, and of their own eternal interest. May God in mercy extend the work of grace until all shall be converted, and let every Christian say, Amen.

F. E. PITTS.

THE TEN COMMANDMENTS VERSIFIED.—The decalogue bas been thus tersely and quaintly rendered into rhyme, and would in this shape be a good excercise for the memories of young children:—

1. I am the Lord thy God—serve only me—
2. Before no idols bow thy impious knee;
3. Use not my name in trifles or in jest;
4. Dare not profane my saced day of rest;
5. Ever to parents due obedience pay;
6. Thy fellow-creature, man, thou shalt not slay;
7. In no adulterous commerce bear a part;
8. From stealing keep with care thy hand and heart;
9. All false reports against thy neighbor hate:
10. And ne'er indulge a wish for his estate.

Many of the Chineese dwell in floating houses, and some of them keep large flocks of ducks, which swim about the harbors in the day time, but are called home by a whistle at night. An English officer was surprised to see how readily and rapidly the duck obeyed the call, and on making inquiry on the subject, was informed that the owner always beat the duck that arrived latest.

There is a volume contained in a few words of Shakespeare when he says —"Drunkenness is an egg from which all vice may be hatched."

NOTICES.

DEAR BR. BASSETT—From a note in the Recorder of the 8th inst. I learn that one old pioneer, Br. Moses Scott, though, "left without an appointment at his own request,"—"is still disposed to render efficient service." Having "recently formed a class of nine members, at the Ohio furnace, with an encouraging prospect of increase." You ask —"Was it not an oversight, that a new Mission was not recognized in the region of the iron work?" In my opinion, it was. Indeed, I feel certain it would have been done, if the subject had been brought properly before Conference.

On the 60th page of of the discipline I find a law, passed at Gen. Con. of 42,—designed to empower the president of A. C. to meet all necessitous cases which may arise during "the interval of conference,"—the latter member of which reads thus;—"or in case the president shall be fully satisfied from his own personal knowledge, or otherwise, of the need of such ministerial services, without any special call upon him for aid, he shall have authority to appoint a Missionary in all such cases." From the authority I find in this provision, and the information I have in said note, in the Recorder; I feel it my duty to say to Br. M. Scott, that if it is his pleasure to accept it, I hereby appoint him to labor as a Missionary, in the region of the Ohio furnace, until next A. C.,—And his Missionary field of labor may be known, (unless some other name, more appropriate, is suggested) by the name of "Ohio Furnace Mission."

Will Br. Scott please respond to this, through the Recorder, and give such information as he may be in possession of touching the prospects of establishing our cause, in the "furnace region."

I had been freed from a paroxysm of the ague for three weeks, during which time, my strength increased and my prospects of permanent health were flattering; but on yesterday, I had strong indication of a return of the ague.—It may, however, pass off. For a few days during my hard trial in parting with my "bosom friend," I was much exposed, and greatly enfeebled from the great anxiety of mind and wounded affections, which my bereavement unavoidably produced; all of which, operated very hard against my health. I purpose visiting the Georgetown Ct. as per notice, but at present shall not make any other appointment,—but will, so soon as I feel justified in so doing.

Those wishing to write me, will please do it through the Recorder.

Yours in love,
GEO. CLANCY, Prest. M. A. C.
New Alexandria, Jefferson Co. Oct. 23, 1846.

We are gratified to have the privilege of making this anouncement, thus officially, respecting this new mission. Furthermore, we beg leave, in addiion to the authority of the President to give Br. Scott a commission to procure us a lot of paying subscribers, within his range. ED.

MR. EDITOR: I would say through the Recorder to Br. Clancy and the Brethren in general, That after receiving my appointment I proceeded directly to examine the strength and position of the mission. And found one small disbanded Society, called Russels Class, on Tomica and 2 or 3 members a little south of Martinsburg. These constituted the whole force and strength of the Mission.

I appointed a meeting, called the little flock, together, organized a Society, continued the meeting a few days, and closed with an increase of 6 or 7 members. After which I threw out a list of appointments, at some of which we have good prospects.

Our first quarterly meeting will be on the 7, and 8th. of November. Having been very respectfully and Christianly solicited to hold it in the Baptist Church we accordingly will occupy the first Baptist Church on Mohawk, Coshocton county. Pray for us Brethren.

JOHN K. DUFFY.

BR. BASSETT: I have so far recovered from my affliction, as to be able to perform some service. You will please to publish the following plan of appointments:

Twin Creek. Ct.	Nov.	14, 15.
Xenia	"	21, 22.
Lebanon	"	28, 29.
Cincinnati Ct.	Dec.	5, 6.
Cincinnati St.	"	12, 13.

JOHN M. YOUNG.

MORGANVILLE CIRCUIT.—We are authorised to say that the Quarterly meeting is to be held at Malta, on the 14th and 15th November.

WASHINGTON CIRCUIT.—The first Quarterly meeting will be held at Burnett's M. H. Nov. 14, and 15. We invite any of our brethren who can, to come and help us.

J. H. WEBSTER, Sup't.

ZANESVILLE CIRCUIT.—We are requested to announce that the first Quarterly Meeting will be held at Brownsville, commencing, two weeks from this day, (Saturday,) on which occasion the new meeting house will be dedicated.

POETRY.

THE OCEAN.

BY WM. DANA.

Ho! how the giant heaves himself, and strains
And flings to break his strong and viewless chains;
Foams in his wrath; and at his prison doors,
Hark! hear him! how he beats and tugs and roars,
As if he would break forth again and sweep
Each living thing within his lowest deep.
O Type of the infinite! I look away
Over thy billows, and I cannot stay
My thought upon a resting-place, or make
A shore beyond my vision, where they break;
But on my spirit stretches, till it's pain
To think; then rests, and then puts forth again.
Thou hold'st me by a spell; and on thy beach
I feel all soul: and thoughts unmeasured reach Far back beyond all date. And, O! how old Thou art to me. For countless years thou hast rolled Before an ear did hear thee, thou didst mourn,
Prophet of sorrows, o'er a race unborn;
Waiting thou mighty minister of death,
Lonely thy work, ere man had drawn his breath.
At last thou didst it well! The dread command
Came, and thou sweptst to death the breathing land;
And then once more, unto the silent heaven
Thy lone and melancholy voice was given,
And though the land is thronged again, O Sea!
Strange sadness touches all that goes with thee.
The small bird's plaining note, the wild, sharp call
Shake thy own spirit; it is sadness all!
How dark and stern upon thy waves looks down
Yonder tall cliff—he with the iron crown.
And see! those sable pines along the steep,
Are come to join thy requiem, gloomy deep!
Like stoled monks they stand and chant the dirge
Over the dead, with thy low beating surge.

POETRY OF JOHN QUINCY ADAMS.—In the summer of 1800, Mr. John Quincy Adams, then minister at Berlin, made an excursion through Silesia, and visited the Giant Mountain, the highest land in Germany. It was the custom of the travelers, after they had visited it, to write their names and some sentiment in a book kept at a cottage on the side of the mountain. Mr. Adams was the first that had ascended this mountain, and he thus describes his sensations:

"Sentiments of devotion I have always found the first to take possession of the mind on ascending lofty mountains. At the summit of Giant's head, my first thought was turned to the supreme Creator, who gave existence to an immensity of objects that expanded before the view. The transition from this idea to that of my own relation, as an immortal soul, with the author of our nature, was natural and immediate; from this to my native country, my parents and friends, there was but a single and a sudden step. On returning to the hut, where we had lodged, I wrote the following lines in the book:

"From lands beyond the vast Atlantic tide,
Celestial freedom's most beloved abode,
Painting, I climb'd the mountain's craggy side,
And view'd the wonderous works of nature's God.

"Where yonder summit, peering to the skies,
Beholds the earth beneath it with disdain,
O'er all the regions round I cast my eyes;
And anxious sought my native home—in vain.

"As to that native home, which still infolds
Those youthful friendships to my soul so dear—
Still you, my parents, in its bosom holds—
My fancy flew, I felt the startling tear.

"Then, in the rustling of the morning wind,
Methought I heard a spirit whisper fair:
Pilgrim, forbear, still upward raise the mind,
'Look to the skies, thy native home is there.'"

Conference Proceedings.

OHIO CONFERENCE.

Preamble and resolutions respecting slavery, submitted for adoption, by a committee.

Whereas a number of our circuits, embracing a respectable portion of our membership, by resolution of Quarterly Conferences, instructions to delegates, petitions, memorials &c., have called for further and decisive action on the subject of slavery, some praying for division, secession, convention &c. And whereas our book of Discipline and the action of our late General Conference give each Annual Conference power to act in the premises. Therefore in view of the welfare, unity, and prosperity of the Ohio District,

1st. Resolved, That the right of suffrage within the bounds of the Ohio District be extended to all our male members irrespective of color over the age of twenty one years.

2nd. Resolved, That as a Conference, we disclaim all fellowship with the system of slavery, or participating in any guilt connected therewith, and publish to the world that we stand as an Anti-Slavery Conference. J. WHITE, Ch'm.

The two following, offered by Br. R. M. Dalbey were also adopted.

3d. Resolved, That we affectionately recommend to all those Annual Conferences where Slavery exists, to use their utmost influence as Christians for the extirpation of slavery from the Christian Church in their Districts, and that hereafter, voluntary slaveholding be made a test of membership, in the Methodist Protestant Church.

4th. Resolved, That a committee of three be appointed respectfully to memoralize said Annual Conferences, on the immorality of the system and the necessity of condeming and abandoning it at once.

WITTENBURG COLLEGE.

Whereas, this Annual Conference has received information that the Directors and Faculty of Wittenburg College, through its President, Rev. Dr. Keller, do tender to candidates for the ministry in our Church, the privileges of its Theological Department, free of charge. Therefore,

"WESTERN RECORDER."

The committee to whom was refered the consideration of the relation of this Conf. to the Western Recorder, and its Editor beg leave to report.

Resolved, That provided the press be strictly free to admit discussion of any of the great moral questions now exciting the public mind, the Editor retaining the right, to suppress any communication for want of proper preparation for the press, or on account of personalities &c. And provided further, that the Recorder furnish in its columns a medium of communication for this conference, publishing whatever may be of interest to the prosperity of the Ohio conference of the M. P. Church. We the said Ohio conference do bind ourselves as ministers and delegates to act as agents for said periodical, in extending its circulation, and in collecting and remitting dues, to the Editor, for said periodical.

J. DALBEY JR. Ch'm.

INSTITUTION OF LEARNING.

A select committee having been appointed to take into consideration the propriety of erecting an Institution of Learning, reported as follows:

Resolved, 1. That this conference will enter into the erection of an Institution of Learning at Leoni, Jackson Co. Michigan; Provided the Leonians will donate to this conference 10 acres of land, and $1500 in labor and building materials, payable within 20 months from the rise of this conference; and also a subscription of $1500 payable in 5 annual instalments upon the scholarship principle.

6. That the agent be authorized to visit the citizens of Leoni and to ascertain whether they will accede to the proposals of this conference, and if so that he call a meeting of the trustees as soon as practicable.

The above report was adopted.

Report of committee on Memorials.

Your committee to whom was referred sundry memorials and resolutions from some thirteen or more quarterly conferences, asking for a separation from slavery and the final establishment of this conference free from slaveholding, i. e. a free M. P. Church, would beg leave to report in the form of a preamble and resolutions.

Whereas the late General Conference of the M. P. C. has peremptorily refused to condemn the system of American slavery, which has entwined itself around the southern section of said church, and has found its way into our highest legislative councils, and seeks for protection under the constitution of said church, and whereas said G. C. has declared to the world in open council, that the G. C. of the M. P. C. has no authority to legislate upon the subject of slavery, and referred the subject to the several A. C. to act for themselves so far as authorized by the constitution; and as the elementary or foundation principles of said constitution require ministers and members to oppose all moral evil; and as slavery and slaveholding is the foundation of the vilest of all moral evil, and as we are required to have no fellowship with the unfruitful works of darkness, (slavery not excepted,) be it therefore,

Resolved 1st, That we do hereby dissolve all connection and fellowship with slavery and slaveholding in the M. P. C. and do hereby declare ourselves free and independent of any ecclesiastical combination with the monster slavery.

2nd. That we recommend the holding of a Convention of all the M. Protestants as soon as practicable for the purpose of forming our present constitution and discipline more in accordance with the great principles of the gospel.

3rd. That we proceed to elect four persons, two ministers and two laymen as delegates to attend a Convention if one should be called for by other conferences.

4th That those Delegates be instructed that if a majority of the Northern Conferences are represented in said Convention, to alter the constitution so as to meet the views and wishes of Methodist Protestants North as far as possible. Provided, however, that said delegates be authorized if but a minority of the conferences are represented to alter the constitution and mark out such a course as they in their wisdom may deem best and present the same to their respective A. C's. for their reception or rejection.

5th. That we as a conference highly disapprove of the course of the Methodist Protestant in not publishing in full the doings of Northern A. C. and recommend the patronage of the Western Recorder, edited by the Rev. A. H. Bassett, so long as it is a free discussion paper.

The above report was adopted.

BR. BASSETT: We had a harmonious time during the session of our conference. I think upon the whole we are gaining ground in Michigan. We are determined as a church to oppose all evil. We expect this conference year will be one of general revivals. We have as yet but one meeting house. We number between 16 and 1700 members, 14 unstationed preachers, and 5 ministers.

Letters from the North.

From the Zanesville Courier.

NUMBER TWELVE.

COPPER HARBOR, Lake Superior,
September 22, 1846.

MY DEAR L:—The cold winds are careering over the lake—the sun is fast retiring to the Southern hemisphere—the wild geese, in long trains, resembling a dark streak painted on a pure sky, are winging their way to a more genial clime—the maple late so bright and green, is putting on the russet livery of autumn—and the northern sky is nightly lighted up with unwonted blazes of light.

All these signs betoken change, and remind me that I, too, like the bird, must wing my way to a warmer latitude.

I have just returned from a cruise of 250 miles up the lake. It is my last one for the season, and I am glad that I am now snugly moored in a harbor whilst the winds howl like demons without.

I have visited for the third time this season, the gap in the Porcupine Mountains, and a most wonderful gorge it is. Each visit, so far from detracting from my admiration, has increased it, and I have felt a sort of awe, whether standing upon some of those burnt and desolate crags, which rise up nearly perpendicularly 800 feet above the valley of the Carp, and where the eye has an almost unlimited range of vision; or creeping like a worm at their base, among the shattered fragments which have been hurled by the storm or the earthquake from the giddy heights above.

This gorge is only two miles and a half from the shore of the lake, and in that distance the mountain rises gradually to the height of nearly 1100 feet. You ascend almost unconsciously, until suddenly you find yourself on the brink of a yawning gulf. Eight hundred feet down, and almost at your feet, lies a little lake so sheltered and girt by an amphitheatre of hills that the winds rarely ruffle its surface. Gloomy evergreens skirt its shores, whose long and pendent branches are so truthfully mirrored on its surface, that the eye can hardly distinguish where the water ends and the shore begins. From this lake flows the Carp: you catch occasional glimpses of its waters as they glide through the thick foliage, on their way to the Great Resorvoir. Looking west, you see first a perpendicular wall 200 or 300 feet in height and extending for about seven miles; then a mass of detached rocks 200 feet more in height, and sloping at an angle of 30 or 40 degrees, without a tree, or a fern, or even a blade of grass, presenting a bleak and barren aspect; further down, the luxuriant maple, the dark and cone-like fir, and the drooping cedar are seen. Still westward, succeeds a plain nearly level twenty miles in width, which looks almost like a lake of green, and beyond all, blue and indistinct, the Black River hills rest like a cloud upon the horizon.

But let us creep carefully along the verge of this cliff until we come to some little gorge, and through it reach the valley below. Be sure that that crag is firm—may be it will topple and hurl you below. After jumping, like the chamois, from one rock to another, we arrive at the base of the precipice, and as we look up and see it beetling and frowning far above, we wonder how we ever accomplished the descent. But our toils are not over. We next commence the sledding process. Sit down on the loose stones, first getting in the line of a tree, so that you can bring up, if you acquire too great a velocity. Elevate your heels and off you go, occasionally checking your momentum by depressing them into the loose rubble. This is attended with considerable wear and tear of—pantaloons, which is rather a serious inconvenience, since they cannot, in this region, be readily replaced, or mended at the public expense. A still further descent, through a beautiful maple grove and you reach the lake. Cut a pole and throw your fly, and ten to one, before your voyageurs have struck a fire and boiled the kettle, you will have a fine mess of trout for dinner.

In descending the lake to this place, I took occasion to visit the principal mines along the coast. The most wonderful things I saw in the way of copper were at the Cliff and Copper Falls' mines. At the former, they have struck a brazen barrier which will for a while impede their progress, but it must ultimately yield to the ingenuity, or rather the cupidity of man. It is no less than a mass of native copper, nearly pure, apparently thirty seven feet in length and six feet in height as far as exposed, and eight inches in thickness and increasing to eighteen inches, as they have penetrated with the drift. How far this continues, or to what extent it widens, is yet to be determined.

At Copper Falls, they have excavated around the immense mass of pure maleable copper, which they struck last winter. Its dimensions are 20 feet 4 in. long, 5 feet deep, and about 8 inches thick. They have commenced sawing it into blocks of about a ton in weight, and in this shape it will be manageable.

Explorers from the North shore are flocking over, and they all concur in representing the veins there as highly promising. Although the permits are granted only to subjects of the British Crown, yet Yankee enterprise explores and opens the veins. They differ from the veins on this shore, and conform more to those worked in other countries. They contain, for the most part, the sulphurets of copper, whilst here the native predominates.—The developements during the past season prove this to be a rich mineral region, and if men who embark in this business will remain content for a few years without dividends, and refrain from speculating in stocks, they will eventually be amply repaid for the time employed and capital invested.

This is the last letter I shall write you from this region for the present. In leaving Lake Superior, I feel as though I was parting from an old and valued friend.—On the whole, he has treated me kindly, though once or twice, like a mettlesome steed, has endeavored to cast me from him. I have coasted many thousands of miles over its surface—I have bathed myself when weary, in its pure flood and felt refreshed and invigorated—I have clambered up many a peak that rises like a tower, grim and desolate, overlooking the boundless expanse of waters—I have breathed the "pure and difficult" air that circulates through the mountains which girt its coast—I have listened to the music of its surf, when far inland, and gazed with admiration at the headlong plunges of the streams on their way to meet their Great Father. The whole region is invested with a charm. The mysterious sounds that occasionally issue from the mountains, the gloomy grandeur of the scenery, the legends, too, associated with much of that scenery, of many a bloody fray—long before the foot of the white man pressed these shores, the islands where dwelt the Indian's Manitous, and which even now he hardly dare approach; all these awaken a mysterious interest even in the most utilitarian heart, and strike a chord which readily vibrates to the touch. There is a pleasure in this blind idolatry of Nature which few men would obliterate if they could.

Farewell, old Father of Lakes! For six long months, thou wilt be bound in the icy fetters of winter, but when the genial spring unlooses them I will again greet thee as a friend. F.

COMMUNICATIONS.

Written for the Western Recorder.

"INFORMATION WANTED."

MR. EDITOR:—Though we cabbaged the above caption, it, nevertheless, suits our purpose well, for we wish to enquire first of Br. Gay, Andrew, Carey Jr. or of any one of them, or of any other member of the M. P. Church, who is so determined on "decided action" by the Gen. or Annual Conferences on the subject of slavery, what decided action the bible warrants, with, or without the A. Conference holding allegiance to the Gen. Con. that has not been taken by the Ohio A. Conference, years ago? and also by the convention which formed the constitution of the M. P. Church?

If brethern will show this by pointing out the scriptures giving chapter & verse, so that we may examine them aside from the bustle of the world, it would relieve our minds from much of the difficulty, which to us, seems connected with this "decided action" system. If man should constitute himself a moral legislator, and legislate on the subject of moral good or evil, would he not be seating himself in the temple of God, shewing himself that he is God."

Secondly. Br. J. Paris, in the Recorder of August 20th 1046, in speaking of the abolitionists he says. "They have by their conduct towards the South, riveted closer the bonds of tens of thousands of the blacks." And "by their reckless and unwise course, blocked up the southern ministers way in a considerable degree, so that he now cannot have the access to preach to the colored people he once had." "These things the abolitionists have done." Now here the Br. admits a great evil to have grown out of the American Slavery system, by means of abolitionists, and what we wish to know, is, whether the existence of the evil complained of, was entirely dependant on the existence of abolitionists? or whether the system which creates slavery, empowers the master to consumate the same evil independant of abolitionists, and in the absence of their inflamatory articles? And if the master has not transcended the powers of the system independant of abolitionists, in the infliction of this evil upon the slave, we wish to know, if these "abolition ranters," are alone guilty in the premises?

And third: Br. James W. Williamson in the Recorder of Sept. 3d. 1846, says, "some combine slavery in the church and that of the world as being alike." "But I consider that there is a mighty difference between them." "Why should so much fuss and jargon be made about the slave being deprived of the rights of other men." "I see no need of it for my life." "When the relation is so easily seen, as the servant to his master, and the master to his heavenly Master, and to try to destroy this relation and teach otherwise, would be more than Christ assumed to do." Now we are as much induced to make interrogations upon this extract, from its novelty, as from its erroneousness. First, it supposes what evil there may be in slaveholding, or in slavery, to consist in the worldly man engaging in it, and that the slaves rights belong to other men, (masters we suppose.) Now we suppose, that even such an abolitionist as Garrison, would not contend, that the slave should enjoy other men's rights, but his own. It seems that slavery is too holy an institution for worldly men to touch: more holy than the shew-bread, that David and the men that were with him ate, in the days of Ahimelech, for they escaped condemnation. But these conclusions seem to have been founded upon the relation supposed to exist between master and servant and master and Christ, which gives Christ no claim on the servant, only through the master; and so long as the master remains out of the church, the slave cannot be saved, for he has no way of salvation, only through the master.

Hence it appears, that the slave is emphatically a reprobate, so far as salvation by Christ is concerned, until the master joins church: and if the master determines to go to hell his slaves must go there also, and be damned through him. Now we know not who will stand as daysmen for the free blacks of the north, or what account will be taken of them; they having no master through whom they may be either saved or damned: unless we adopt Dr. Bascom's no liberty system, as given by Br. W., and says there is no such a being as a free negro, and by some kind of metaphysical implication, constitute those "abolition ranters," their masters, through whom they may account; seeing they are implicated in the evil of slavery.* Now we would just ask Br. W., to show us how to reconcile the doctrine embraced in the extract, with the gospel. Christ in speaking of the relation the master sustains to him as servant says, "If the son shall make you free, ye shall be free indeed." (queer slavery this) And St. Paul says to the servant. "If thou art called being bound, mind it not, for then, thou art the Lord's free man." What difference then, does the gospel make between servant and master, if it accounts both the Lord's freemen; "a cheat and a lie, is it! "However, we think it not to be regretted, that some of our Southern Br'n have concluded no longer to dodge the question. Come Br'n. "let us reason together," that we may understand each other—subscriber for the Recorder, and become contributors to its columns—it is a good paper, and better than all is, it tolerates free discussion, the life of gospel liberty.

*But if the idea of a purchase could be made out, on the principles of the Antimonian atonement we think the idea of Christians buying and selling human beings with the intention to enslave them, in order to increase their worldly wealth, cannot, without proving the slave reprobate as supposed; and then prove the joy of heaven is increased by the damnation of reprobates.

RIGHTS AND PRIVILEGES.

Mr. Editor: The main ostensible object of the convention of the M. P. Churches in 1830, was, to secure "to the ministers and members of the church, their rights and privileges." Then, what were those "rights and priviliges," of which, while members of the M. E. Church, they had been deprived, and which this body now "in general convention assembled," determined to secure to "the ministers and members of the M. P. Church? If we determine to obtain correct information upon this subject, there can be no way we would be so likely to acquire it, as from the declaration of the members of the convention themselves. If we examine their Historical Preface, we shall find in "1824, Numerous petitions were presented to that body" (the M. E. Gen, Con.) "praying for a representation of ministers and laymen in the rule making department." "The Baltimore Union Society recommended state conventions to be held in the several states, for the exclusive purpose of making inquiry into the propriety of preparing one united petition to the approaching general conference of 1828, praying for REPRESENTATION; and to elect delegates to meet in a general convention." "This convention prepared a memorial to the "(M. E.)" general conference of May 1828; praying that the government of the church might be made representative, and more in accordance with the mutual rights of the ministers and people." The inquiry may arise; was it the itinerant or the local ministers who complained, and for whom the convention felt so deep an interest? I again quote from the same, and say, I believe, that the convention can more clearly answer the interrogative than any others; It says, "At the close of the year 1784, the Methodist societies, in these United States, were organized by a conference of preachers exclusively, into what is called the Methodist Episcopal Church, and made independent of Mr. Wesley. The government was so framed by the conference, as to secure to the itinerant ministers, the unlimited exercise of the legislative, executive, and judicial powers of the church, to the entire exclusion of all other classes of ministers, and all the people." Then I take it for granted, that it was not to secure rights and privileges" to the itinerant ministers, who already had "the unlimited exercise of the legislative, executive, and judicial powers of the church, but to secure "the rights and privileges" of the local ministers, who were deprived of legislative authority, and even the right of representation in the Gen. Conference which the convention decided to secure. Our Convention has really and truly secured the rights and privileges of the laity; but the important inquiry again presents itself, have "the rights and privileges" of the unstationed ministers been secured? That the unstationed ministers enjoy numerous "rights and privileges," which the local ministers of the M. E. Church, can never hope to enjoy, there are none, who understand the discipline of the M. E. Church, and the Constitution and discipline of the M. P. Church, will attempt to deny. And there can be no doubt in the minds of those who have anything like a correct understanding of the noble motives which actuated the framers of our Constitution, but that it was their design, that the important "right" of a fair and clear representation in the rule making department of the M. P. Church, should be secured to this heretofore troden down portion of ministers of the Lord Jesus—now the unstationed ministers of this church; though this right has been wrested from them, not by constitutional provision, or by legislative enactment, but from a misapprehension of the correct mode of procedure in the formation of our electoral colleges, is to my mind most clear. But, if what I have already presented in support of the position, by me, taken, that it is impossible, while the itinerant ministers in the electoral colleges remain united, that so great a minority of unstationed ministers, as one from each circuit and station, as prescribed by the law in the case, should be able, either to elect or to prevent the election of any candidate for representative to the Gen. Conference; and of course, that the votes of the unstationed ministers avail no more than if they cast no votes at all, or were at home, at the time of the election; and that since their votes have no influence whatever upon the election of representatives, they are not, nor cannot, while the present usage is continued, be represented in the law making department of the M. P. Church. I say, if what I have already presented be deemed insufficient, I conclude it will answer no valuable purpose for me, at present, to attempt anything further.

That we, the unstationed ministers, have been, to no small extent, censurable for quietly looking upon this usage, and manifesting no disposition to claim our constitutional "RIGHTS," I feel no disposition to conceal; but when we have discovered our error, and it is shown that the original design of the Constitution is not sustained by this USAGE, are our itinerant brethren, with the lay delegates, justifiable from our past supineness, now to forcibly prevent us from enjoying our "RIGHTS?" It seems to me they are not. I have no doubt, but all who, are really, as well as professionally, Methodist Protestants, are disposed to let every member, and every minister within the pale of the M. P. Church, enjoy all the "rights and privileges" which are secured to them by the Constitution of the church. If there are any who can object, after comprehending the effect which our present usage has upon the unstationed ministers. I conclude, they must, in some way, be very nearly allied to those who once, after the memorial, already referred to, was presented to the Gen. Con. of the M. E. C," replied, in a circular, by claiming for the itinerant ministers of their church, or exclusive divine right to the same unlimited and unamenable power which they had exercised over the whole church, from the establishment of their government in 1784." But what is to be done, The Gen. Con. is now past, and they would afford no relief? I answer. It is my opinion now, that it is entirely unnecessary to have any action; either of an annual or general conference upon the subject. It is only a mistake, in the formation of the electoral colleges; there is no law making it, in the least, obligatory for the unstationed and itinerant ministers to vote together as one portion of these colleges; and there is no law prohibiting their voting separate—and the constitution favors strongly, the idea that unstationed ministers from each circuit and station, shall form a component part, or be added, not to the itinerants, but to the college. Then since there are no obstructions, unless despotism should be found to interpose, which I cannot believe, the members of the several colleges are the proper persons to amicably arrange the whole matter. The Antiquity of Protestantism.

Antiquity, in the abstract, is no criterion of truth. Superstition is nearly as old as religion, and originated in the darknesss and profanity of the antedeluvian world. Indian Brahminism was long antecedent to Italian popery. Christianity was preceded by Judaism and Paganism, and the Scriptures of truth by the Grecian and Roman Mythology.

The Gospel, however, must have been known and professed from its original promulgation, and the christian church existed from the commencement of the christian era, the friends of Protestantism, therefore, should be prepared to show that their religion existed prior to Romanism, or the Reformation. Protestantism comprises three things, the name, the faith, and the church.

The name, we admit, is a novelty. It originated in the days of Luther. In 1529 the Reformers of Germany, protested against the unjust decision of the Diet of Spires, and in consequence were called Protestants. An old institution therefore came to be distinguished by a new appellation. The name in itself is unimportant. The ancients called Hibernia, what the moderns call Ireland. France was for-merly named Gaul, and Columbia lately Terra Firma, but these divisions notwithstanding their new designations remain the same. A pope on his elevation to the Papal chair, will change his name but surely he retains his identity.

The antiquity of the Protestant Faith is easily shown. It is found in the Bible, in the Fathers in the Primitive creeds, and in the early councils. The Antenicean Fathers exhibit Protestantism in all its distinctions and prominent traits. A person being once asked where Protestantism was before the Reformation, replied by asking in turn, where the enquirers face was before it was washed. Dirt could constitute no part of the human countenance, so that the cleaning operation, would give the features their natural color, and beauty. GEORGE WILSON.

A few years since. as the Rev. Mr. Gallaudet was walking in the streets of Hartford, there came running to him a poor boy, of very ordinary first sight-appearance, but whose fine intelligent eye fixed the gentleman's attention, as the boy inquired, "Sir, can you tell me of a man who would like a boy to work for him. and learn to read?" 'Whose boy are you, and where do you live?" "I have no parents," was the reply, 'and have just run away from the work house because they will not teach me to read." The reverend gentleman made arrangements with the authorities of the town, and took the boy into his own family. There he learned to read. Nor was this all. He soon acquired the confidence of his new associates, by his faithfulness and honesty. He was allowed the use of his friend's library, and made rapid progress in the acquisition of knowledge. It became neccessary, after a while, that George should leave Mr. Gallaudet, and he became apprenticed to a cabinet maker in the neighborhood. There, the same integrity won for him the favor of his new associates. To gratify his inclination for study, his master had a little room finished for him in the upper part of the shop, where he devoted his leisure time to his favorite pursuits. Here he made large attainments in the mathematics, in the French language, and other branches.

After being in this situation a few years, as he sat at tea with the family, one evening, he all at once remarked, that he wanted to go to France. "Go to France!" said his master, surprised that the apparently contented and happy youth had thus suddenly become dissatisfied with his situation—"for what?" "Ask Mr. Gallaudet to tea to-morrow evening,' continued George, 'and I will explain. His reverend friend was invited accoreingly, and at tea time the apprentice presented himself with his manuscripts in English and French, and explained his singular intention to go to France, "In the time of Napoleon" said he, "a prize was offered by the French government, for the simplest rule for measuring plain surfaces of whatever outline. The prize has never been awarded, and that method I have discovered." He then demonstrated his problem, to the surprise and gratification of his friends, who immediately furnished him with means of defraying his expenses, and with letters of introduction to Hon. Lewis Cass, then our Minister at the Court of France. He was introduced to Louis Phillippe, and in the presence of king, nobles and plenipotentiaries, the American youth demonstrated his problem, and received the plaudits of the court. He received the prize which he had clearly won, besides valuable presents from the king. He then took letters of introduction, and proceeded to the Court of St. James, where he took up a similar prize offered by some royal socie'y, and returned to the United States. Here he was preparing to secure the benefit of his discovery, by patent, when he received a letter from the Emperor Nicholas himself, one of whose Ministers had witnessed his demonstrations at St. James, inviting him to make his residence at the Russian Court, and furnishing him with ample means for his outfit. He complied with the invitation, repaired to St. Petersburgh, and is now Professor of Mathematics in the Royal College, under the special protection of the Autocrat of all the Russias!

This narrative the writer has never seen published; but the gentleman who related to him the circumstances, attributed the singular success of young Wilson of his integrity and faithfulness.—N. E. Puritan.

Humanity and Divinity of Jesus Christ.

NO I.

Mr. Editor: There has been and there still is, a great diversity of opinions relative to the Divinity and Humanity of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ. Much, already, has been said and written upon these important subjects; and whether any remarks which I may be able to adduce, will be of any utility, or not, remains for others to decide, and not for me; for, I have long since learned, that which is entirely satisfactory to one, will be looked upon by others, if not with disgust, with entire indifference. Hoping, however, that if I should present any thing objectionable, it may provoke some abler hand to elucidate the subjects which I contemplate noticing, I will proceed to offer a few thoughts upon these, and others, which I conceive to be intimately connected. And first. All agree that our Saviour had a human body whether he had, or had not, a human soul, some, however, are of the opinion, that it was an angelic nature, which supplied the place of a soul in the Saviour, and that he did not possess what is usually termed, a human soul. But the scriptures in no place, to the best of my recollection, speak of any such quality, as angelic nature, being associated with the body of Jesus Christ. It is true, the bible speaks of the Saviour as the angel of the covenant &c. but, usually, when this kind of language is used, there are attributes ascribed to him, which no created intelligence ever possessed, or can possess. The apostle to the Heb. 11, 16 and 17v says, "For verily he took not on him the nature of angels; but he took on him the seed of Abraham." If angelic nature, and the nature of the seed of Abraham are not identical, then it must follow, that, as the apostle says, he took not on him the nature of angels, but he took on him, the nature of man. I believe the bible in no place, represents angels, either directly or indirectly, by the appelation of souls; but it repeatedly speaks of the soul of the Lord Jesus: and consequently, if it is "like unto" (that) "of his brethren," it must be human soul; unless we conclude the brethren of Jesus were not of the human family. The Lord by the prophet says, He shall see of the travail of his soul and be satisfied; by his knowledge shall my righteous servant justify many: for he shall bear their iniquities. Therefore will I divide him a portion with the great and he shall divide the spoil with the strong because he hath poured out his soul unto death: and he was numbered with the transgressors: and he bare the sin of many, and made intercession for the transgressors." Isaiah LIII. 11. 12. The Saviour says "My soul is exceeding sorrowful, even unto death." Mat. XXVI. 33. From these evidences, we justly conclude, I think, that Jesus Christ possessed a human soul: and that it was not an angel, or any angelic nature, which supplied the place of a soul, in the man Christ Jesus.

Further. All will admit that Jesus Christ, in numerous places in the bible is termed a "man." I cannot think that any will believe that a human body, apart from the soul, is really a "man;" but only the body of a "man;" hence, if the Lord Jesus only had the body of a "man," he could not with truth, be said to be a "man." Then I say, Every man possesses a soul and a body. But Jesus Christ is a man. Therefore Jesus Christ possesses a soul and a body. Once more, The passions of the human soul were possessed by the Lord Jesus. He "was heard in that he feared." Heb v. 7. The Jews said alluding to his affection for Lazarus. "Behold how he loved him." Jesus said to his disciples. "With desire I have desired to eat this passover with you before I suffer." From these evidences, I again conclude, that Jesus Christ was truly a man and possessed a soul in the common acceptation of the term, though without sin of every description.

There are some who believe, whether Jesus Christ is truly a man or not, as it respects that which is termed, his Divinity, by the orthodox, he is not equal with the Father. As a reason for this, they say, Jesus Christ calls himself, "The Son. The son of God," &c. That there are a variety of opinions relative to the Sonship of the Redeemer, cannot be denied. The Nicene creed represents this matter as follows, to wit; "We believe in one God, the Father Almighty, maker of all things visible and invisible. "And in one Lord Jesus Christ, the Son of God, the only begotten; begotten of the "Father, that is of the substance of the Father, God of God, Light of Light, true God "of true God; begotten, not made, consubstantial with the Father, by whom all things were made, things in heaven, and things on earth." Ch. Hist. by M. Rater, page 97. The foregoing creed, with many others, was, no doubt, intended to establish the Divinity of the Lord Jesus; but, they have more frequently puzzled, than instructed those, in search of correct information; and have given the advantage to the opponents of the doctrine of the Divinity of the Saviour. In referring to the phraseology of this and other creeds of a similar character, and the ideas necessarily involved, they will say, "The ideas of Father and Son, imply superiority and inferiority, that a Father exists prior to the Son, and if the Son were ever begotten, there must have been a period when, and if so, a period before. To say, begotten from all eternity, is to say it was never done, hence, it must have been subsequently, and since God has existed always, and the Son has begun to exist, therefore, the Son is not God. And since, if the Son was begotten, he is dependent on the Father for his existence; and dependence is inferiority; and the smallest amount of inferiority amounts to inferity when a creature is composed with the Deity; and consequently, the Son is inferior, dependent, and infinitely below the Deity; and hence he is not God. Again. If the appelation of "Son," be appropriate to the Divinity of the Lord Jesus Christ, in the abstract and this Divine nature was at any prior time begotten, as it is implied by the Nicene Creed, and others similar, and is "consubstantial" with the Father, then, it must be infered, that there has been a revolution in the Lord God; and he does not now exist as he once existed; consequently, he has changed; and if he has once changed, he may change again; which would, of necessity lead us to the conclusion, that he is changeable. These things being most preposterous (I have been indeed, to reject the doctrine of the "Eternal Sonship," of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ, and to look for other reasons why our Lord and Saviour is termed, the "Son of God." The Baptism of Infants and little Children.

Mr. Editor: Whether Infants and little Children should be baptized or not, is a question as yet, not entirely settled by the Christian world. A part taking the affirmative, and a part the negative of the question; while each offer their strongest arguments, and draw therefrom conclusions to favor their hypothesis. As being one that takes the affirmative side of the question, I beg leave to "show mine opinions, and shall therefore start, by taking the position that the "Jewish Society, before Christ; and the Christian Society, after Christ, are one and the same Church in different dispensations." and that when circumcision ceased in the Jewish Church as an initiatory rite into that Church, that baptism was instituted in its stead, and became the initiatory rite into the Christian Church, and consequently bears the same relation to the Christian Church, that circumcision did to the Jewish. As to the Jewish and Christian Societies, before and after Christ, being the one and the same Church under different dispensations we think will appear from three considerations. 1st. "That the Jews had the same religion. 2nd. That they had the same unspired names. And 3d. That they had the same covenant." Not stopping to argue these three points at present; we shall immediately call the attention of the reader to the point at issue, namely, that circumcision was the initiatory rite into the Jewish Church; and when it ceased, baptism came in its stead, as the initiatory rite into the Christian Church. In proof of this point we shall refer the reader to the 17th Chapter of Genesis, 11th and 12th verses. "And ye shall circumcise the flesh of your foreskin, and it shall be a token of the covenant betwixt me and you. And he that is eight days old shall be circumcised among you; every man child in your generations." &c. "And he (Abraham) received the sign of circumcision, a seal of the righteousness of the faith which he had, yet being uncircumcised, that he might be the Father of all them that believe, though they be not circumcised, that righteousness might be imputed to them also." Romans, 4 h, 11th In this verse circumcision is both called a sign and seal, as a token of the covenant made with Abraham. As a sign, it imports the scriptural circumcision of the heart. For the Apostle says, that, "circumcision is that of the heart, in the spirit and not in the letter: whose praise is not of men but of God." Rom. 2d, 29th. To set this subject properly before the reader, we will here take a short extract from Dr. Mason's works, found on pages 85th and 86th, by which it will be, as we conceive clearly seen, that baptism came in the room of, and occupies the place of, circumcision. He says, "As this conclusion may be thought too strong for the general argument proceeding it, let us submit it to a more direct proof, by inquiring into the scriptural account of both circumcision and baptism. And, first, let us see how this account stands with regard to them separately. It will be seen in the following contrast.

Circumcision.	Baptism.
I, Was an initiatory rite, by which the covenant were owned as of the covenant race, and of the people of God.	I, Is an initiatory rite, by which the baptized are admitted among the disciples of christ, and the members of the church of God.
II, Was a seal of the righteousness of faith. Rom. 4, 11, i. e. of the justification of a sinner through the righteousness of the surety embraced by faith.	II, The person is baptized in the name of Jesus Christ for the remission of sins (Acts 2d, 38th,) which is through faith in his blood, so that God is just and the justifier of him that believeth in Jesus.
III, Was an emblem and means of internal sanctity. The Lord thy God will circumcise thine heart, and the heart of thy seed, to love the Lord thy God with all thine heart, and with all thy soul, that thou mayest live. Deuteronomy 30th, 6th; see also chapter 10th, 16th.	III, Is a sign and means of our sanctification in virtue of our communion with Christ—buried with him by baptism into death, that like as Christ was raised up from the dead by the glory of the father, even so we also should walk in newness of life: Romans 6, 5; see also 1st Peter 3d, 21st.

The parallel is certainly striking. Circumcision and baptism do both put a mark upon their subjects, as belonging to that society which God hath set apart for himself. They both signify and seal that wonderous change in a sinner, whereby, being Justified by faith he passes from condemnation into acceptance with God; which doctrines of pardon and acceptance are exhibited in that society alone, which under the name of his Church, God hath consecrated to himself, and of which he hath appointed the circumcised and baptized to be esteemed members. Both represent and are means of obtaining that real purity which is effected by the spirit of Christ, and is the characteristic of all those members of his Church, who are justified by faith in his blood. Such a coincidence cannot be casual. It bespeaks design. And seeing that circumcision and baptism do thus substantially answer the same ends, and that the former has ceased, the only sound conclusion is, that it has been succeeded by the latter. Change of dispensation, was a sufficient reason, why the form of sealing the covenant dispensed should also be changed, and the points of difference between baptism and circumcision as covenant seals, are only such as were demanded by the nature of the change, the former being much better adapted to a more extensive and spiritual dispensation than the latter. And this is an additional consideration, to show that the one has been substituted in the room of the other." From hence it will appear, that if baptism in the Christian Church, was substituted in the room of circumcision in the Jewish Church, therefore the only legitimate conclusion is, that as Infants and little Children were required to be circumcised under that economy, as an initiatory rite into the Jewish Church; so, also, Infants and little Children, should now be baptized, and thereby be initiated into the Christian Church; seeing baptism came in the room of circumcision. We further argue the propriety of the baptism of Infants and little Children, from the relation that exists between Parents and Children. Parents are the Guardians, and overseers of their offspiring, and consequently are required to "bring them up in the nurture and admonition of the Lord" and we enquire, how can they effectually do this, unless they first dedicate them to God by baptism, as did the Jewish parents, theirs by circumcision? Such appears to have been the practice of the first Christians, so much so, that even history declares, "That there is not a single instance recorded in the new Testament in which the descendants of Christian Parents were baptized in adult years," and therefore must have been baptized in Infancy. Again we argue the propriety of the baptism of Infants and little Children, from the suitableness of the subject to receive this ordinance. To ascertain the correctness of this thought, it is only necessary to refer the reader to the language of Christ, who says, "Suffer little children to come unto me, and forbid them not: for of such is the kingdom of God. And he took them up in his arms, put his hands upon them and blessed them." Now whether those who differ from us make this kingdom the Church on earth, or the Church in heaven, it matters not; for if Infants are fit subjects for heaven, they would be fit subjects for membership in the Church on Earth.

To sum up what we have said, we find, that baptism, came in the room of circumcision, and that as Infants and little Children were circumcised, so now they should be baptized. We also find that they have claims upon baptism, from the relation they sustain to their Parents; and from their suitableness to receive this holy ordinance.

THE PULPIT.

There stands the messenger of truth
The legate of the skies,
His theme divine, his office sacred
And his credentials pure.

The pulpit has been perverted to all kinds of purposes, and has produced all kinds of effects. It has been, and is now, frequently usurped by civil authority to promote state designs; and preachers have taken advantage of their high province as ambassadors of Christ, to promote the measures and ends of a political party. It has been pressed into the service of metaphysical refiners and system makers; and has lent its great energies to the propagation of human science, instead of the simple truth as it is in Jesus, and the salvation of men. Thousands by profession preachers of the gospel, have made ethical philosophy the theme of their inculcations; and the prophets, evanvangelists and apostles, have been made to give place to heathen sages. The pulpit has served as the instrument of displaying the wisdom of words, the elegancies of style and similar products of human vanity. What amount of evil is involved in these perversions of the pulpit from its legitimate use, is only known to that God, who has been hereby insulted and defied. To employ the pulpit by the angry spirit of controversy, and excite ire by malignant sectarian zeal, is to desecrate the holy of holies, and to quench its sacred light.

"SUCCESSION."

Br. Bassett: I had not the gratification of hearing that complete demolition of the Popish notion of succession by our worthy Bro. G. Brown before the Muskingum Con., at their session in the city of Steubenville but as we were favored with it in No. 2, of the present vol. of the Recorder I am inclined to think that there can be no conflicting opinions among us—all are perfectly satisfied that this old Popish doctrine of succession is a chimera a nonentity—but while this is acknowledged there arose in my mind two questions of a very grave character which I should feel doubly gratified if the same writer would answer or throw some light upon by his luminous pen.

1st. If Bishop Asbury by his third ordination "passed over to the apostacy and became a successor of Judas." And some of the old ministers in our body received their ordination from his hands or from those who had been ordained by him, how far does this affect the validity of our own ordinations, or in other words as they were ordained by "an apostate and a successor of Judas" are they qualified to produce anything better.—Do men gather grapes from thistles?

2nd. If it be a fact that all Methodist ministers on this great continent are in an awkward predicament what means shall we take to obtain a pure ordination, entirely free from this apostacy?

By publishing the above so that it may catch the eye of our beloved President in his perambulations you will greatly oblige yours,

Danger of Premature Activity of the Intellect. Influence of Education on the Health of Children and Young People.—One of the most common and hurtful practices of the present day is that of cramming the youthful mind with book knowledge, to the too general exclusion of that far more valuable instruction to be derived from natures own sweet page, and to the consequent neglect, at the same time of proper attention to the state of the physical health. It may be laid down as an inflexible precept, that, while the body is growing, the mind should never be very much worked. This remark holds true more especially up to the 12th or 14th year of life; for, till that period, the size of the brain, and consequently the quantity of blood sent to it, are greater in proportion to the rest of the frame, then at any subsequent period. If then, from any cause, this organ is unduly or over-long excited, can we wonder that the seeds of cerebral mischief are often laid, or, if not laid, are at least promoted to more active development, by the pernicious system of modern education? How general is the remark that Hydrocephalus, for example, is most frequent in those children, who are most clever at their books, and are therefore the pets of their parents. The prematurely developed mind is too often the precursor—we might almost say, the sure harbinger of early death. Do we not know that, if the tree begins to produce abundance of fruit, before it has attained its mature development, it soon exhausts itself and becomes, at best, unprofitable, if it does not entirely waste and wither away? And so it is with the complex machinery of the human frame. If the mind be overworked by excessive culture, while nature is engaged in perfecting the body, the demand upon the energies of the system is too great; the one becomes exhausted, while the other is stinted of its fair proportions and dies.

Religious Intelligence.

Cincinnati, Oct. 28, 1846.

Dear Br. Bassett: It may not be altogether uninteresting, to your numerous readers, and especially to my fellow laborers in the vineyard of the Lord, to give a sketch of the rise and progress of Elm street mission, and the present state of religious enjoyment. In the forepart of July last, the brethren in the north part of the city, (where our "mission house of worship is erected) felt the inconvenience of being deprived of a place where they might statedly meet to hear the word of God dispensed and attend to those other means of grace which the house of God affords, determined on on the purchase of our present place of worship, (which was originally built for the society of the Wesleyans.) A few of the brethren, concluded, the object was a praiseworthy one, and immediately "set about the work," the property was bought for 1200 dollars, $600 to be paid in 90 days and $600 in twelve months; the first portion of time has expired and the payment made. Thus we, consider the society has secured "permanantly" a house of worship. After the above preliminares were entered into, we began to enquire, who would unite with the church at the mission, and giving the friends a general invitation, 47 persons organized themselves under the above caption, adopting the rules governing such organizations in the Discipline, appointed a Br. to represent them at the Springfield Con. was recognized by said Conference; and a superintendent appointed. The brethren feeling the Lord had thus far prospered them, humbled themselves before him, and as soon as they could, after the adjournment of Con. appointed a protracted meeting—all the members uniformly in attendance. "Coming up to the help of the Lord, to the help of the Lord against the mighty." Soon the meeting increased in numbers and interest—a solemn sense of the presence of God was manifestly among us. The Lords children became very much revived, convictions began to be manifest in the congregation. We gave an invitation for them to come forward to the altar of prayer. "They came;" the brethren joined in presenting their cases to the mercy seat. The "Lord" heard prayer and gave them to really that he had "power" upon earth to forgive sins. Many have been justified by the free grace of God. Some backsliders have been reclaimed, and God's children much comforted with his reiving grace. So you see dear Br. the Lord has sanctified our effort to glorify hi his name in our work of faith and labor of love. All our meetings continue with considerable interest and up to the present time 20 have united with us since our organization, making 67 worthy members addedto the above. We have an interesting and flourishing Sabbath School of 100 members and a Library of between 2 and 300 volumes.

You see from the above we are laboring hard for pemanent foothold, and God has given us some access and success among the people, for all of whichwe desire to humble ourselves before him and gratfully adore the blessed giver of all good, who has promised us good measure pressed down, shaken together and running over. Amen. The Lord sicceed our most enlarged expectation, and enabled us to report 100 effective members at our next Annual conference. Br. pray for us.

Genesee Conference.

Geneseville, N. Y. Oct, 19.h 1846.

Br. Bassett.—The business of the Conference was transacted in a most kind and friendly spirit in the main; all seemed to act in view of an approaching day of review before the impartial judge of all. The closing scene was one of peculiar interest, and well calculated to impress the mind with an exalted view of the powerfully cementing influence of Divine grace. During the progress of the business, in which important interests, and divers opinions, were brought in conflict, warmth and pointedness of remark was in some instances indulged in. But at the close, when all these has been amicably disposed of, and the Con. was about to seperate, the thought, of Br. parting with Brother, with any thing like agrieved feelings, none could cherish. And some time was spent in the most frank and unreserved, acknowledgments, and mutual assurances of forgiveness. When all joined in solemn prayer, commending each other to God and the power of his grace. And as the parting moment drew near, the members of the conference stepped into the aisles of the Church, united in singing an appropriate hymn, and by a reverse line of march each passed the other to exchange the parting hand.—The scene was affecting beyond discription.—All bathed in tears, and mutualy and most cordialy embracing each other—the sternness of the man, was forgotten and lost in the unaffected overflowing simplicity, of fraternal affection.—And the spectators, with tearful eyes gazed upon the scene involuntarily exclaiming: "See how these Christians love!"

WHAT IS PREACHING.

Almost every man thinks he knows what preaching is. He knows, at least to his own satisfaction, though it may be that very few others would be satisfied with his model. So it comes to pass unfortunately, that in any given parish, there are about as many standards of preaching as there are individual hearers. Each has his idea of the preacher's voice, manner, style of composition, and of all the qualities that should enter into his sermon, as long or short, doctrinal or practical, pungent or pathetic, and so on. Possibly some people forget that this variety of taste and opinion exists, and forgetting this they begin to impose their own notions upon the preacher and all the people. Thinking that such may be made more comfortable to themselves and others by a gentle hint, we quote for their benefit the following passage from Gilfillan, in answer to the question "What is preaching?" It is from the chapter on, 'Edward Irving and the preachers of the day." And after saying that the above is a question "to which there would probably be as many replies as to, What is truth?"—"hat almost every minster, and almost every man, has his own taste, and his own standard, and his own weight, and his own measure on this subject," he adds:—

One man thinks, that to preach means accurately to divide a given topic, logically to illustrate it, and to observe a perfect but cold propriety through the various steps and stages of the discourse. This is the mechanical plan of preaching.—Another imagines preaching to be the exposition of a particular passage of Scripture, bringing out from it all that is in it, and nothing more. This is the textual idea of preaching. Another cares not a straw for a sermon, if it do not contain a train of rigid argumentation, diversified by occasional bursts of party rage, and strong squirts of the odium theologicum. This is the polemical idea of preaching. Another likes no preaching but what contains a string of appeals and queries and adjurations, unconnected with principles, unsupported by reasonings and loose as a rope of sand. This is called though falsely, practical preaching. Another wants a sermon to be a series of electrical shocks—one burst from begining to end; the clouds returning after the rain, and no cotton so thick, and no conscience so hard as to exclude or resist the perpetual tumult. This is the clap-trap idea of preaching.—Another wants flowers, whether natural and fresh from the soil, or artificial and faded it does not matter; if he do but get flowers, and hear them rustling about his ears, in the breeze of brilliant declamation, he is quite satisfied, whether they keep him languishing awake, or lull him into dreamy repose. This is the florid, or Corinthian idea of preaching. Another is content with exclamations: he is not pleased unless every sentence begins with O; the interjection Ah, has to him a peculiarly pathetic sound; it seems to melt into his midriff like snow; and that preacher would be his Magnus Apollo, who should say, "O, we remark in the next place." This is the interjectional idea of preaching.—Another desiderates chiefly delivery; no minister is a favorite unless his voice be musical, and his attitude smack of the boards; unless he indulge in a profusion of studied declamation, pointing to the four winds when he names them, and laying the hand gently on the heart, when he wishes to indicate that interesting organ This is the material or Anthropomorphic idea of preaching. Another judges of a sermon by its length, and likes it, either because it is an hour, or because it is only the half of the time, this is the arithmetical idea of preaching. One man abuses a sermon, because he does not understand it; another admires it, because he does understand it, and a third admires it because he does not understand One man constantly asks, ere giving his verdict. What do the best judges say? Another, with some favorite model in his eye, says,—What is this to Hall, or Chalmers, or Thompson? One man likes a discourse to be as full of ideas as a pudding of plums. Another prefers a sermon in which the gold, or even the brass, is beat so thin, that it trembles before the zephyr. A third likes one great general idea to pervade a sermon, and to gather round it, by the force of attraction, a host of illustrations. One likes a discourse endlessly subdivided, all hedges and ditches. Another would have it limitless, free and unenclosed, as a moor or a mountain. One wishes it to be gemmed with scripture, and with nothing else. Another likes to see the Cairngorm pebbles of earthly poetry sparingly intermixed with the inestimable jewels of celestial song. One would hear a sermon in within very strait-laced limitations. Another would allow it a wide and varied range; to draw illustrations from the meanest and loftiest objects—from the flower and the star—from the ant and the leviathan—from the glow-worm under the hedge, and from that final conflagration which shall whelm the universe in billows of fire. And so on, ad infinitum.

This is no criterion, as all will admit. Perhaps it does not even include every variety of opinion that actually exists. But it is enough to show that neither Noah nor Isaiah, nor Paul nor Peter, no, nor angel from heaven, could so preach as to meet all these demands. We should say then, that he who requires this of a minister, and the minister who attempts to meet the requisition, are alike foolish. Would that this folly were not so common! There would be more permanency in the pastoral office.

But as to the question, What is preaching?—if we were to give an answer,—one that ought to put to shame all minor criticisms and unite all good people, it would be in the language applied to an excellent Scotch minister of whom it is said—"He pleased the pious, he enlightened the ignorant, he satisfied the inquiring, he overawed the sceptical,—

"And fools who came to laugh remained to pray."

EVANGELICAL ALLIANCE.

Dr. Steane then read the third topic as follows:

"Topic III.—That the members of the conference are deeply convinced of the desirableness of the forming a confederation on the basis of great evangelical principles held in common by them, which may afford opportunity to members of the Church of Christ of cultivating brotherly love, enjoying Christian intercourse, and promoting such other objects as they hereafter agree to prosecute together; and they hereby proceed to form such a confederation under the name of the "Evangilical Alliance."

The Honorable and Rev. Baptist Noel—Sir Culling, our blessed Lord has said to us, as his followers, "All ye are brethren;" and therefore, as the members of the same family, we are not permitted to form little associations of brothers, to the contempt of all the brethren of the same family in our neighborhood. Our blessed Lord has said, "By this shall all men know that ye are my disciples if ye have love one to another;" and therefore the love which is professed, or rather which is professed to be felt, but never manifested, is not the love which Christ required from his disciples, if it is not indeed indolent hypocrisy. It was the prayer of our blessed Master, that "we all should be one as he is one with the Father:"—in affection—one in the confession of each other, and one in constant cooperation, and thus that the world may believe that he has been sent from the Father; and therefore our union with him and with each other must be manifested to the world that it may believe them, and on this manifestation of the union of his followers depends the removal of that wide-spread and deeply-rooted skepticism which still opposes his Gospel in the world. We have been commanded by his authority to have no divisions among us, but to be perfectly joined together in the same mind and in the same judgment; and therefore we are all bound to receive the great main truths of the Gospel, and having received them are bound to make them the basis of our union together. The same apostle has commanded us to "receive one another," but "not to doubtful disputation"—not to the settlement of controversies; and therefore having been united on the basis of the great plain truths of the Gospel, we must not wait to settle our various disagreements of opinion, but on the authority of Christ, to receive one another,—a word which bids us have open, friendly relations to one another, and, as far as the opportunity is offered, be kind to one another in the various relations of society. We are thus commanded to unite with one another; while the same apostle adds, "Mark them which form divisions and schisms among you, and avoid them;" so that if there are any who bid us not unite, as he has commanded us to be united, and will make divisions among the true followers of Jesus Christ, whom Christ has bidden to be one, they are causing the division which he has forbidden, and are as schismatics in the midst of his Church, to be avoided by lovers of peace. Therefore, beloved friends, it is our duty to combine as this association bids us combine. If there be no other propositions to unite, we must take this or forfeit our fidelity. Unite we must. Until some better mode than the Evangelical Alliance is announced, our allegiance to Christ demands that we unite in this Evangelical Alliance. We must not ask how many unite. Let two unite; let ten unite; let one hundred unite; and not ask what the millions of the world will do—for Christ has bidden us unite, and duty ought not to wait on numbers. If we thus meet to unite, it has been said we shall fail. What if we do fail? For my part, I predict even from failure nothing but eventual good. We have set the great idea before the world, and if we are too weak, too sinful, too self-willed, to accomplish it, better men than we will arise and carry it out. Nothing that is essentially good in itself brought before the world can be ultimately lost. We are far too senstive and timid in this work. But why should we fail? It is not a cause which demands physical force, for the suffrages of millions. A few are enough, not only to set this great truth before the world, but to keep it before the world. Every great truth must battle with a thousand obstacles, and make its way through a thousands suspicions; but, thank God, a few can carry it through all its difficulties, if only these few are firm. Nothing, my brethren, but ourselves can ruin our cause. Every obstacle, suspicion, and objection that has been urged seems to me a "trifle light as air." But, be it stronger or weaker, it has no more power to arrest us, so long as we are true to our Master and each other, than a weed thrown against the wild Alpine cataract can stop it in its course. They ask us the result of failure, and we answer we will not fail. By the grace of God the victory shall be permannent. If we are true ourselves, patient of each other's infirmities, filled with kindness of heart, drawn from the grace of Christ then brethren we can show to the world how the members of Christ's Church, through all its ramifications, may, and therefore how they ought to unite in her. But we want grace. Let us bear this ever in mind, we want grace—much grace; for there are no obstacles great enough to retard or impede us from without. Thanks be to God, however, not only does grace produce union, but union tends to the promotion of grace. Let us honor him by allegiance to him, and he will honor us by the gifts of his Spirit. Let us unite to remove the evils which afflict the Church of Christ, and God will bless us in that union. Our object is of itself such as is calculated daily to improve the spirit of these who combine to forward it. To be one as Christ was one with his Father, is an object so dear to every Christian heart, that the longer we meditate upon it, the more earnestly we say some of our antagonists, "is there nothing else to aim at but union? No other great objects you can present to fire your understanding and imagination?" No other? Is not this which the world has never yet accomplished great enough for the accomplishment of one generation? Why, if it is so small, has it never yet been wrought? What is the object we have in view? To accomplish further our Redeemer's prayer—to destroy the scandals which divisions in the Church of Christ have formed—to remove the stumbling block from the Romanist—to silence the cavils of the infidel—to draw the attenuon of the world at large—to form such friendships as we could never otherwise have enjoyed—to see around us the brethren whom we never otherwise should have seen—to witness smiling faces, and feel that the hearts are warm that clothe them in those smiles—to mingle our common prayers to our Father in heaven—to bless his name that he has given us the honor and happiness of thus uniting—to pray to Him whose arm is omnipotent to conduct our feeble begining to ultimate success—to feel, while we discuss with each other who have never heard each other's voices before, candor, and integrity which each displays—to know that our union is real, and feel the presage that it is eternal. I say, these objects are such, so great and worthy of a Christian man's affection, that he who asks what other objects we have has never learned what that union is. But, if we are patient, as patient we shall be, and do not dread to be taunted with inertness and fear, as we do not dread it—and wait till that union be consolidated, and we know each other's tempers and opinions better—I tell you that union is the source of boundless action, if we are not premature. I tell you there are victories which the world has not yet witnessed, which will be the result, if God bless us, of our humble beginning. And therefore on the union itself, for union's sake, for our Masters sake, for own happiness' sake, let our hearts for some little time be set, till we feel the greatness of the object, and fear not the taunts that are uttered against us. To accomplish that object, let me beseech all those who form this great work, and if it be only at intervals of seven, or even fourteen years, that such meetings as this can be congregated, and you fear our feelings may evaporate in these long intervals, then carry out this object, which is the true reason of our meeting, into every neighborhood. While I see near me from every land those who have loved this cause, I beg them to unite with us in this great effort; and I say to my dear French brethren, "Go and bid the Christians in every locality in France combine thus from week to week;" and to our German brethren, "Fill Germany with little social circles of those who love this union, and will maintain it in their land; and to my dear brethren from America, whom we press to our hearts, and love to see among us—over the Churches across the Atlantic, they must severally, each in his own neighborhood, urge forward this good cause; and from all the British Isles, from Ireland, Scotland, and England, through all its districts, in every county, let this good spirit go forth; and if there are only a few in every locality determined thus to combine together, thus to unite in their affections, and tell the world that Christians ought to be united, the victory of this duty will be a permanent victory; and when they say, "What means this Evangelical Alliance?" let our practice tell them, in every

...lare that we are those who love the Lord Jesus Christ, who have embraced the good news of salvation by the blood of the Lamb for ourselves, and by every means which patience and gentleness, and candor can accomplish, or sanctified intelligence can devise, we beg our fellow-sinners to embrace that same Gospel, too. Let us do this, sir, and we must conquer.

J. S. Blackwood, Esq., L. L. D., of Dublin, of supporting the topic, said, that three principles were laid down in it. First, that they, as members of the Evangelical Alliance, were convinced of the desirableness of forming the confederation on the basis of evangelical principles: a confederation, the objects of which had been so ably stated by the previous speakers: secondly, that they agreed on the reasons for giving that confederation the name of the Evangelical Alliance: and thirdly, that in forming that confederation they were only carrying out the command—the plain, intelligible command—of their beloved and dying Redeemer. He need not expatiate on those topics; they had been, and he had no doubt would be, fully entered into by the gentlemen who had preceded, and who would follow him; but he wished to add one mite to the information with regard to the provisional movements which had taken place. In the providence of God he had been extensively engaged in organizing that confederation in Ireland, and neither in the north nor in the south, in the chief cities nor in the towns of that country, had the deputation met with other than expression in favor of the desirableness of the confederation, the objects of which were hailed with joy; and since he had been in London he had received numerous letters from Ireland, entreating him not to delay his return. Another effect of the movement was to make people think; many Roman Catholics, who had understood that the Protestant Church was composed of many different sects of heretics, were curious to know the real motive of their meetings. They put their inquiries to intelligent persons, who pointed out to them the great principles of evangelism—justification by faith only; sanctification by the Holy Ghost only; and redemption through Christ alone; they pointed out the real unity of the Christian Church, and he was happy to say that several conversations had resulted from it. He could not look back upon the proceedings of the Alliance since its assembling in London without feelings of awe; nor without thinking that the Spirit of God, as "upon the face of the waters," upon the multitude from all quarters. As in the creation of the material world, "God said let there be light, and there was light;" so at the present time he was saying, "Let there be light" in the Church of Christ, and there would be light, and they should not only be united in bones of feeling but of truth. The speaker in conclusion said he was of opinion, that the name of the society had been aptly chosen. He had no objections to the name of Protestant Alliance, but he considered that there was a much higher designation, that of Evangelical, as it denoted that they intended to carry the Evangelion to all the ends of the earth.

The Rev. Alexander Campbell, incumbent of Trinity Church, Aylesbury, then gave out a hymn, and the meeting joined in the praise of God.

The Rev. Matthew Richey,—Sir Culling Smith, and my Christian friends—The human heart is susceptible of emotions which no powers or combinations of language are adequate at all to express, and if such feelings ever beat in the human bosom, of this assembly. We are told by writers upon taste, that the pleasures of the imagination are traceable to three sources—novelty, beauty, grandeur. These elements of enjoyment, under the very highest forms of their manifestation, divinely coalesce in the pleasure which we thus here feel. How novel the scene by which I am encompassed! It is long since the command of Christ to his disciples, the new command—the Prince of Peace—"Love one another" was issued; but where is the record of its fulfillment on a scale so magnificent as Exeter Hall this moment presents? Is there not here the moral and beautiful, as well as the novel? "How good a thing it is for brethren to dwell together in unity!" We love the aspect of a family which presents indications that all the commingling characters of parent and child, brother and sister, bind heart and heart together. Here are the representatives of that family of God in heaven and on earth, and do not our hearts pulsate with the same emotion, breathe the very same aspirations, and concentrate our prayers and our hopes toward the same consummation? I see in this assembly such an exhibition, too, of moral grandeur, as reaches the very climax of imagination itself, as to what can constitute the pleasures of the heart as well as of the imagination. Love is the principle by which we are pervaded and knit together—love, not such as that which was expressed by the terms so translated in the Latin and in the Greek languages—such love as philosophy never experienced—as human seminaries, unaided by revelations, never taught;—love, such as the reflection of the glory of God, manifested in the face of Jesus Christ, taking and conforming every heart "unto the same image from glory to glory even as by the Spirit of the Lord." And when, in connection with the grandeur of this enterprise, I cast my anticipation forward to what may be the probable—and what I feel pretty confident will be the certain—result, upon the destinies of all the nations of the earth, of that movement which has now commenced, my soul is overpowered with the thought. I trust I shall not violate the directions which you gave us at the commencement, but you must permit me to glorify my God in the holy men and brethren by whom I am now surrounded; you must permit me to say to yourself, that dim is the lustre of a ducal coronet, and valueless the highest rewards of political ambition, compared with the honor God has conferred upon you by placing you in that chair. I know, sir, that while we all concur in these sentiments, you will deposit your honor at the foot of the cross of Christ, by the power of whose moral magnetism we are brought together from the ends of the earth.—There is in this mighty moral movement presented to my mind the most satisfactory demonstration that the work is of God; and although I might exhibit various illustrations of this, I shall confine myself to one—it is, that simultaneous propelling influence which, by a sublime manifestation of the Spirit of God, has brought so many isles and continents together on this occasion. Without any one of them, we should be comparatively defective. Why, there is here one who represents, not officially but really, the Cameronian Church—on whose lap I was nursed, and in the days of my youth it would have been an infinity to be published by the judge to have appeared among any other Christian denominations. But the loved and venerable Dr. Paul, of Carrickfergus—never so like "Paul the aged"—is now found among us; and I am proud to grasp the hand of the representative of the faith of my fathers. And we have around us our Baptist brethren. A circumstance occurred in connection with the formation of our alliance in Canada, tending to illustrate how much we could forbear on points on which we differ. The "Character of the Christian Church" was the topic assigned to an eminent Baptist brother. He said to me, "It is too bad to give me that subject; you know we hold rather strong opinions; but depend upon it, I'll not sacrifice principle—I'll steer as close to the wind as I can." "As close as you please," said I, "provided you don't submerge the vessel." And we have here our Congregational brethren; and O, with what heartfelt delectation must our venerable brother James look upon this love in practice, as explained in the 13th chapter of the 1st Epistle to the Corinthians! And how is this produced? By the attraction of the cross of our Redeemer—that moral lever which will ultimately draw all men unto the Savior. And, will you permit me to say, that there are individuals connected with other connections here—I allude especially to the Church of England—to see any one of whom would have been a rich reward for crossing the Atlantic wave. O! is it not delightful to see such unanimity, and such an aggregate exhibition of the Church of Christ! and here, too, is "a remnant according to the election of grace;" "he is not a Jew who is one inwardly, and circumcision is that of the heart, whose praise is not of men but of God." We thank God not for the Herschells that have trace the planets in their orbit, and have ascertained their relative distances; but we do devoutly thank God for the Herschells whose eyes have been attracted by the Star of Bethlehem, and then conducted to the Son of righteousness, have found healing in its wings. I collect all in the one sublime passage of the poet of Paridise, and though I am not yet, at least, any believer in the visible reign of Christ, yet I care not, it is not a matter with me how Christ shall answer the prayer, only let it be uttered, and let it be received and answered: "Come forth from the royal chamber, O thou Prince of all the kings of the earth. Put on the robes of thy imperial majesty, take up the sceptre which thine almighty Father hath bequeathed thee; for now the voice of thy beloved calleth thee, and all creatures sigh to be redeemed."

The next topic was read by the Rev. Dr. Steane:

Topic IV.—That, with the view of furnishing the most satisfactory explantion, and guarding against misconception, in regard to their design, and the means of its attainment, the Alliance deem it expedient explicitly to state as follows: That, the parties composing the Alliance shall be such persons only as hold and maintain what are usually understood to be evangelical views, in regard to the matters of doctrine under-stated, namely—1. The Divine inspiration, authority, and sufficiency of the holy Scriptures. 2. The right and duty of private judgment in the Godhead, and the Trinity of Persons therein. 4. The utter depravity of human nature in consequence of the fall. 5. The incarnation of the Son of God, his work of atonement for sinners of mankind, and his mediatorial intercession and reign. 6. The justification of the sinner by faith alone. 7. The work of the Holy Spirit in the conversion and sanctification of the sinner. 8. The immortality of the soul, the resurrection of the body, the judgment of the world by the Lord Jesus Christ, with the eternal blessedness of the righteous, and the eternal punishment of the wicked. 9. The Divine institution of the Christian ministry, and the obligation and perpetuity of the ordinances of baptism and the Lord's supper. It being, however, distinctly declared; First, that this brief summary is not to be regarded in any formal or ecclesiastical sense, as a creed or confession, nor the adaption of it as involving an assumption of the right authoritatively to define the limits of Christian brotherhood, but simply as an indication of the class of persons whom it is desirable to embrace within the Alliance. Secondly, that the selection of certain tenets with the omission others, is not to be held as implying that the former constitute the whole by of important truth, or that the latter are unimportant."

The Rev. Dr. Cox, of America: My honored brother and friend, Sir Culling my reverend father and brethren of the Evangelical Alliance, and ye Christians of the British Islands, multitudinous before me, and of the European Continent, with a mixture of my honored countrymen—I rise not so much to make a speech, as to give expression to feeling, and to enjoy the ovation of this sublime scene. Christian Union! We have distinguished well between unity and union. The former, God has made immutable, eternal, incapable of change, except as his progressive purposes come to their consumation. But union among Christians is our duty, and let no man despair when we are all endeavoring to perform it. Sir, we have recollected ourselves. We have but one Savior. "Look unto me and be ye saved all ends of the earth, for I am God and there is none else." We have but one heaven, where the general assembly and the Church of the first-born are clustering before us. We have but one glorious Gospel of the blessed God, the creed of this Alliance. We have but one kingdom of heaven, and mainly but one hope, and that is "full of glory," with the first fruits sent as harbingers and presagers of the harvest of eternal glory. Why should not kindred particles attract each other? We have been magnetized by the grace of Christ. Why should we not show affinities and congenialities on the earth? Sir, I feel richer than any technical theological education in this world could ever make me feel. I am astonished that I belong to a family so large, so excellent, so wide spread as the pearls of God scattered over the nation, but not one of them lost to his eye amidst the rubbish of the world or the darkness of Paganism, or Popery, or Infidelity. "He will have them all in the day when he maketh up his jewels.' I am not about to panegyaize our basis. I cannot do it. I could put the universe into a nutshell as soon as I could a just encomium on this Alliance into your fifteen minutes, Sir Culling. Or if that be done, I will devolve it on my honored namesake whose hand I grasp as a brother. (The Rev. Gent. here took the hand of Dr. Cox, of Hackney.) I would tell his name—but I do it, Sir, symbolically of the union of Christians—no matter on which side of the Atlantic we are born, we recognize each other—I you, as my brother, as sprinkled with the blood of Christ, and you me, as immersed in the sympathies of this occasion. Sir, God has not developed what he is going to do. When Martin Luther struck the first stroke—when his trumpet had blown its first blast—he no more dreamed of a great Reformation, than Columbus, when he was sinking and found floating on a spar in the Adriatic, to escape from the waves. That spar, he little thought, floated up the western hemisphere, or otherwise it would have been sunk. God above knows what he will do; and, sir, I intend to spend my short precious moments by venturing in the hearty confidence of this occasion three humble exhortations. They are, Preserve the Union! —Honor the Bible! Cherish Humility; and I believe there is nothing can hurt us. "Who is he that will harm you if you be followers of that which is right?" Cherish the Union. The things in which we agree are more, and better, and brighter, than we had ourselves conceived; and compared with them, the things in which we differ I cannot recollect. Blessed union!—that injures no man's conscience—that defies no man's creed—that restricts no man's liberty; but which intends the enfranchisement of every human being, in rights, civil, political, and religious. I am sorry I used the word "political," lest some person should think I am getting up a gunpowder plot against Ceasar of the Pope. But, sir, preserve the union. We hope you will have done more for America in this, than you will have done by many other expedients. Sir Culling, I look at this as a cordon sanitaire, that shall stretch around the globe—as a league of brotherhood that shall make the best peace society that ever was organized, and the most sensible and rational one in its basis. The time is coming when moral influence shall be brighter than the rusty iron of Nebuchadnezzar's metallic image. The time is coming when the public sentiment shall be like the atmosphere of this globe, only that heaven's lightning shall go clear around it, not to destroy, but to enlighten and to bless, and we ought to be subservient to them and to help them. I cannot allow this occasion to pass without saying, that in America, all the wise and all the good that I have ever known, have one sentiment with respect to the wise and the good in this country; and that is, "Heaven defend us from the parricide, the scourge, the horrible scandal of going to war, England with America." We expect to have the great ecumenical alliance, perhaps at its next session in America; and, my dear Sir Culling, if "Brother Jonathan" cannot tell what "B-A-R-T" means, when you come there, you will find a welcome in the heart of every one who knows you, and go back with love to America, such as you never thought of before, and never could think of either for your university, or for a place in parliament. Let us, then, pursue the union. I could dilate upon it, if I dared. (Cries of "Go on.")

The Chairman.—I must let out a secret. Dr. Cox, of England, has volunteered to give five minutes of his time to Dr. Cox, of America.

Dr. Cox.—Sir, I now pass to the next point, and will speak of honoring the Bible. Love is a most blessed thing, and heaven would not be blessed without it. Every one there has the consciousness; with the reality, of loving and being loved; and to be there without it would be like a hermit starving in the wilderness. But let us never forget that undisciplined affections are fit for savages, rather than men; and that, as Protestants and Christians, we have principles of unity that are eternal. The Bible is the creed of the Protestant, and objectively his religion, and the source of his faith and joy. Every truth in the Bible is as œcumenical as the light of the morning. There is not a sectarian truth in it, and to understand it, and evolve it, without the fact and taint of a partisan, is to say a thing, no matter by whom, which will bring the universe to the feet of God's messenger to learn. Let it be studied by us; let it be interpreted by us; let the word of Christ dwell in us richly, not meagerly. Sometimes a text in a sermon is like an oasis in the desert; it is like one grain of wheat found after blowing away a great deal of oratorical chaff; and I believe it is not the chaff but the wheat that nourishes. But to conclude. We must cherish humility; for if we get proud, we shall fail; we shall stray away from our God; we shall forget our strength. When the children of Israel began to burn incense to that precious relic of antiquity—as far from that iconoclaust Hezekiah as the Norman conquest is from you—he broke it all to pieces, and, the rabbinical tradition says, scattered it in the brook Kedron, but the monks of the cathedral of Milan gathered it together, and showed it for one hundred and fifty years! There is nothing that God will not break, if we make an idol of it and he loves us too well to let an idolexist that will eclipse his own glory. Our alliance is not an end; it is only a means; and it is by mistaking that word that men make an end of the sacrament and a spiritual piety in their definition of them. They are nothing but the means to an end. It may be said, "What is humility?" That question was asked by a British peer of the blessed old Wesley, in London, who said, "My lord humility, I think, consists in a man's thinking the truth about himself." What a glorious definition! I want nothing better in my theology; and I never want to think worse than the truth, and God himself does not require it. The truth will make us humble enough; and, if we only think the truth of ourselves, as men, as creatures, as dependent worshippers, and as beneficiaries in the great plan of redemption, I have reason to think Jesus Christ is saying to us this day, "Ye shall see greater things than these;" and I trust in him that it will be so. I cannot conclude without saying that the eyes of History are upon us, and of God, and we are at this moment a focus of interest that is immense and wonderful. Let us be humble—let us feel our dependence—let each man take this for his comfort, "I can do all things through Jesus Christ, who strengthen-eth me;" and I only wish we could take as our motto in fact the 7th verse of the 15th chapter of Romans, "Receive ye one another, as Christ also received us, to the glory of God."

The Rev. F. A. Cox, D. D., of Hackney, said—In seconding the topic, he must cast himself upon the meeting, as the time left him was scarcely sufficient to utter a single sentiment. He had unquestionably thought it due to so solemn an occasion to make some degree of preparation as to three or four remarks which he had wished to make, but the time having been taken up, and as he was often called upon to address metropolitan audience, he should be; permission, with all humility and with all sincerity, to sit down without a speech, for in support of that "Christ might be all in all."—(The Rev. gentleman then sat down; but, being called upon generally to proceed, he again rose and was greeted with loud applause.) He said—He was greatly indebted to the assembly, and almost overwhelmed by it, that he was permitted, under such circumstances, to add a few words to what they had already heard. There was such an instrument as the kaleidoscope, in which they saw a beautiful assemblage of colors and combinations, and were they not to move it they would think that those colors and combinations were permanent; but give it a shake, and other combinations were formed of great and equal beauty. He could not help thinking, while sitting there, that there was a similarity between that instrument and the successive speeches which had been made. In the address of the first speaker they had a beautiful scene, and a rich combination of colors; the second speaker gave a shake, and there was a new combination, and so with the succeeding speakers; thus showing that, as in the kaleidoscope, the same objects might be exhibited in an infinite variety of ways, so by the intellect of man, the same subject was capable of being brought into various beautiful combinations. It had been often asked what they had met for, and what they had done by all their preliminary meetings? What had they done? In his opinion they had effected a great thing; they had united together persons of various opinions, and he considered it a great thing to say, that they had met together—that had prayed together—that they had praised together—that they had loved together; that they had a most pleasant voyage upon the Pacific Ocean together; they had occasional breezes, but no storms, the surface had been a little ruffled by zephyrs rather than breezes; but all those varieties and differences of opinion which prevailed, rendered the voyage more pleasurable and more delightful; proving that there might be a diversity of opinion, with unity of sentiments and unity of affection. If by this movement they gained union in the slightest degree, he should hail it the greatest achievement of the polemical sword, for in gaining that they gained an element of heaven. In conclusion he would give an illustration drawn from a science which was deeply intersting to his own mind to study—that of astronomy. There was in that science an interesting, but deep and difficult problem, which was well understood by scientific men, denominated the precession of the equinoxes. The effect of the precession of the equinoxes was the moving back of the intersecting and crossing points on the globe, which had the effect of moving forward the stars of the hemisphere. He trusted that all the cross and contentious points were moving back on the sacred equinox, and that the stars of love, and peace, and union, were moving forward, and that they were all advancing more and more, not beneath the brightness of the "cross of summer," that beautiful ornament of the heavens, but more and more beneath the beams of the sacred cross—the cross of redemption—the cross of Calvary, and the benignant influence of the Sun of Righteousness. The effect of this movement would be to make them more emphatically united and more prepare without the compromise of one principle in any mind; and would enable them to minister together in holy union, and confederate together in the delightful bond of a pleasing fraternity.

The Rev Norma Macleod, of Dalkeith, said he should not attempt to make a speech, but would confine himself to expressing earnest sentiments of feeling; and he was sure that they would bear with him. The only claim he had of appearing on that platform was, that he represented the Church of Scotland. He believed he expressed the feeling of all his brethren when he said, that never did they spend happier or holier hours than they had spent in the Evangelical Alliance. In this perplexing and difficult world, if any thing was right, he felt that it was right to pray with his brethren, and in joining them in that alliance, he was sure he could not be wrong. Allusion had been made to the solemn day when they should all meet together; and he thought that none, on looking back at the short years of his life, would regret those hallowed hours which had been spent in the Evangelical Alliance in singing praises to God. In reference to the necessity for the formation of the Alliance, he would say that the world required it. If the world was to converted, it was not by dead letters, but by living men. God's healing truths were not to be imparted alone by dead letters, but by the living epistle of example. The Church of Christ required it. The good it had done to their own hearts could never be undone. If any one in the discharge of his duties felt bound to lift up his voice against any other denomination, it would be done in a way in which it had never been done before. If he should ever have to speak against Methodism—which he trusted he should never have to do—he should be thinking of his reverend father, Dr. Bunting, and he should not be able to utter any thing harsh. If against the Congregationalists, he should remember his friend, the Rev. Mr. James, and he should not be able to use a rough word. Hitherto they had been dealing with speeches and resolutions, and such abstract matters; henceforward they should deal with the men themselves. And if when they met together, any one in the discharge of his duty—for the Alliance pledged them not to silence—should launch a shaft at his Church, it would be sent firmly but tenderly when the archer knew that it had to pass through the heart of one whom he loved and who loved him. In conclusion, he trusted that no person would imagine that there were not as good, as wise, and as intelligent persons out of the Alliance as in it; and that the fact of persons not joining the Alliance ought to be laid to an error of judgment, and not of the heart.

The meeting concluded by a doxology, and the benediction from Dr. Raffles.

Names of Countries.—The following countries were named by the Phœnicians, the greatest commercial people in the ancient world. These names in the Phœnician language, signify something characteristic of the places which they designate.

Europe signifies a country of white complexion—so named because the inhabitants there were of a lighter complexion than those of either Asia or Africa.

Asia signifies between, or in the middle—from the fact that geographers placed it between Europe and Africa.

Africa signifies the land of corn or ears. It was celebrated for its abundance of corn and all sorts of grain.

Siberia signifies thirsty or dry—very characteristic of the country.

Spain, a country of rabbits or conies. This country was once so infested with these animals they they sued Augustus for an army to destroy them.

Italy, a country of pitch—from its yielding great quantities of black pitch.

Calabria also—for the same reason.

Gaul, modern France, signifies yellow haired, as yellow hair characterized its inhabitants.

The English of Caledonia is high hill. This was a rugged mountainous province in Scotland.

Hibernia is utmost, or last habitation; for beyond this, westward, the Phœnicians never extended their voyages.

Britain, the country of tin—as there were great quantaties of lead and tin found on the adjacent islands. The Greeks called it Albion, which signifies in the Phœnician tongue, either white or high mountains, from the whiteness of its shores, or the high rock on the western coast.

Corsica signifies a woody place.

Sardinia signifies the footsteps of a man which it resembles.

Rhodes; serpents or dragons, which it produced in abundance.

Sicily, the country of grapes.

Scylla, the whirlpool of destruction.

Charybdis, the holes of destruction.

Etna signifies a furnace, or dark, or smoky.

Syracuse signifies bad savor, called so from the unwholesome marsh upon which it stood.

The above were gathered from a very ancient history of Britain.

Influence of Railrods on the Weather.—The German Schnellpost says, that the well known natural philosopher, Dr. August has made a communication in a Berlin paper, in which he states, that when an extended portion of the earth's surface is brought, by a net of railroad tracks into connection of electrical conductors, the accumulation of electricity in the lower part of the atmosphere is prevented; as the iron tracks effect a constant electrical equilibrium between remote regions. By this means a violent storm is rendered unlikely, and if one should arise, it would undergo a considerable diminution. The doctor states it as a fact, that since Berlin has become the focus of several railroads, there have been no violent storms; and all that have risen, have had rapid and gentle termination.

Whittier, the Quaker Poet, of Amesbury, Mass., narrowly escaped with his life, a few days ago. Some boys carelessly discharged a gun, the charge of which passed through his cheek and came out under the ear.

WESTERN RECORDER.

PUTNAM, OHIO.

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 7, 1846.

Reformation of the Press.—Reform is said to be the order of the day. But where is it more greatly needed them in the popular press? We rejoice that several highly respectable journals have in a very spirited manner, raised their voice in behalf of this reform. We take pleasure in stating that the Philadelphia Saturday Evening Post, though a secular journal, yet a very interesing and valuable family news paper, has taken the lead in this movement. Some weeks ago its editor came out in a very decided and strong appeal to the house of "Harper and Brothers" for publishing another of the licencious works of Eugene Sue. We are happy to say that the voice of the "Post" has been promptly seconded by numerous other journals. First, the "Episcopal Recorder"—then the "Methodist Protestant,"—next the "North American," and numerous political and temperance journals have said in terms not to be mistaken, that the press shall be aroused, and that through the press, community shall be aroused, to the great evil, and ruinous consequences of patronizing licencious publications, vulgarly called cheap literature. Lately we see that the Columbian Fountain, published at Washington City, has made a dignified "protest" against the "flood of stuff" dignified with the name of literature, "in the shape of French, English, or American novels, whether they appear in volumes or on the four pages of folio."

Last, but not least, "Scott's Weekly Paper" an excellent sheet (so far as we have inspected it) commenced some three months ago in Philadelphia, subscribes to the call for "reform" in the following decided terms.

"If our philosophy were not of the laughing species, we could weep over the utter depravity and degradation of the newspaper press. It has been undergoing for years a constant process of deterioration, until the sum total of its usefulness is little more than the registering of stray poodles, missing pocket handkerchiefs, wet-nurses wanted, tenements to let, and the latest improvements in the manufacture of quack medicines. The promulgation of important truths, the correction of popular errors, or exposure of public abuses, are things which the newspaper press cannot or does not attempt.

How very few newspaper publishers within the compass of our acquaintance, seem to have any desire or aspiration beyond the scraping together of a little filthy lucre! We propose to intruct them in a better course, not so much by moral exhortations or verbal reproof, as by the powerful effect of one good example.

We are grateful, and we are glad, that so respectable and talented a portion of the press is waking up to this subject. Our humble voice too shall be heard, calling upon all within the daily increasing circle of our circulation, to discard the vile trash, with the outward semblance of literature, and the charm of novelty, and the temptation of cheapness, whilst within filled with words and ideas calculated first to fascinate, then to pollute, and finally to ruin the minds of our youth. Discard it, we say, thrust it at once from your parlors, your sitting rooms, your counting rooms. Let parental influence be exerted to exclude it from families. And let the pulpit raise its solemn voice against pernicious publications.

We cannot refrain from giving our readers an extract or two from the Saturday Evening Post, touching this subject.

"The press of this country can, if they choose lessen by half, the circulation of immoral works in one year. They can, if they will, call forth a public sentiment upon this subject, so that it will be as much as the reputation of any publisher, or book seller is worth, to publish, or sell a work which is not strictly moral. We say the press can do this, and we say further, they are bound to do it. For our part we have taken our position on this subject, and all men, friends and enemies, know where we stand. So far as we are concerned, the authors and publishers of such books hereafter shall not go unpunished. Friends of morality and virtue will you sustain us? you must be convinced that we are opposing no trifling evil—give us then your assistance, your moral power. Join with us in the creation of a public sentiment, that shall sweep like a whirlwind, this worse than chaff, from our fair and beautiful homes."

In reference to the publication of the new work of Eugene Sue, by the Harpers, the Post says:

But Harper & Brothers, know that they are doing wrong in publishing such a book. Why then continue the numbers? Why not come out like men, and members of a Christian church, and say, "Fellow countrymen, lovers of a pure social life, we have erred in this thing. We were led into it thoughtlessly, little by little, and now we shudder when we look around us and behold where we stand. From this time, henceforth, the name of Harper & Brothers on a book, shall be a guarantee that nothing can be found within its covers, calculated to call a blush to the purest maiden cheek."

If Harper and Brothers have the manliness and courage to pursue such a course—if, horror stricken at the idea of being in the least degree instrumental to such tragedies as that recently enacted at Richmond, they have the nobility of soul to come out openly and avow their intention to put a stop at once, so far as they are concerned, to the circulation of such corrupting books—they will acquire the respect and admiration of the great body of their countrymen. But if they have not, if, swayed by a contempt of morality, or influenced by false pride; they still persist in the publication of such abominable works, they must expect to be visited by the heaviest condemnation of all right-thinking men. Of one thing we can assure them—while we can wield a pen, this matter shall not blow over. We shall hold up, hereafter, every respectable publisher, whose name we find attached to an immoral book, to the indignation and scorn of the country. We will keep no terms with such. And we now call upon Harper & Brothers in the name of that religion "which is first pure"—and which they profess to reverence, to discontinue the publication of any further numbers of that atrocious work, with which they are now engaged in deluging the country.

Since writing the above we are gratified to meet with the following in Bicknell's Reporter, in reference to 'French Authors and Journals.'

It is a subject of regret, however, that writers, so popular and so powerful, should so frequently indulge in a licentious spirit, and thus neutralize much of the good that they would otherwise accomplish. Popular authors exercise a vast influence over the public taste and the general virtue and when, forgetful of their duty, and false to civilization and Christianity, they appeal to the baser passions, they indeed pervert and abuse the high powers, and become ministers to iniquity rather than champions of the right.

Boston Olive Branch.—"Non Fini" Again.—Justice to the West.—Our readers may recollect that some time last summer we paid some attention to a correspondent of the Boston Olive Branch, signing himself 'Non Fini.' We attempted to correct some of his statements, in which we considered that he did great injustice to the West and to the Queen city in particular. We have now before us in the 'Olive Branch' the reply of 'Non Fini' to our remarks. He answers us in good humoredly,—and so decidedly mends his manners in alluding to the affairs of our great and glorious West, that we unhesitatingly yield to his request to insert his article (though lengthy) in our paper. Furthermore, he talks so cleverly this time, that we acquit him of any intention in his former articles to do injustice to western folk and affairs. Meanwhile, should he fall into any inaccuracy in his present statements respecting the 'Queen City,' our Cincinnati Correspondent will be fully competant to offer any needed correction. Our readers shall now have the article of 'Non Fini,' without further 'note or comment.'

From the Boston Olive Branch.

Messrs. Editors: Your paper containing the article from the pen of the Ed. 'Western Recorder' has just come to hand, and we hasten to reply trusting that your example of liberality in giving place to his article, will be followed by his admitting our reply. And we further ask him to answer our enquiries in that spirt of candor which as a gentleman, we have a right to expect from him.

1st. Our letters, written as they were in great haste and off hand, contain the truth, in every essential particular; the facts were carefully digested and no person, we think, will say that we were unwarranted in our statements. On the subject complained of, we were careful, knowing that our remarks would undergo a scrutiny from clear heads and powerful pens.

2d. As to the general charge of want of attachment to the West, we reply, that through your paper, we spoke of Ohio in the most flattering terms; we spoke of her unsurpassed fertile soil, of her mines, of her salt, iron, gypsum limestone, and water power, that she had ability to feed the operatives of New England, and extensively manufacture herself—that a respectable portion of her population was from New England with many from Virginia, and remarked in the conclusion of a long letter on this subject, that to think of the thousands in Boston and New York city in comparative penury, when the glorious Buckeye State with extended arms and fertile lands invited them to her embrace with smiles and a promise of peace and plenty with moderate efforts, excited both our surprize and regret, and said that it would be a blessing to have thousands driven out here, (Ohio) even with a scourge of small cords.

Is this the language of an enemy? Did not this full and fair representation show friendship, labor and acquaintance with our subject? But we noticed kindly some of her faults, we knew that you wanted truth, not fancy sketches, such as your readers might rely upon, and we gave them to you and them. But our first great sin was telling some laughable truth of the Queen city—that is the rub! We now repeat, that out of the wealthy capitalists of that city, but three, and these not the most wealthy, did anything worthy the term of liberality; and these were Hon. J. Burnet, a Mr. Longworth, we think that is the name, we mean the man who kindly lent Powers the money, $90, to pay his board or leave the city! the other name we have forgotten. That as a city, they have never patronized an artist or sculptor, however loudly they claim every eminent artist they have lured to their city, and then compelled to try some other business, and thus to lay aside their easel and go to fidding as was the case with Brown, who received the cup of diamonds across the water. We read the rebuke in the Washington papers, in this last case, upon Cincinnati claiming to be the 'Florence of America—calling him a son of our city.' The other facts stated we heard spoken of by the artists of the city—also in their presence the subject was introduced by merchants, all men whose standing in society forbid the idea of misrepresentation. True, after reading the rebuke in the Washington city paper, we took pains to get the whole story which we recorded, and whether true or false it was common report in some of the best circles, and we never heard it called in question. The patronage which the artist there receives is from the less wealthy, this we had from three artists. That the middling classes are kind, hospitable and generous, we will admit, but this does not contradict our statement—for our charge was against the wealthy, aristocratic landholder.

'The Recorder says, 'Non Fini' acknowledges that Cincinnati has attained a growth without a parallel, and that 'its march is still onward,' yet he terms it 'a city that owes its growth to the systematic puffing of the Press,' and goes on to insinuate that about all the liberality which the wealthy of the place are to be credited with, is that they pay editors bountifully for puffing the 'Queen City,' thus gathering multitudes to the place, and enhancing the value of their property. Now we have been intimate with Cincinnati for 30 years, and we are quite incredulous about this story of puffing for hire.'

Our authority for this statement as to puffing &c. is, that examining the old files of three papers we found twenty-six puffs direct on the Queen city and the Florence of America, in one year, and knowing the tact and talent of the Editors of that city, we were then, and are now, unprepared to admit, that those gentleman ever generated such a quantity and such a quality of fulsome flattery as was then, and has since been poured forth in violation of good taste, without being paid for it, by those land holders who reaped the harvest. To those who read these papers constantly, it must have been received as we receive the certificates of cancer curers, and cow doctors, contributions to Therapeuticks—or lobelia emetics sweetened with Ipecac. If the editors are not paid, and well paid, it shows a meanness ten times as great as named by us.

In the Recorder's second paragraph he concedes the general correctness of our statements as to the meanness of the rich boasting and starving their men of taste, but joins issue in the case of Clevenger. We stated that he died on his return from Italy to his family, and the editor says he died with his family or wife, on his return from Italy. He probably is correct, but does not the editor know that it does not impair my statement in the least, and is not of any possible bearing one way or the other?—In relation to the raising of the $500, he says it was long since paid for the bust. He does not deny but artfully evades, carrying the imputation that we misrepresented, but look at it. The Recorder says 'and as to the impossibility of raising the $100 to pay the widow for the bust, we are positively assured that the $500 is long since actally paid.—Hon. J. Burnet, we are informed, remitted her the sum, so long ago as September last; and has her receipt for the same. A writer in the N. Y. Saturday Emporium, of June 27th, will confirm this statement. We would not claim that Cincinnati is distinguished for liberality, though we might inform 'Non Fini' of some very philanthropic deeds done there, but we think this writer has not shown sufficient cause to nominate her the 'Picayune city' instead of the Queen City.'

Now he does not deny but that it was impossible to raise the $150, which we stated. The facts were a subscription was started, and but $300 or $350 was raised; years elapsed and still the poor widow was not paid, although known to be very poor, until Judge Burnet probably put his hand in his own pocket and paid the residue. It was a matter of public talk in Cincinnati, as we stated, about the widow's being obliged to refund the money if the balance was not paid. We heard the conversation as stated in our letter, and it was recorded by us at the time. It was when looking at the bust in question, it was stated in the presence of Mr. Philips the artist, and some other gentleman on that occasion. We mean Mr G. W. Philips the celebrated artist from Washington City, who we believe now resides in Cincinnati. We were told by a number of distinguished men that he ranked very high at Washington City in his profession, as a gentleman and man of piety. And if the editor of the Recorder will show him our statement he will recollect the conversation and declare it to have been a common report at that time. We would call up the artist, Mr. Beard, but we believe he has left the city, he know and heard how sculptors and artists there fared; whether the rich or the more moderate patronized him—whether our statements are high colored in relation to Cincinnati.—We would appeal to all artists if we knew their names, as well as a dozen merchants. We dare even risk it on the testimony of G. W. Philips Esq. alone, and a Col. Brown was present on two occasions and heard the remarks, he also is said to be in Cincinnati. We heard these statements in several offices and Hotels, which we believed then; and do still believe them true.

Again, we spake of the want of Free Schools in Ohio. They have the free school system form, but every literary man will say that it is rendered inefficient and useless, which the law of last winter was designed to remedy; yet the law could not pass, except certain counties were exempt from its provision. And a small minority of counties were included in its provisions. If we are incorrect, Mr. Recorder, state the provision of that law, the number that rejected its provisions—that will tell the story,—we have not the documents to refer to.

Our statement as to the state of education, was borrowed from the census as reported in the letter of Miss Beecher of Cincinnati, ably reviewed and commended by the editor of the 'Ohio State Journal' and other papers. If the census is incorrect, settle that with the authorities.

The phrase gross ignorance of the people, after having commended a very large number for their intelligence, might, to an ignorant man, seem a contradiction, but the editor of the Recorder knows that there are very many foreigners, catholics who cannot read and would not be allowed to if they would, enough to justify our remark, taken in its connection—if C. is a sample, say from 24 to 26,000 of Dutchmen, Germans and Irish, and our native population more than enough to balance the learned Jesuits.

There was one fact we omitted to notice in its proper place, it was that our letter was written to you two weeks before the notice of the money's being paid to Mrs. Clevenger, appeared in the Cincinnati papers. Again, it does not appear but that Judge Barnet paid it out of his own pocket, and that was said to be the case soon after the notice appeared in the paper, thus confirming what we said. We ask also, if the full length portrait of the eminent Hammond which adorns the Library Association was not purchased by the subscription of less wealthy, private individuals? The term 'Picayune City' was given by a neighboring city; and did not originate with us.

As the editor of the Recorder was so kind as to say nothing of Boston not burning the Convent, &c. we will say nothing of oft repeated negro mobs in the Queen City—nor the attacks on the abolition press—we will not mention that the Mayor called upon the editor of the Herald in June last, and told him that he was apprehensive that his press would be torn down by a mob, if he continued his remarks on abolition and against the war. We will not describe the mob we saw in the 5th street market, the burning of Butler's wagon, the cheese monger, their going and breaking into the cellar where he kept his cheeses and strewing them and burning them in the street. Nor will we recall to mind the character of two out of three Representatives from the Queen City, sent to represent her ladyship at Columbus last winter, their language, their habits, both in the Legislative hall or out of the hall, and in the streets, nor the drunken attack of Flinn, in the streets on a brother Representative, and his consequent arraignment before the House therefor—nor his attack upon a brother partisan at the State caucus for the nomination of Governor, where up flew a foot and down fell a party embodiment, and such a disfiguration of faces ensued that their dogs scared know them—but enough, Christian Union. Presbyterians.—We learn by the Pittsb. C. Advocate, that a Convention of Reformed Churches was lately held at Pittsburgh. In this were represented, the General Synod of the Associate Reformed Church of the West, the General Synod of the Reformed Presbyterian Church, the Associate Synod and the Reformed Dissenting Presbytery. The Convention had in progress of preparation a plan of union between the bodies represented in it. This measure, it seems has been had under consideration for some years and it is somewhat probable that the object will be consummated. Some alteration of the West-minister confession of faith is contemplated. The following proposition respecting slavery, was adopted.

"On Slavery.—Slaveholding, which is the holding of unoffending human beings in involuntary bondage, and considering and treating them as property, subject to be bought and sold, is condemned by the law of God, and censurable by the united Church.

"In what cases a man may sustain to a slave, the relation of a master, in the eye of the civil law, without being involved in the sin of slaveholding, is hereafter to be declared by the united Church.

"Enos" will be welcome to our columns. But if it would suit him as well, we had rather give his initials.

Deaths of Ministers.—The Methodist Protestant has just announced the deaths of three ministers of the M. P. Church.

1. Rev. W. H. Bordley, an itinerant minister of the Maryland Conference, and who was a year ago stationed at East Baltimore. He had gone to Charleston, S. C. to serve as supply for the M. P. Congregation there, was much beloved by his people. But was suddenly taken from them by death, on the 9th Oct. 1846.

2. Rev. W Bellamy, a member of the North Carolina Conference, and lately a delegate to the General Conference. He will be remembered by many, as the most aged member of that body.

3. Rev. Arrington Gray, also an itinerant minister of the N. C. Conference. He expired on the 6th ult. Was Superintendant of Randolph Circuit, and esteemed as an able divine, and faithful Christian.

The Boston Olive Branch, brings intelligence of the death of Rev. Stephen Oakes, of Greenwich, Mass. a minister of the Massachusetts Conference.

"We are passing away, we are passing away."

Progress of the war.—By our latest advices from Mexico, it appears that great preparations are being made for repelling the U. S. forces. The Mexican priesthood, it is stated, have agreed to raise two millions of dollars towards the expenses of the war. How is it, that his holiness at Rome, allows his priesthood to take part with opposing armies upon either side, and his obedient children, to fight and slay each other by hundreds, upon either side? Is there some end in view that sanctifies the means? The merchants of the city of Mexico have raised five hundred thousand dollars, and paid it over to the government, for the purpose of carrying on the war, and have agreed to keep up a contribution of the same account, once every month. The steamer Col. Harney with a full load of government stores for the army was lost on the 12th ult. near the mouth of the Rio Grande. Fifteen lives were lost.

Neal's Saturday Gazette.—We take pleasure in announcing to our readers that this large and interesting weekly has just entered upon a new volume, professing to be highly encouraged by a liberal patronage. It challenges comparison with any other periodical on either side the Atlantic, as a family newspaper, and ladies parlor companion, whilst it gives also due attention to agricultural and commercial affairs. Terms, $2 per year. Two copies for $6. Joseph C. Neal & Co. publishers, Cor. 4th and Chesnut sts. Philadelphia. We are gratified that this valuable exchange now comes regularly to our office. A while ago, we thought it had had discontinued us.

Dreadful Murder.—We learn that Mr. Alexander T. Hays formerly a citizen of Ohio, but latterly a resident of Lexington, Ky. was recently murdered in a most brutal manner, by some person or persons unknown. His body was found in a dreadfully mangled condition early one morning, near the turnpike by a gentleman on the way to market. The Coroner discovered eighty six distinct wounds upon him, inflicted by a bowie knife, and the mark of a ball, which had passed through his head. Mr. H. is said to have been a very inoffensive man, and it is surprising that mortal in the shape of man should exist, capable of such depravity as to perpetrate such a revolting outrage.

Godey's Lady's Book.—The November number of this splendid work, is before us, containing a larger number than usual of its elegant illustrations. Extensive arrangements are made by the publisher for further improving his work. The ablest contributors, and the finest artists are engaged by Mr. Godey. Publisher's Hall, Chesnut St. Philada.

Philadelphia Conference.—We learn by the Meth. Protestant that this new Conference holds its first session at the First M. P. Chapel, Philad'a on the first Tuesday in November, inst. Br. T. H. Stockton is expected to address the Conference at its opening.

☞ The article which appears this week in our Minister's Department, will be found worthy the attention of hearers as well as ministers.

Annual Register, 1847.—We have struck rising of 5000 copies of this little publication, and trust that brethren who have ordered copies will soon receive them. Meanwhile, every subscriber to the Western Recorder, who pays $2 in advance for 8th volume, may look out to receive a copy by mail.

Disastrous Gale.—Intelligence has just reached us of a terrible hurricane in the Gulf of Mexico, and along the coast on the 11th inst. which has been very destructive to shipping, to dwelling houses, and to human life. Nearly every building in Key West was swept away, including government property worth $300,000. Two light houses were destroyed. More than fifty persons perished in the storm.

Rev. W. B. Evans.—We owe an apology to our old friend E. that a letter from him which came to hand after we had started to the O. Conference, was mislaid, and we have not had opportunity of publishing an extract, as we should have done. Please write again.

The Western Theological Seminary, near Pittsburgh, has commenced its fall session, under favorable auspices, with nearly forty students. The Advocate says that a number more are expected.

Baptist Missions.—From the Annual Report of the American Baptist Missionary Union, it appears that this body has under its direction, 16 missionaries, embracing 56 stations, and 87 out stations, 99 missionaries and assistants, of whom 42 are preachers; 150 native preachers and assistants, 82 churches, having more than 5,300 members, more than 600 having been baptized during the past year; and 20 shools, with about 2,000 pupils.

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

JOHANNIES CZERSKI.

It has been stated in the public prints generally, that this modern German Reformer was refused a seat in the Evangelical Alliance, on the grounds, we understood, of improprieties of conduct, and unsoundness of the faith. We are highly gratified in being able to state, from the latest accounts, that this is not the case. It appears from a full statement of the case made by Rev. R. H. Herschell that an individual member of the Alliance expressed a wish to propose the name of Czerski to the nominating committee, which being mentioned to Mr. Herschell a member of the committee, objected to it, on the ground, that in the present stage of the movement in Germany, Czerski's connection with the alliance might not be beneficial to the progress of the work. Here the matter stopped; and the name of Czerski never come before the committee or the Alliance, as a candidate for membership. Whatever charges were made or rumored against Czerski, we learn from the same source, were found on a thorough investigation to be utterly groundless. He was received with cordiality and christian kindness by many of the most eminent men in London and also of the Alliance, for their piety and soundness in the faith.

This is just as it ought to be, from all we can learn of the character—and piety—and creed of Czerski. We doubt not that an intelligent Protestant christian, who had from infancy been nurtured under the benign and illuminating influence of Divine truth, would find some, perhaps many points and some of them deemed by him, highly important points, in which he would consider the creed, or doctrines of Czerski defective, obscure or even erroneous. What then? Reject him as a heretic, unworthy of our christian sympathy, encouragement, and confidence? By no means. To expect a man, trained up under the blighting influence of the errors and superstitions of Romanism, to emerge at once from the dark abodes into the clear sun light of the Bible day, would be to expect what is unreasonable, if not utterly impossible. Not one of our Protestant Reformers could have stood before such a test as this. When the light of Divine truth, first found its way into their gloomy cells, and they began to open their eyes to the glaring superstitions and soul destruying errors of Rome, and guided by the heavenly ray, they came forth and lifted their voice against the errors of popery, and in defence of Gods truth, as they then saw it, not one of those noble men we repeat could have stood before this rigid and unreasonable requirement. What intelligent Protestant of the present day would willingly subscribe to every sentiment, and some of them of considerable importance, even which, Luther and Calvin, when they first passed from darkness to light, held?

We admire and love these good and great men, and we bless God that he raised them up and their compeers for the accomplishment of a great work, and sustained them in it. But they were not perfect nor infallible men. The truth they taught we receive, because God's word confirms it. The errors they may have, at first, brought with them from Rome we reject because God's Word condemns them.

So it ought to be now—in this second reformation from Popery, which has just begun, and by Gods blessing will spread until Papacy is banished from the world.

Allowance must be made, in judging both of their piety and faith, for the previous circumstances in which they have been placed, and the principles under which they have been trained. We ought not to expect a person to come at once out of this system of iniquity, whether he be a Reforming Priest, or one of the reclaiming people, with all the symmetry of a complete Protestant Creed.

At first, for a while, they may like the man whose eyes the Savior opened, they may see some things in a confessed disproportion. But soon, as they wash the filth and scum of Romanism away in the Gospel pool of Protestantism they will both see and be sound. We have been led to say these things, not alone for the sake of Czerski, but also, for the sake of these, (as to how they should be viewed and treated,) both Priests and people, who are renouncing Romanism, in almost every part of the Protestant world.—Presb. of the West.

A Frightful Exigency.—Great presence of Mind.—The Golden Rule of last week states that during the observances with which the new Lodge Room of the I. O. of O. F. at the corner of Grove and Hudson streets, New York, was opened on Friday evening of last week, Dr. W. W. Wallace, who was addressing the assemblage, observed the centre of the floor to suddenly sink, in consequence of the great crowd upon it; and immediately some one cried out that the floor was sinking. Dr. Wallace, in as calm and cool a manner as is possible for a man to assume, and waving his hand, said, "What spring floor wont sink!" This had the immediate effect to arrest the rush for the door that was about being made, when Dr. Wallace addressed himself to the ladies and told them in a few words that the lives of the whole assembly were in imminent danger, and asked them to retire from the room as fast as possible, without crowding, and called upon the gentlemen to retain their places until the ladies were out of the room. His suggestion was complied with, and all escaped in safety—Dr. W., being the last to leave the room. Had the crowd made a rush to the door, it must inevitably have been choked up; and in all probability the floors of the building would have fallen through, and possibly carried the walls with them, in which case nearly every one in the building must have perished. An examination as to the cause having been made, it was found that the wooden columns that formerly supported the floor from the room beneath had been removed, and iron supporters substituted, which were not placed upon beams, but upon the bare floor; and they were forced through the floor some six or eight inches? We understand that the ladies have since held a meeting on the subject, and have resolved to present Dr. Wallace a suitable testimonial of their thanks.

New Political Society.—A new political Association; the motto of which is "All men are Brethren," has lately been formed in London, and is daily receiving new accessions to its numbers. The principles of the Association are of the most liberal kind—one of its chief characteristics is, that it is not confined to Englishmen, but comprehends among its members men of all countries and climes. Among its officers are Germans, Frenchmen, Greeks, Spaniards, Italians, Poles, and even Russians. The motto on the card of admission is printed in the German, French, Greek, Spanish, Italian, and Polish languages. The Society holds its meetings weekly, when speeches are made and patriotic songs sung in the native languages of the various members. One of the objects of this Society is to promote the cause of a universal fellowship—with which view it is intended to celebrate in turn all the great triumphs of popular principles which have been achieved either in Europe or America.

The Great Britain, we learn, cost $650,000. Her insurance was only $370,000.

Columbus and Cleveland Rail Road.—The Work Commenced.—The Cleveland papers contain the advertisement of the Company for letting out work for forty miles of the road, commencing at Cleveland. Proposals are to be received until the 1st. of December. This looks like doing business. We rejoice at it, and hope the work will not stop until the road is completed.—O. S. Journal.

Revolutionary Army.—We find the following in an old Vermont paper:—

The number of regulars furnished to the revolutionary army were, by New England, 147,441, by the Middle States, 56,997. It appears by the above, that New England, consisting of New Hamshire, Massachusetts, Rhode Island and Connecticut, furnished more troops for the defence of the country than the other nine States by 3,872. The number of troops furnished by South Carolina was 6,448; Massachusetts 67,907; Georgia, 6,697; Connecticut, 31,939.

Loss of Steamboats.—The Government has suffered severe loss in steamboats with stores for the army, and we apprehend for the most part that they were poorly built, and dilapidated. The loss of the stores for the army, is more severely felt than the boats, and great care should be taken to charter none but the strongest that can be had.

Curious Legacy.—Mr. Tustin, late Chaplain to Congress, has had a call to the Presbyterian Church, in Hagerstown, Md. Mr. Hugh Kennedy, who died some years ago, left a small annuity to that church on condition that they should sing nothing but the Psalms of David—when they depart from this they lose the legacy, which amounts to $500 per annum.

Fort Pitt.—This was the name of Pittsburgh some 60 years ago, and when an expedition was to be made to Fort Pitt, a frontier port in Pennsylvanie, it took some weeks to prepare wagons, provisions, &c., and it was a journey of 25 or 30 days, camping in the woods at night. We notice this fact from reading in the Pitsburgh papers that the waters being on the rise, there were 50 steamboats taking in cargoes, and all was confusion among draymen and porters along the wharves, while the smoke of a hundred factories gave token of a great manufacturing city called the Manchester of America. In the old countries a city or town makes little or no improvement in a hundred years—here from a wilderness a world has grown up in that time, and no one can foresee the extent of its destiny.—N. Y. Sun.

PROCLAMATION.

Executive Office, Ohio,
October 5, 1846.

In pursuance of a resolution of the General Assembly of the State of Ohio, passed March, 2, 1846, requesting the Governor within the present year to issue his proclamation to the citizens of this State, recommending to them the observance of a day, previous to the first Monday of December next, of thanksgiving to Almighty God for his blessing to us as a people, I, M. Bartley, Governor of the State Ohio, do hereby respectfully recommend to the citizens of this State, to set apart Thursday, the 26th day of November next, as a day of Thanksgiving and Prayer to Almighty God for his beneficence in a bountiful dispensaiton of His blessings to us as a people.

The antiquity of this laudable practice, its authenticity, its infinite importance, and its beneficial effects upon the minds and habits of those who have hitherto revered it, is a sufficient guaranty that the citizens of the State will, on the day designated, suspend their secular business, meet at their various places for religious worship, consecrate the time to thanksgiving, prayer and gratitude to Him from whom emanates all temporal and spiritual blessings. M. BARTLEY.

On taking out your Watch during Sermon.—This is no small exploit. There are many advantages arising from it. In the first place, it will be known that the man has a watch. In the second place, he will show that the sermon has not very much affected him. Thirdly, it will be a modest hint to the minister that he has preached about long enough, and should bring the sermon to a close. Fourthly, it will take up a portion of the time and attention, so that a part of the sermon, certainly, (if not the whole,) will pass by the man as the idle wind, and be lost. Fifthly, it will show what estimate the man puts on the message of grace. Sixthly, it will abstract the notice of others around, and turn away their attention from the message in like manner. Seventhly, it is an act very much in harmony with a passage of Scripture; "When will the new moon be gone, that we may sell corn; and the Sabbath that we may set forth wheat?" Amos viii, 1.—Essex Register.

Economy in Cooking Cranberries.—To each quart of berries, very shortly after the cooking of them is commenced, add a tea-spoonful of saleratus. This will so neutralize the acidiferous juice which they contain, as to make it necessary to use only one fourth part as much sugar as would have been requisite had they been cooked without using saleratus.

John M. Young.

Lima, O. November 3, 1846.

Brother Bassett: We would inform our president of our destitute situation as it regards a preacher to labor with us this year. We have omitted writing heretofore with the expectation that the President would send us a supply.

Our Super. Assistant has not rendered us any assistance, and we apprehend his services would not be acceptable under existing circumstances, not necessary here to be named.

Therefore we wish Brother Young our President to send us a young man, if he can as it may be somewhat difficult to get a house for a family; but send one any how who is stable in all his ways' and we will do the best we can for him.

Our first quarterly meeting for Lima Circuit will commence on the 28th inst. and inasmuch as we may have no assistance unless our President sends us a preacher, we would most earnestly solicit Brothers D. Moore, J. L. Borton, Isaac Hunt, G. W. Thornburg, S. P. Kezerta and A. Besse to come and help us. If any of the above named brethren should come to help us in our extremity they will please call at Lima, Westminster, Uniopolis, or at Brother McGinisis and they will find where the quarterly meeting will be held.

Signed by order of a meeting of members for consultation.

John P. Fay.
R. B. Marshall.

Morganville Circuit.—We are authorised to say that the Quarterly meeting is to be held at Malta, on the 14th and 15th November.

Washington Circuit.—The first Quarterly meeting will be held at Burnett's M. H. Nov. 14, and 15. We invite any of our brethren who can, to come and help us.

J. H. Webster, Sup't.

Otsego Circuit.—Our first Quarterly Meeting will be held at Otsego, Muskingum Co. embracing the last Saturday and Sunday in the present month (November.) We solicit the aid of such brethren as can attend.

The Board of Managers of the State Temperance Society have resolved that a Convention of Delegates from the different Societies throughout the State, be held at Columbus on the 2nd Wednesday of November next, in the Methodist Episcopl Church, at 9, A. M.

The Convention is for the purpose of adopting measures to obtain such an expression of public sentiment upon the License Question, as will secure the favorable action of the coming Legislature.

It is very desirable that the Temperance Societies throughout the State be generally represented at the Convention, as business of great importance is to be transacted.

*Br. Wheat of the Genesee conference, has sent for himself and another brother $2, each in advance for our paper. But as they are both travelling ministers, we only charge them $1 each. Will Br. W. send us another new sub. and we will for the other $2 in hand credit him also for a year in advance.

†Those subscribers have other credits given them in our 1st number, Vol. 8.

New subscribers this week, 10. Discontinuances none.

Agents and Subscribers. A request. As we aim at accuracy, we should be glad if our correspondents, agents, and subscribers, would inform us of any instance, in which we have names wrong either of persons or post offices. Some new counties have been organized embracing post offices to which our paper is sent. We should be glad to be informed of any changes which should be made in the address of persons. And we will be glad to make any corrections in our list, so as to have the name of every subscriber spelt right.

We have discontinued the paper of H. Blackman, Lyme, O. as requested. He owes for 20 numbers which he will please pay to one of our agents.

Br. Paul enquires whether we can furnish parchments for the Indiana conference. Our answer is, we cannot do it immediately, give us time, and it shall be done. We presume they will not be wanted long before next conference. Will they?

Our old friend, T. Smith of Michigan, will observe that we only charge itinerant ministers $1 per year. He would have been credited at this rate a year ago, but unfortunately the $2 of Michigan funds sent us was worth here but 50 per cent. For his present remittance $1, he is credited to end of 8th volume. And if Br. S. will act as Agent, as specified in our terms, we will gladly remit what he has paid.

POETRY.

THE WHITE PILGRIM.

...ne to the spot where the white pilgrim lay,
And pensively stood by his tomb:
When in a low whisper, I heard something say,
'How sweetly I sleep here alone.

'The tempest may howl, and the loud thunder roll,
And gathering storms may arise,
Yet calm are my feelings, at rest is my soul,
And the tears are all wiped from my eyes.

'The cause of my Master propell'd me from home:
I bid my companion farewell:
Left my dear children, who for me now mourn,
In a far distant region to dwell.

'I wander'd in exile, a stranger below,
To publish salvation abroad:
The trump of the Gospel endeavored to blow,
Inviting poor sinners to God.

'And when among strangers, and far from my home,
No kindred or relative nigh,
I met with contagion and sunk in the tomb:
My spirit to mansions on high.

'Go tell my companion, and children most dear,
To weep not for Joseph though gone;
The same hand that led me through scenes dark and drear,
Has kindly conducted me home.'

There is an Hour of Peaceful Rest.

BY W. B. TAPPAN.

There is an hour of peaceful rest,
To mourning wanderers given;
There is a joy for souls distressed—
A balm for every wounded brest—
'Tis found alone in Heaven.

There is a soft, a downy bed,
Far from these shades of even—
A couch for weary mortals spread,
Where they may rest their aching head,
And find repose in Heaven.

There is a home for weary souls,
By sin and sorrow driven;
When tossed on life's tempestuous shoals,
Where storms arise, and ocean rolls,
And all is drear—'tis Heaven.

There Faith lifts up her cheerful eye,
To brighter prospects given—
And views the tempest passing by,
The evening shadows quickly fly,
And all serene in Heaven.

There fragrant flowers immortal bloom,
And joys supreme are given;
There rays divine disperse the gloom—
Beyond the confines of the tomb
Appears the dawn of Heaven.

The next Annual Conference is to be held at Johnson's Meeting house, in Shelby county, Indiana, 8 miles West of Shelbyville, on the 2nd Wednesday in October, 1847.

The conference adopted the following Resolutions offered by C. H. Williams, and ordered that they should be forwarded for publication.

Resolved 1st. That in the estimation of this Annual Conference it is of unspeakable importance that the rising generation of our county should be educated under the power of the Bible and the teachings of the Holy Spirit, that it is the duty of the Church of Jesus Christ as the light of the world to pursue the most vigorous efforts to accomplish this great and glorious achievement.

Resolved 2nd, That we have the utmost confidence in the efficiency and adaptation of Sabbath School instruction to secure such an education and that it is incumbent upon all the friends of Christ and his cause to aid the Sabbath school enterprize.

Resolved 3rd, That we highly appreciate the "American Sunday School Union" in its objects and spirit that while it aims at the concentration of the efforts of the friends of Sabbath Schools—strengthens the hands of the friends of Religious instruction on the Lords day—and circulates religious Books—steeped in the spirit and truth of the Bible—yet free from all sectarianism—it is a privilege and a duty to aid such a truly christian enterprize.

Resolved 4th. That as a Conference we will by divine aid use all proper exertions in our respective fields of labor to organize Sabbath Schools and introduce the publications, of the Am. S. S. Union, so excellent in their character—so well adapted for general use and so indispensable for the efficiency and prosperity of Sabath school instruction.

The following preamble and resolutions were offered by Br. Morrison and adopted by the conference:

Whereas the late General Conference of the M. P. Church has by a solemn vote, declared it to be their judgment that the several Annual Conferences have the whole matter of slavery under their control, to make such rules and regulations as they think proper on the subject consistent with the constitution of the Church. Therefore,

Resolved 1st. That we believe that all who are in the spirit and practice of slavery are guilty of an offence condemned by the word of God.

Resolved 2. That we believe the judiciary of the church fully clothed with power to exclude a a slaveholder from the church according to discipline. See Art. 13. of Const.

Resolved 3. That we are of the opinion that a church (or society) circuit or conference believing slavery to be sinful is not under obligations either from the word of God or the institution of our church to fellowship a slaveholder.

Resolved 4. That any member of the M. P. Church within this District possessed of slaves shall be allowed twelve months to liberate them and in case of a failure to do so they shall be dealt with as in cases of immorality.

Resolved 5. That while we deeply deplore the great evil of slavery we will exercise all christian forbearance toward those involved in the difficulty by civil law—but will continue to remonstrate with them in the spirit of our great master to use all means in their power to put the evil away.

The following Preamble and Resolution were offered by Br. Morrison and adopted by the conference.

Whereas, our last Annual Conference recommend to their delegates to the late G. Conference to use their influence to get a resolution passed declaring the buying or selling men women or children with the intention to enslave them or holding them in involuntary slavery is a moral evil and a sin against God, and whereas the said Gen. Con. failed to pass the said Resolution and also refused to pass, the resolution of the committee to whom the said resolution was referred. Therefore,

Resolved, That we disapprove of so much of the action of the late Gen Conf.

The conference adopted the following preamble and resolution unanimously by rising vote. Another of a similar character was adopted in the same manner in relation to the decease of Br. Thomas Hicklin.

Whereas, it has pleased the Great Head of the Church, to call from among us our esteemed Br. D. H. Stephens; we feel it due to his memory that this conference (of which he was the President, when he deceased) should give some expression of its regard for him. Therefore,

Resolved, That in the judgment of this Conf. in the death of Br. Stephens we have lost a zealous and efficient minister, one who adorned the doctrine of Christ Jesus our Lord, and while we feel to mourn our loss and sympathize with his surviving relatives, but we rejoice in believing that he died in the triumph of faith and that our loss is his eternal gain.

NUMBER THIRTEEN.

ON BOARD THE JULIA PALMER, at Sea, LAKE SUPERIOR, Oct. 4th, 1846

My Dear L.—I had closed my business at Copper Harbor, struck my tent for the last time, and breached my boat, preparatory to going down, when the Julia Palmer hove in sight, bound for the north shore. The opportunity to visit that region was too temping to be resisted, so here I am, in the midst of the vast Lake, with nothing but the "blue above and the blue below" to greet the eye. The hills that gird the Harbor have long since faden from view, and every eye is peering through the mist to catch a glimpse of the rocky heights of Isle Royale. A fresh wind is blowing from the west, and an October sun shines with almost lustreless rays, through the hazy atmosphere. The Julia, though she has seen better days, is still staunch and plows her way steadily through the dark waters, casting the foam from her curving prow. Our route is one which, of all others, I would have selected for a pleasure-trip, and in order to avoid the ennui, while at sea, in this Mediteranean Lake, I will give you an account of what I observe. We will touch at Isle Royale, Spar and Victoria Islands, (which have been clustered since the Copper mania commenced,) Fort Williams, Point Porphyny and Michipicoten Island, and thence proceed to the Saut. On Bayfield's Map published by the Society for the Diffusion of Useful Knowledge, you will find these points indicated. "Land ahead!" is the cry, and I must, like my companions of the voyage, go out and greet it, so farewell for the present.

Oct. 5th. We struck Isle Royale about 3 o'clock, P. M. A dense maze hung around the hills so that land could not be discerned except at a short distance. We accordingly made Siskawait Harbor, where we passed the night. We found a fishing party here, which is the only evidence of man that met our observation. This morning we sent out a boat which brought us back a plentiful supply of Siskawait, white-fish and trout, and at noon we sat down to an Ichthyan feast, which St. Peter himself would have relished.—The white-fish, in appearance and flavor, resemble the shad; and those which graced our table weighed nearly 12 lbs. apiece, whilst the Siskawait, in richness, are equal to the salmon. We have had many a pleasant fish dinner together upon the banks of the Reservoir, and I trust that it may be our fortune to partake of many more, under similar circumstances, but let me assure you that whilst the roach and the bass are good, the white-fish is better, and the Siskawait is best.

For some hours we have been coasting, so as to double the head of Isle Royale; but now its shores, lined with dark, frowning cliffs, are fast receding from view, and the lofty ridges that gird the Canada shore, are becoming more distinct. Isle Royale is a strange island.—Away up here under the 48th parallel of latitude, where the sun never shines with full effulgence, it rises bleak and desolate. Thrown up from the deep in one of those great convulsions of Nature which from time have rent the earth, it presents almost a blackened mass of rock, in whose fissures the cedar and birch have taken root and grow with a sickly growth. No plot of grass relieves the eye, no game roams through its stinted forests. Neptune and Vulcan have held alternate sway over the elements of which it is composed.—At one time it has been a boiling cauldron of laver, at another the waves have swept over it with remorseless fury, burrying its thousands of feet below the surface. Again it was raised from the deep, where it has remained for ages, whilst the tempest and the waves sought to retain their ancient dominion over it. Fobidding as is its exterior aspect, it has many charms for the explorer. Copper and silver are found, and ere long man will penetrate its rock-ribbed hills and bring forth, their hidden treasures.

Oct. 6. In the afternoon we ran between Spar and Victoria islands, where we found a beautiful harbor, almost entirely encircled with hills. Here we cast anchor, manned a boat and and proceeded back to Juan Island, the seat of the British North American Copper Company's operations. They have penetrated a spar vein fourteen and a half feet, in width, to the depth of only twenty-seven feet, but the vein already affords ample indications of mineral wealth. We procured a suite of the copperores, and passed the day very delightfully.

Wednesday morning. Weighed anchor and proceeded to Fort William, situated on the right bank of the Kaministiquia River. The boat wound her way among a labyrinth of islands, affording the grandest panorama that my eye ever rested on. Grim and blackened masses of trap rise up on every side, covered with a dwarfish growth of cedar, spruce, and white birch. Range succeeds range, rising higher and higher, until their outlines are dimly traced on the western sky. From where I write, to the south, Pie Island rises up purpendicularly to the height of 850 feet, resembling an immense castle; to the west McKay's Mountain, 1000 feet in height, overhangs the valley of Kiministiquia; to the east, Thunder Cape, 1350 feet, juts into the lake, and its castellated walls, nearly 1000 feet in height and extending for miles, are just discernable, whilst to the north, a long line of serried hills bounds the horizin. It is worth a voyage here just to witness the magnificence and vastness of the scene before me. It is in a season too, when nature puts on her liveliest garb. The frosts have dyed the woods with every variety of tint. The birch is distinguished by its rich golden hue, the maple by its scarlet livery, whilst the fir and the cedar still retain their garb of dark green.

We have been ashore at Fort William, where we were very hospitably received by Mr. MacKenzie, the agent of the Hudson's Bay Fur Company. At this post, or factory, we quaffed some eau de vie, which from its quality, I judge had not been subjected to a 100 per cent. tariff. This post has lost much of its former greatness. Time was when 600 voyageurs might be seen here at once, preparatory to starting on their summer expeditions—some by Lake Pepine, some to Winnepeg and Slave Lake, and others to Hudson's Bay. I have gathered some particulars as to their operations which may be of interest to you. They employ between 2000 or 3000 men, and wield a capital of over a million of dollars. They have, through their voyageurs and trappers, penetrated almost every streamlet and lake between the Pacific on the west, and the Atlantic on the east. These men hardly know any other government, and acknowledge no other master. The company's main factory for Lake Superior is at the mouth of the Michipicoten river. Here the furs collected during the winter are brought on the opening of navigation, and conveyed in small batteaux up the the stream to the portage, distant 200 miles, where they are met by larger batteaux laden with clothes, &c., brought from England which have ascended the Moose river, flowing, to Hudson's Bay. Here an exchange takes place. The furs are taken to England in the same vessels which brought out the clothes, whilst the latter are taken to the depot, at the mouth of Michipicopon, and distributed among the several posts. The distance between Hudson's Bay and Lake Superior is 400 miles, the land portage six miles, and the voyage is accomplished in less than a month. The chief animals in request on account of their furs, are the martin, the beaver, the otter and lynx. Trappers are not employed on this side of the Rocky mountains for the reason that they exterminate the game, but Indians only, and to them traps are forbidden. They break into the beaver-houses and spear the males, permiting the females and young to escape. Since the substitution of silk and nutria in the manufacture of hats, the price of beaver skins has greatly declined, and I understand that they bring only 12s. Sterling, in England. By excluding trappers and compelling the Indians to discriminate in the selection of the game, the company have been enabled to preserve the stock nearly unimpaired.

The martin is more valuable than the beaver. For years in succession they will abound in a district, and then almost entirely disappear. After the lapse of a few years, they are again found, as abundant as ever. It is supposed that they become aware of the presence of their enemy, and migrate for the purpose of avoiding him.

About a day's journey from the mouth of Kaministiguia river, occur the falls of Kakabeka, which were visited by Major Long, in one of his expeditions. They are regarded as more magnificent even than those of Niapara. The volume of water in the former is by no means as great, but the gorge within which it is compressed is quite as picturesque, and the leap equally high. The mind is enabled to grasp the scene in all of its height and width at once; whereas Niagara is on so vast a scale, that we have to measure the proportions, and view it in different aspects, before we comprehend its full grandeur and magnificence. The width of the river is disproportionate to the height of the falls, and hence it is, that almost every one, in gazing upon that "hell of waters" for the first time, experiences a feeling of disappointment. It has to grow upon his admiration. This morning (Thursday) we left Fort William at break of day, and are now about 10 miles distant from Michigan Bay. A cold raw wind prevails from the north east, and a heavy sea is rolling on the lake.—Most of my traveling companions have settled their accounts, and are stretched on their backs—apparently studying the constellations in the roof of the cabin. I predict a slim attendance at the dinner table to-day. The lurches of the boat are so violent that I find it difficult to write. So good bye until we reach calmer waters.

Monday, Oct. 12.—On Thursday evening we cast anchor in one of the straits of Neepegon Bay, and nearly under the 49th degree of north latitude. To the south lay Fluer Island, 800 feet in height, whilst to the east, was seen St. Ignace rising up 1300 feet. The scenery is most romantic, and the gentlemen of our party who were brought up in the midst of the Highlands of Scotland, declared that there is nothing there comparable to it. Thursday evening the whole northern hemisphere was irradiated with brilliant flashes of light. A heavy white frost covered our deck, and these two circumstances were regarded as the forerunner of a storm. The next morning a heavy blow sprung up from the south east, accompanied by rain, which made the lake boil like yeast. This continued until last night, when the wind veered to the north-west, the clouds broke, and a clear sun once more rose in the east. Our anchors were weighed, and we are now dashing on toward the Saut as fast as wind and stream can carry us. All traces of land have disappeared, but we expect, before night, to catch a glimpse of Caribbs and Michipicoten Islands—and, ere morning, to greet White fish Point. The lake is very rough, and occasionally a long surging wave strikes the boat and causes all her timbers to quiver. We can muster but four cabin passengers who report themselves sound—the balance are reclining in their berths.

October 15.—We reached Sault Ste Marie on Tuesday evening, where we shall be detained until Friday, awaiting a boat to take us to Detroit. We have bid good bye to copperdom for six months.

HOW TO GET ALONG WITH NEIGHBORS.—"I once had a neighbor, who, though a clever man, came to me one day and said, 'Esquire White, I want you to come and get your geese away.' 'Why,' said I, 'what are are my geese a doing!' 'They pick my pigs ears when they are eating, and drive them away, and I will not have it.' 'What can I do?' said I. 'You must yoke them.' 'That I have not time to do now, said I; 'I do not see but they must run.' 'If you do not take care of them, I shall,' said the clever shoemaker in anger. 'What do you say, Esq. White!' 'I cannot take care of them now, but I will pay you for all damages.' 'Well,' said he, 'you will find that a hard thing, I guess.'

So off he went, and I heard a terrible squalling among the geese. The next news of the geese was, that three of them were missing. My children went and found them terribly mangled and dead, and thrown into the bushes.

'Now,' said I, 'all keep still, and let me punish him.' In a few days, the shoemaker's hogs broke into my corn. I saw them, but let them remain a long while. At last I drove them out, and picked up the corn which they had torn down, and fed them with it in the road. By this time the shoemaker came in great haste after them.

'Have you seen any thing of my hogs?' said he. 'Yes, sir, you will find them yonder, eating some corn which they tore down in my field.' 'In your field!' 'Yes, sir,' said I, 'hogs love corn, you know—they were made to eat.' 'How much mischief have they done?' 'O, not much,' said I.

Well, off he went to look, and estimated the damage to be equal to a bushel and a half of corn.

'Oh, no,' said I, 'it can't be.' 'Yes,' said the shoemaker, 'and I will pay you every cent of damage.' 'No,' replied I, 'you shall pay me nothing. My geese have been a great trouble to you.'

The shoemaker blushed, and went home. The next winter, when we came to settle, the shoemaker determined to pay for my corn. 'No,' said I, 'I shall take nothing.'

After some talk, we parted; but in a day or two, I met him on the road and fell into conversation in the most friendly manner. But when I started on, he seemed loth to move, and I paused. For a moment both of us were silent. At last, he said, 'I have something labering on my mind.' 'Well, what is it?' 'Those geese; I killed three of your geese, and shall never rest until you know how I feel. I am sorry.' And the tears came into his eye.

'Oh, well, said I, 'never mind, I suppose my geese were provoking.'

I never took any thing of him for it; but whenever my cattle broke into his field after this, he seemed glad—because he could show how patient he could be.

'Now,' said the narrator,' 'conqner yourself, and you can conquer with kindness where you can conquer in no other way.'—Ch. Non-Resis.

THE QUEEN AND QUAKERESS.

In the autumn of 1818, her late Majesty Queen Charlotte, visited Bath, accompanied by the Princess Elizabeth. The waters soon effected such a respite from pain in the royal patient that she proposed an excursion to a park of some celebrity in the neighborhood, than the estate of a rich widow belonging to the Society of Friends. Notice was given of the Queen's intention, and a message returned that she should be welcome. Our illustrious traveller had, perhaps, never before held any personal intercourse with a member of the persuasion whose votaries had never voluntarily paid taxes to "the man George, called King by the vain ones." The lady and gentleman who were to attend the august visitants had but a feeble idea of the reception to be expected. It was supposed the Quaker would at least say, "Thy Majesty," "Thy Highness," or "Madam." The royal carriage arrived at the lodge of the park at the appointed hour. No preparations appeared to have been made; no hostess or domestics stood ready to greet the guest. The porter's bell was rang; he stepped forth deliberately with his broad-rimmed beaver on, and unbendingly accosted the lord-in-waiting with "What's thy will, friend?"

This was almost unanswerable.

"Surely," said the nobleman, "your lady is aware that her Majesty——go to your mistress and say the Queen is here."

"No, truly," answered the man, "it needeth not; I have no mistress nor lady; but friend Rachael Mills expected thee. Walk in!"

"The Queen and Princess were handed out, and walked up the avenue. At the door of the house stood the plainly attired Rachael, who without even a courtesy, but with a cheerful nod, said:

"How's thee do, friend? I am glad to see thee and thy daughter. I wish thee well. Rest and refresh thee and thy people, before I show thee my grounds"

What could be said of such a person? Some condescensions were attempted, implying that her majesty came not only to view the park, but esteem for the society to which Mistress Mills belonged. Cool and unawed, she answered.

"Yea, thou art right there. The friends are well thought of by some folks, but they need not the praise of the world; for the rest, many strangers gratify their curiosity by going over this place, and it is my custom to conduct them myself; I shall do the like by thee, friend Charlotte. Moreover, I think well of thee, as a dutiful wife and mother.

Thou hast had thy trials, and so has thy good partner. I wish thy grandchild well through hers."

She alluded to the Princess Charlotte. It was evident that the friend meant kindly, nay respectfully, that no offence could be taken. She escorted her guest through her estate. The Princess Elizabeth noticed in the hen house, a breed of poultry hitherto unknown to her, and expressed a wish to possess some of these rare fowls, imagining that Mrs. Mills would regard her wish as a law but the Quakeress merely remarked with her characteristic evasion.

"They are rare, as thou sayest; but if any are to be purchased in this land, or in other countries, I know of few women likelier than thyself to procure them with ease."

Her royal highness more plainly expressed desire to purchase some of these she now beheld.

"I do not buy and sell," answered Rachael Mills.

"Perhaps you will give me a pair," persevered the Princess, with a conciliating smile.

"Nay, verily," replied Rachel," I have refused many friends; and that which I denied mine kinswomen, Martha Ash, it becometh me not to grant to any. We have long had it to say that these birds belong only to our house; and can make no exception in thy favor."—Sharp's Mag.

Religious Intelligence.

Fayette Springs, Pa. Nov. 4, 1846.

Br. Bassett:—With your permission I will communicate to our worthy President and to the friends of religion the condition of this Circuit. I reached my appointment the day after the rise of Conference met with a welcome reception from the brethren of the Ct. and commenced my labors trusting in the Lord for prosperity. We have had some good meetings this Conference year, and we are looking up to the Great Head of the Church for more manifest displays of his power in the awakening and conversion of sinners. I have nine appointments and there is a prospect of enlarging our boundery. This is a pleasant field in the summer season. But it is somewhat disagreeable in the winter, but bless the Lord we know that our labor is not in vain in the Lord. I have found the Lord precious to my soul while traveling over these mountains and I have also found a hospitable people, they appear to enjoy the love of God in their hearts. O that they may abound yet more and more in love.

We have had our Quarterly Meeting. It commenced on the 24th of Oct. and closed on the following Monday night. Our local Brethern who have been so good in aiding us the past year, came to our aid on this occasion, and labored for the good of souls. May the Lord reward them. This Meeting resulted in the addition of two persons to the Church. O that their names may be recorded in heaven. The people of the most High, rejoiced in his favor with a hope of a blessed immortality. In our lovefeast while the people of the Lord were speaking of the goodness mercy and suffering of the Almighty in the preservation of their lives and conversion of their souls God manifested himself to them by his spirit as he does not to the world. We have a number of protracted meetings coming on and we hope that the God of all grace will be with us and grant us a glorious revival of religion on this Circuit. Brethren pray for us, that the flag of Calvary may wave in triumph here. Yours in Christ,

V. Lucas, Supt.

Miscellaneous Sketches of Travel.

NO. IV.

The old Church Yard.

It was on the eve of a beautiful day in the month of August that I wandered forth to meditate among the graves of an old moss covered country church yard. The sun was retiring behind the western hills, and his golden beams played beautifully upon the proud brow of Whitestone's craggy steep that reared its lofty summit beyond the green and pleasant vale of Mowbay. Silence reigned profound. The old and venerable elms, among whose branches the rook had built her nest in times beyond the memory of the oldest chronicler of the village, cast their long and sombre shadows over the graves of those who reclined in silence beneath the velvet sod, and their leaves were as still as the tomb, unruffled by the breath of the evening breeze. The last lingering rays of the sun glittered upon the somewhat dilapidated steeple, so soft, so radiant, that they seemed like the golden hues of heaven drooping from some angel's plume. Gradually faded away the light of the Autumn sun, and a long twilight enveloped the church in a robe of dingy grey. I seated myself on a marble tablet, erected to the memory of a friend that I had loved, and whose name I had enshrined in the affections of my heart, and long embalmed with tears of grateful remembrance. Ten long years had passed away amid the scenes of a foreign land, since I first pressed the sacred stone, and now, while musing above his silent remains, how many hallowed associations of youth—associations connected with the silent dead and old church-yard—came trooping up before my mind.

The church, a massive yet beautiful building, erected in the purest style of Grecian architecture, had been constructed out of the ruins of the once powerful castle of Thresk, a great stronghold of the Feudal times. The owner of the castle, celebrated in history as the brave Baron Mowbray, for a length of time withstood King Henry's army, who had subjugated the numerous fortresses of other rebellious Barons; but yielding at last to the misfortunes of war, his castle was taken by the King's army, and demolished; and the chivalrous knight took his departure for the Holy Land; engaged in the crusades, and distinguished himself by many chivalrous feats of valor.

Wo to the day when royal arms first triumphed o'er its walls,
And ruthless men with savage joy, laid waste its splendid halls.

Here were the graves of my ancestors—their final resting place—which by the silvery light of the pale moon and twinkling stars in the sweet solitude of night, I had often knelt beside and watered with affection's holiest tear. Here I had listened to the pealing strains of the organ that swelled melodiously amid the massive pillars of this noble structure, and rolled their sweet cadence along the carved and fretted oaken ceilings of its magnificent aisles. Here I had watched the sunlight stream through the high stone casement, overgrown with moss, and filled with beautiful stained glass of every variety of color, wrought into numberless uncouth, grotesque and antique figures, that mellowed and tinged each living ray; many of them playing upon the baptismal fount, where I was dedicated to God in holy baptism, "in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost." Here, listless of the sanctity of the sacred spot, with "laughing, romping glee," I had played at "hide-and-seek" behind the old moss-covered grave stones, and the solid buttresses of the venerable church. Here, by the chancel door, with hearts as warm and buoyant as my own, in the intermission of school hours, I had "shot the marble through the ring." How vividly Roger's description came to memory:

On yon grey stone that fronts the chancel door,
Worn smooth by busy feet now seen no more,
Each eve we shot the marble through the ring,
When the heart dawned, and life was in its spring;
Alas! unconscious of the kindred earth
That vainly echoed to the feet of mirth.

The curfew bell still "tolled the knell of parting day," a time honored custom, kept up from the time of William the Conqueror. The jackdaw still reigned triumphant in the belfrey, where hung a beautiful peal of eight bells, or in inaccessible niches of the church, despite the efforts of several mischievous schoolboys to dispossess him of his home, disturbing the sacred sanctity of the place as on his wing he wheeled around the steeple's height uttering his inces sant and monotonous cry of "Jack! Jack!! Jack!!!" Midway the towering steeple in a small shrine, still dwelt in happy security the sculptured representation of our first parents—Adam and Eve, who usually came down from their elevated seat to dine, as the school boys were wont to say, when they heard the clock strike the hour of noon: while the little chirping sparrow, not much given to the veneration of images, continued pertinaciously to build its nest upon the heads of the innocent pair.

At the western extremity of the church still stood the ancient Grammar School, with its title, in characters nearly effaced by the lapse of time, printed on its grey portal. Here I made my first attempt to learn the "art of speaking and writing the English language with propriety"—(vide Lindley Murray.)—an art in which, unfortunately I could but make indifferent progress, notwithstanding an occasional application of birch and hazel by the worthy schoolmaster, a thick set, good natured man, with small twinkling eyes, full of fun and frolic," that peered out beneath a protruding forehead and exuberant eye brows, whose ruling passion was a fondness for Indian weed, and the culture of a small garden spot, from which he supplied the town with nice green vegetables. Sometimes, however his temper would become ruffled, and then what a tempest! One morning a heavy cloud rested on his countenance; the boys knew a storm was gathering, and cowered behind the desks like a covey of frightened partridges. Soon the tempest broke in a shower of blows upon the devoted back of a mischievous little knight, who had been discovered writing on the old carved up and dingy window shutters of the school room the following:—

"Let all who pass this Grammar school,
Know that it's taught by a learn'd fool!"

As I walked through the solitary paths of the church yard, and in the dim twilight, "searched the records of each mouldering stone," or newly lettered grave, of names unknown to fortune and to fame, the following lines, from Gray's Elegy came forcibly to mind:

Yet e'en these bones from insult to protect,
Some frail memorial still erected nigh
With uncouth rhymes, and shapeless sculpture deck'd,
Implores the passing tribute of a sigh.
Their name, their years, spelt by th'unlettered Muse
The place of fame and elegy supply. * * * * * * *
Perhaps in this neglected spot is laid
Some heart once pregnant with celestial fire;
Hands that the rod of empire might have swayed,
Or waked to ecstacy the living lyre.
But knowledge to their eyes her ample page,
Rich with the spoils of Time, did ne'er unroll:
Chill Penury repress'd their noble rage,
And froze the genial current of the soul.
Full many a gem of purest ray serene,
The dark unfathomed caves of ocean bear,
Full many a flower is born to blush unseen,
And waste its sweetness on the desert air!

How many I found asleep in the gloomy portals of the tomb, whom my heart had cherished, and memory had embalmed within her most sacred recess! Alas! what ravages death can make in a few short years. The lovely bud, in whose closed and balmy embrace were hid so many unknown beauties and rich fragrance; and the beautiful flower, expanded with bloom and loveliness, ladening the breeze with its perfume, were alike withered and entombed. The tombstones of many recognized only by an affectionate memory, were overgrown with moss, and every letter obliterated by the mouldering influence of time: but yet,

In friendship's silent register they live.
Nor ask the vain memorial art can give.

There were three graves that more particularly attracted my attention. The first, alas! was my own cousin, whom when I last bade her "adieu!" was a blooming maid of some thirteen summers, as blithe and cheerful as the birds that caroled their lays on the leafy spray, amid the fragrance of the hawthorn bush. Her countenance was robed in health and beauty, and with a fairy-like step she would wander in the green fields, pluck the violet from the scented lawn, or the primrose from its mossy bed, where murmured a soft fellaced rill; or the honey-suckle from the hedgerow that skirted a sylvan grove where the kingdove would sing its meek and plaintive song; and her merry voice would ring on the balmy breeze as she gathered the buttercup and the daisy from the verdant meads. Like some of the beautiful and fragile flowers, gathered by her own delicate fingers, soon her lovely form was plucked by the ruthless hand of death; and withered amid her fragrance and beauty, she descended to the tomb. I shed a tear above her resting place, and turned away with sorrow.

The second was a companion of my boyish days, with whom I had chased the butterfly over the green meadows, and wrestled on the village green. I learnt that he became a young man of great religious worth; and though a youth, was endowed with the wisdom and experience of age. His frame appeared with strength indued to brave the rude shock of the storm and tempest's fury. But, alas! consumption, that subtile and fell disease, that preys unseen upon man's inward being, withered his strength and blighted his beauty; and in the noon and flush of manhood he passed down to the place appointed for all living. Peace to his memory.

The third was that of a fashionable young man, of rare and splendid genius, and blessed with a liberal education. He received his diploma as Doctor of Medicine at the London University and Doctor's Commons. He entered upon his profession with brilliant prospects of success, and married a beautiful and accomplished lady. Fortune smiled upon him, and he appeared destined to attain a distinction, honor and wealth. But alas! at the fashionable and convivial party he contracted a taste for the wine cup, and gradually yielded himself to its bewitching influence, an obedient slave. His effects soon became swallowed up in the vortex of dissipation, and all his laurels withered on his brow. He now obtained possession of a valable landed estate from his widowed mother, by basely promising to support her in her age, and squandered it also. At last his constitution yielded to the ravages of inebriation, and he died a raving madman with the delirium tremens, after having reduced his mother from a state of affluence to extreme poverty, and an affectionate wife to a widow and a pauper. A cloud rests upon his memory.

On my way from the old church yard, pondering upon the uncertainty of life and beauty, my attention was called to an obscure grave in one of its dark corners. I stooped to examine a small memento placed at the head, and found it to be that of the old sexton, a bald headed little man, who had faithfully followed his trade of bell-ringer and grave digger, for more than thirty years; and whom village scandal had charged with being connected in the premature resurrection of more than one human body. He knew every grave in the church yard, and could give you an epitomized history of its occupant; and treated with as much respect a human skull as the school-boy does his foot-ball. How applicable to him were the words of Blair:—

See yon lerker maker of the dead man's bed,
The Sexton, hoary-headed Chronicler,
Of hard unmeaning face, down which ne'er stole
A gentle tear; with mattock in his hand,
Digs through whole rows of kindred and acquaintance
By far his juniors. Scarce a skull's cast up
But well he knew its owner, and can tell
Some passage of its life.

I left him to rest in his narrow limits, quoting the language of the above author:—

"Some trusty brother of the trade Has gone for him what he has gone for thousands."

Conference opened by the President reading a portion of the word of God, and prayer.

Voted, that Hiram B Gilbert serve as Secretary, and Reuben Buttolph be Assistant Secretary.

George Smith elected President.

The Special Committee on Slavery reported as follows: Your Committee respectfully report, as they trust in the fear of God, under the influence of his Holy Spirit, and with an eye single to his declarative glory, that they have taken into careful and prayerful consideration the subject of American Slavery, together with all the communications we have received respecting that subject, and do present unto you, for your consideration and adoption, the following results of our deliberations:

Resolved, That in the judgment of this Conf. the principle and *practice of Slavery is morally wrong, under all circumstances; that the buying or selling or holding any of our fellow human beings in bondage is inconsistent with our Mediator's perfect Law of Liberty, which we are under, and by which we are to be judged.

Therefore, Resolved, That in the judgment of this Conf. it is the imperious duty of the P. M. Church, and every other branch of the Christian church, to bear a faithful and decided testimony against it, to exert all their moral influence and to use all lawful and christian means for its extirpation from the church.

Whereas, One of our sister Conferences has respectfully requested our Conf. to define its position in respect to our connection with the Southern Conferences; therefore, Resolved, That in the judgment of this Conf. secession from any church (especially at present) is not calculated to accelerate the abolition of Slavery, as it closes the door against investigation of that subject with the South, and prevents the spread and influences of Anti-Slavery principles, which in the hands of God, are the only moral means to be depended upon for the extirpation of this great moral evil from the Church and World.

Resolved, That in the judgment of this Conf. it is our indispensable duty and the duty of all our sister Confs., to use all their influence, by moral suasion, by suffrage and by petition, in behalf of the abolition of Slavery, especially from the Church; exercising the forbearance and long suffering required by the perfect Law of Liberty which we are under. But should the time arrive when all hopes of its eradication from our church shall have fled & gone, then, in the judgment of this Conf., it may become the duty of the Northern and Western Conferences to procure, if possible, a peaccable separation into a separate general Conf. or to secede from the South.

Voted, That the above report of the Special Committee on Slavery be adopted:

The following resolution was adopted.

Resolved, As a Conference, we feel the importance of a deeper work of grace in all hearts; therefore, resolved, that we will, by Divine assistance, aspire after holiness of heart and of life.

Resolved, That if practicable, at least one protracted meeting be held on each circuit and station of this District, this Conference yea.

Resolved, That the President, Superintendents and Stewards make extra efforts to raise the salaries of the Itinerant preachers of this District this Conf. year, and in case of delinquency or neglect of duty, they shall be amenable to this body.

Resolved, That our next Annual Conf. be held in the Methodis Meeting-house, in South Granville, N. Y., on the second Wednesday of September, 1847, at 9 o'clock, A. M., and that R. Buttolph deliver the introductory discourse, commencing at half past 10 o'clock, A. M. Adjourned.

*The meaning of the Committee was voluntary practice.

THE PULPIT.

There is, perhaps, no instrumentality so powerful in this country, in reaching the hearts and influencing the conduct of men, as the Pulpit. When we reflect that the greater portion of the inhabitants of every town, village and country district in the land gather together weekly to listen reverently to the tones of those who are supposed to speak as "the oracles of God," we have to acknowledge that far beyond the influence of political leaders, or even perhaps the constant droppings of the Press, is the power of the teachings of those, whose mission it is to preach the superiority of the spiritual and eternal, to that which is merely earthly and perishing.

If we have not over-estimated this influence of the Pulpit, and we think we have not, it is evident that a great responsibility rests upon the shoulders of those who occupy the position of moral and religious teachers. The flock is, in fact, given into their hands, and wo to them, if, through their carelessness or weakness, the people are suffered to go astray! Wo to them if they fail to lift up their voices and rebuke licentiousness when it rages as a fire, or corruption when it floweth like a flood!

We say it hesitatingly, and with a sense of the weakness of our own judgment, but we will say it—that we fear the preaching heard from our pulpits at the present day, is not sufficiently practical and pointed. We fear too much is said about the Pharisess of olden time, and too little about those of the present—too much about the selfish rich man at whose gate the beggar Lazarus lay unfed, and too little of the selfish rich men of this generation, at whose gates the Lazarusses of to-day are now lying—too much about those who persecuted the Saviour of old, and too little as to those who in our own day "are crucifying Him afresh, and putting Him to open shame."

If this be not too much the case, how is it that it has been left for us, who fill no pulpit, who do not even edit a professedly religious sheet, (though we trust the Post will ever be found on the side of morality and virtue) to call attention to an evil of the most insidious and pernicious character. Open the "religious papers" of the country—in how many instances will they be found more sectarian than religious—devoted to the interests of their particular branch of the Christian church, and filled with details of its business arrangements, but devoid, to a great degree, of interest to all who do not belong to the particular sect of which they are organs, and, consequently, but of limited circulation and influence. In no unkindly spirit do we make these remarks; but only to call the attention of the religious world to this matter, and ask them whether it is not the truth. No one would rejoice more than ourselves were it otherwise—a day when the various Protestant sects shall be brought into a closer and more brotherly union; when each shall learn to attach less importance to its own peculiar badges and tenets, and more to the great fundamental truths of Christianity.

But we have been led away from our subject, which is the power and responsibility of the Pulpit, and its duty in relation to the almost unprecedented circulation which the works of Eugene Sue, and other writers, of less genius but equal depravity, have attained. It is no uncommon thing, it is in truth a very common thing, to see the novels of the above-mentioned author on the parlor tables of the most respectable families. And is no one responsible for this? Whose duty was it, if not that of pastors, to lift up the voice like a trumpet, upon the first appearance of such words in such places, in a tone of warning rebuke, sufficient to have been heard through the length and breadth of the land.

But though in all candor, we are compelled to say that we think that ministers in general have been culpable in this thing, yet we acknowledge there have been exceptions.—Phil. S. E. Post.

From the London Watchman

The second great public meeting was held on Wednesday evening in the Exeter Hall, which was literally crowded to overflowing in all is parts by a most respectable audience.

At six o'clock the Hon. Mr. Justice Champton took the chair. A hymn—

"The heavens declare thy glory, Lord"— was given out, and the seventh chapter of Revelation read, by the Rev. Thomas Mortimer; after which the Rev. Dr. Redford, of Worcester, engaged in prayer.

The Chairman said—Fifteen years since, upon that platform, he had joined in laying the foundation of the British and Foreigh Temperance Society; and now, by the providence of God, he had been enabled to join in another great and good work, to lay a small stone in the erection of that grand edifice now constructed—the Evangelical Alliance. They had assembled to continue the meeting of the preceding day. Those who were present on that occasion knew what a blessed meeting it was: surely God himself was there, and would, he hoped, be with them on the present occasion.

Messengers from every sect and denomination of Christendom, had before met on the broad platform of the British and Foreign Bible Society. The now met in foreign countries, and had to act together. They found out the secret that men of different sects and denominations could act together. In the spheres of their labors abroad, necessity drove them together. They felt the value of Christian co-operation; they saw the necessity of evangelical union; they discovered that their strength lay in that union; they began to meet and pray together; and they also began and continued to love one another.

Well; the Evangelical Association was formed, and was now before them. It was composed of men of every sect and denomination; and, what was of more importance than numbers of zeal, they were all, like the holy men on the day of pentecost, "of one mind, and of one accord." Could this blessed result be accounted for on any mere human principle? Assuredly God was in this movement. The association now took its place beside the other great religious societies. Its basis was "the faith once delivered to the saints-" its creed, the Bible; its bond love; and its motto, "Christian unity and Christian liberty—unity in essentials, and liberty in circumstantials." In conclusion, he called upon them to pray for its prosperity.

The Rev. Dr. Alder, who announced the speakers, read the first topic, as follows:—

"Topic 1.—That the Alliance is not to be considered as an alliance of denominations, or branches of the Church, but of individual Christians, each acting on his own responsibility.

"That in this Alliance it is distinctly declared, that no compromise of the views of any member, or sanction of those of others, on the points wherein they differ, is either required or expected; but that all are held as free as before to maintain and advocate their religous convictions with due forbearance and brotherly love."

The Rev. J. Jordon, vicar of Enstone, Oxfordshire, wished, first of all, to express his great interest and joy in the work in which they were engaged, which he felt well persuaded was the work of God He was well persuaded that the work of Christ was going on among them, and that for the first time in the era of the Church's existence, they were about to carry out fully and faithfully the principles which Christ had taught. There was one institution which had his deepest affection; that institution was the British and Foreign Bible Society; and he loved it for two reasons. First, on account of its great object, namely the upholding, in simplicity and integrity, the written word of God, and resting upon it as the one rule of faith; and, secondly, because it united all of every denomination who were willing to come forward and join in that work. But sometimes he had been pained to see that there did not exist that complete union which their Alliance now presented. He had mounted the platform, and found the clergy of the Church of England ranged on one side of the chairman, and those of the dissenting Churches on the other, having more the appearance of an armed truce than a Christian Alliance. But their Alliance was of a purer and more entire character.

The Rev. Dr. Peck, of New York, said he took it for granted that the Evangelical Alliance was designed to confer permanent benefits upon the Church and upon the world, and consequently was designed to be permanent in its organization and action. As things not clearly defined and not well understood very soon perish, the contrivers of this system of Christian union had proceeded to lay down its principles and mode of action; and so full were the definitions that he who ran might read and understand them, so complete and perfect that it would be very difficult for any who investigated them properly to say that there was mysticism about them—or doubt couched under them—or that there was a design somewhere to entrap the ignorant and the unwary; but the whole stood out clear and defined to the gaze of the world. That institution was not be like the blaze and flare of a meteor which expired and left dense darkness behind, but, like the sun, would continue to shine for ever and ever, or at least as long as public opinion remained in the same state as at present.

Who would think of denominating the discussions of that society controversies; and if all controversies were carried on in the same spirit, they would be a benefit instead of an evil to the Church and to the world. Perish the Gregorian and Arminian controversy, perish the Episcopalian and Presbyterian controversy, perish the Baptist and Pœdobaptist controversy. Perish every controversy, and "let all the people say, Amen."

The Rev. Apolphe Monod, of Montauban, in France, said:—The Alliance was not an alliance of denominations, it was a bringing together of denominations, and not only of denominations but he might say of nations. He would have them remember the delightful enumeration which his reverend friend Mr. Bickersteth gave the previous day of the many nations from which Christian men had on this solemn occasion collected.

From this coming together of several Protestant nations he hoped great religious good would result; as the members of a family well brought up, whose different offices were performed in harmony, so would that Alliance go on the better for the difference of the nations constituting it. Each nation had in the plan of God its part; its special mission, with which its special tone of mind and history were connected. It was generally acknowledged that the character of the English mind was wonderfully practical; that the tone of the American mind was very powerful: that the German mind was known for its depth of reasoning and sense, and largeness of mind, which enabled them to consider both sides of a question; and if he were not a Frenchman, he might perhaps mention something for which the French mind was celebrated. They were calculated to do each other good, but so long as they kept at distance from each other, they deprived themselves of the means of helping, of warning, and in fact of completing each other. If England had been left alone in this work, it might have been too practical; if America, too dogmatical; if Germany, too argumentative; and if France, he knew not what. But, while he wished to give credit to all nations, he must in justice say, that without England that Alliance never would have existed. He did not say so because he was in England, but because he believed it; it required their peculiar tone of mind their geographical situation—and a collection of many circumstances: and if they had not formed it, he did not know any other nation who could have done so. He acknowledged, with feelings of thankfulness, how much the French brethren owed to Anglo-American prayers, Anglo-American efforts, and he might say Anglo-American money.

The Rev. Dr. Alder then read the next topic:

"Topic II.—That it is not contemplated that this Alliance should assume or aim at the character of a new ecclesiastical organization, claiming and exercising the functions of a Christian Church. Its simple and comprehensive object, it is strongly felt, may be successfully promoted without interfering with, or disturbing the order of, any branch of the Christian Church to which its members may respectively belong."

The Rev. J. H. Stewart, Rector of Linkfield, Surrey said: He trusted this Alliance would bring hearer the time when they should know no sect or party, but should all attend to the word of the Lord, who had said, "Look unto me, and be ye saved; I am God, and there is none else, and beside me there is no Savior." When he looked around him, and thought upon what he had heard, he could not but think that the Lord had answered his prayers; but they were but the mere instruments in the cause, and to the Lord be all the praise. "Not unto us, O Lord, not unto us, but unto thy name give the glory, for thy name's sake." He was particularly happy in this meeting, for the Evangelical Alliance was one which in his most sober moments he had carefully looked into. His love for this society was increased from its giving him liberty to be as much a Churchman as ever; he did not lose any attachment to the Church from being a member of that Alliance, but he felt his heart drawn out in love to every one who loved Jesus Christ.

The Rev. Dr. Schmuker, of New York, said—The interest manifested by this large concourse of immortal minds in the establishment of our great Evangelical Alliance, affords in itself demonstrative evidence of the fact that there is in the Christian Church an extensive impression of the evils of schism, and of the difficulties which have resulted from the want of that harmony to which this resolution refers. It is, a delightful feature of this Alliance—which has already been happily styled a star of no ordinary magnitude—that it is to enter into the constellation of great stars of benevolent and Christian institutions, and to harmonize with them all in its operations. This Alliance has already been styled a "Peace Society," because it will eventually terminate the wars which have raged between the nations; but may I not, with greater aptitude, style it the Peace Society of the Church—because it will put an end to the wars of an intestine character which have rent the Church itself. It is only by first accomplishing this interesting and glorious purpose, that an end can ever be put to wars between the nations of the world; for as long as Christians, or professed Christians, continue to war among themselves, their admonitions will never have much influence in persuading the nations of the earth not to fight with each other. What can be more delightful than the idea that this Alliance will bring about that glorious period which angels from heaven have announced to men upon earth! When the angelic choir announced the incarnation of the blessed Savior to the shepherds in the plain, having first ascribed "Glory to God in the highest," as the grand law of the administration of his moral government, they announced this message to the world, "Peace upon earth and good will toward men." This good will toward men was the grand object of the incarnation of the Son of man, who came to reconcile man to his offended God. This peace is the grand object of the Church itself, and of the Christian ministry, which aims, by the conversion of sinners to restore them to the favor and peace of God.

The Rev. Dr. Urwick, independent minister of Dublin, said, when he first heard of the project which had terminated in what had been justly termed a glorious Evangelical Alliance, strange as it might appear, there came up a thought about the science of Phrenology. He thought within himself, as to the general aspect of the cranium, or brain within it, of the individual with whom the project originated; and the first idea was, that he had an Alpine prominence of "ideality," and yet there must be connected with it a little less prominence of "benevolence," with a due share of "veneration," and undeniably "conscientiousness" in no small degree. "Ideality"—for never had appeared, apart from the transcendent doctrine of the project for converting and saving the perishing souls of the heathen world, an idea more magnificent and beautiful than the one contemplated by the Evangelical Alliance in the recognition and exhibition of the unity of the Protestant Church; and the very mention of its object must tell that it required an equal measure of "benevolence;" for the very character and strong majesty of their plan was love. Look into the details of the plan, and they would discover "veneration," for their design was to exalt and magnify His claims and glory, who was over all "God blessed for ever. And with regard to "conscientiousness," there was provision for the most scrupulous—he was going to say, the most morbid—spirit in connection with his sectarian peculiarities, for they advocated union, Christian union, without the compromise of one truth or duty.

It had struck him that there was something po-culiar in the localities in which their meetings had been held. Their first conference was held in a large room in Liverpool, and the name of it was not inappropriate; it was called the "Medical Hall." They came to contribute to heal all dissentions of the Church. The next great meeting —greater even than the present—was held at the "Free Trade Hall," in Manchester. He knew not what their various opinions might be on the subject of free trade in a political sense; but, in the Alliance, there was provision for free trade in truth and piety, and no monopoly whatever. At length, in the course of Providence, they were brought to the Freemasons' Hall. And it was said in Ireland that Christianity was the best freemasonry in the world; and what had they done? They had completed the basis of the Evangelical Alliance, and laid down the foundation of a fraternity; he knew not what were the peculiarities or secrets of freemasonry—but he would say, a fraternization better than that. There was also something peculiar in the time. When did they complete the basis of the Evangelical Alliance? On the 24th of August, 1846. That day was noted; some of them might not know the sanctity of that day, but the basis of their Evangelical Alliance was settled on the feast of St. Bartholomew. When they took up the history of the Church, and turned to the 24 h of August, and found marked against it the feast of Bartholomew, and the massacre of the Huguenots, let them mark against it the formation of the Evangelical Alliance; and when they found mention of the secession of 2,000 Nonconformists from the Church of England on another St. Bartholomew day, let them mark on the opposite page to that, the formation of the Evangelical Alliance; and thenceforward let Bartholomew day be marked and memorable in the annals of the Church, not so much for the massacre of the Huguenots, nor for the exclusion of the Nonconformists, but let it be marked and glorious as the day of the formation of that Alliance.

Here a hymn, "Come, Holy Spirit," was given out by the Rev. Thomas Waugh, of Bandon Ireland.

The third topic was as follows:—

"Topic III.—That while the formation of this Alliance is regarded as an important step toward the increase of Christian Union, it is acknowledged as a duty incumbent on all its members carefully to abstain from pronouncing any uncharitable judgement upon those who do not feel themselves in a condition to give it their sanction."

The Rev. Dr. Patton, of New York, minister of the Presbyterian Church, said—he had heard a good deal about the Evangelical Alliance, and all he had heard was in its favor. He had heard, however, one objection, and it was a remarkable one—an objection which ought to command some attention, namely, that the members of the Evangelical Alliance were all men of one idea. There was a great deal in being pointed at and called men of one idea; but he did not think it so bad as some men, who shrugged up their shoulders and considered it enough to condemn any cause. The most eminent and wisest men in history were exactly men of that sort: they were all men of one idea all through their life, they were governed by that idea, and, through that circumstance alone, they were unable to accomplish a great deal of good for this world. Take, for instance the case of St. Paul; that man of one idea went right on, pausing at nothing, but urging his one idea forward, and blessed be God, he got a great many to think like him. Howard also got smitten with one idea; he would enter the dungeons of the prison, and draw into the light of day the horrible things therein concealed, and he went down to his grave with that one idea. He did not see, therefore, that those men were so much to be dreaded unless it were that they had got a wrong idea, when the shortest way of curing them was to put a strait jacket upon them; but if a man had got a right idea, and a benevolent one, the best course was to give him free liberty, and let him enjoy every opportunity to carry it out. There was a prodigious power in one idea; no man, however large his cranium, could use up a single idea; it took a generation of men to use up a single idea; and a good thought would not be used up by a thousand; for every year the brighter and bigger it would get; and this one idea system had done a great deal for Evangelical Alliance. What had that one idea done in steam; it was only a little baby.—mighty strong he must admit—it hardly got out of its long clothes—but it was making mighty strides all over the world. Then look at the electric magnetic influence; that was as yet only a sparkling in the scientific world, and yet communication was held with distant parts in no time for it could not be measured. Some had suggested plans to carry wires across the Atlantic; but the Evangelical Alliance was the very thing; no sooner did they touch the wires here than it got over to America. But he must tell them that it went by the throne of God and from thence was spread all over the world; the electric influence of prayer and love passed up those wires to the throne of God and from thence the spiritual electricity came down and was distributed through every nation and clime. He found that they had come together with one idea, as one idea could not be evaded provided it was big enough to include everybody who loved the Lord; an idea big enough to fill his heart so full that it overflowed and ran into the nerves of his arm, and caused him to grasp his brother by the hand, and shake, and shake because he could not help it. They were not to be looked at with alarm, for their idea was that they should love one another; the simplest and most beautiful idea; and it was only wonderful that they should never have thought of it before. The Alliance, already numbering 1,255 members, would go on and on, until it should include the entire population of the globe, and then it would be a one idea indeed. They should all be of one mind and "ascribe glory, and honor, and praise, and dominion, and power, to Him that sitteth upon the Throne, and to the Lamb forever;" and with that idea he would be content to spend his lifetime.

Professor Laharpe, of Geneva, had heard, with great interest, what had just fallen from Dr. Patton; but the one idea was not all; it required a certain proportion of sustaining power proportionate to the course it had to run. They were now getting to the course which the Alliance would have to pursue—they were getting the guage of the rails on which it had to run. He could bless God for what the Alliance had done; but at the same time they must keep in mind, that what it had done was but a beginning, and what had been done had been done in secret and within walls; but it must now be published on the housetops, and that could be done most successfully and most effectually in the spirit of that topic. The Alliance was not a dead thing, a thing of times past; nor of the time present, but of time future. In conclusion the reverend speaker alluded to a union which at present existed in Geneva between the different sects, and expatiated on the blessedness of feeling which those who were fewin number enjoyed when they could hold forth the hand of fellowship to one another and fight the battles of Christ in unity.

The Rev. J. A. James said—Blessed are my eyes, for they see, and my ears, for they hear, what many kings, and prophets, and wise men desired to see and hear, and were not permitted!—what in the highest elevation of my hope, in the strongest exercise of my faith, and the most fervent breathing of my devotion, I never expected to live to see and hear. For reasons, Mr. Chairman, which are known to some, no heart in this assembly can be supposed to beat with a stronger, warmer rapture over this glorious scene than does the heart of the speaker who now addresses you. Little could it have been imagined when, a few years ago, we ventured to call the attention of the Christian world to this subject, that so soon more—far more—than we predicted would be accomplished. Here, however, it is; and I have been thinking, sir, of the language of that venerable Israelite of whom St. Luke speaks, who waited for the consolation of Israel, and who when his aged eyes lighted on the Infant Savior, who smiled in his arms, thought he had seen glory enough for one world, and exclaimed, "Lord, now lettest thou thy servant depart in peace, for mine eyes have seen thy salvation." If it were not for the hope of living to carry on this great and glorious movement, who of us that has had any thing to do with it, would not seem to have lived for purpose enough, and could not be content to go to that world where the results of all that we are doing are at length to be gathered in. Sir, one of the speakers who preceded me may well talk of one idea; for the splendid idea furnished by this platform, by the area before me, and by the object which has called us together, may, to a considerable extent, be said to have been his own one idea; for though it is known that the subject of a Christian Alliance—not, perhaps, under that name, but under the more generic title of Christian Union—has long been talked in various parts of this kingdom and of the world, yet it was the letter our brother Patton sent across the Atlantic that formed the nucleus round which all these glorious conceptions have clustered and brightened in the scene which God in his infinite mercy has presented to this age, to this country, and to the whole world. My brother Patton, let me take you by the hand as our fellow-laborer, (the reverend gentleman here turned round and shook hands with Dr Patton, amid the loud plaudits of the meeting,) and let England and America now stand thus socially united, as I trust they will ever continue to be. God bless you, my brother; and may he prosper all your labors in your own land to carry forward this glorious work. It was said, Mr. Chairman, by one of the kings of France, after he had made an advantageous treaty with Spain, "The Pyrenees are no more;" and, looking round upon this platform, and seeing how many of my American brethren are here, I say, "The great Atlantic is no more," and we seem to have realized the vision of the Apocalypse, "There shall be no more sea." We must now all of us be Alliance men. We stand committed—we stand pledged—before God, our country, each other, and the world, to be men of love. We have collected round the waters of charity, and have washed the name "sectarian" from our brow; we have placed the name of "Christian" there; we have abjured bigotry; we have espoused and adopted love; and now let us not falsify our pledges, or break our vows, but let the world see that we are in earnest in what we did when we formed the Evangelical Alliance. Let us go here and there as so many forms of Christian charity, and convince the world that there is a reality in the name—that heaven is not its only residence, but that it has come down to dwell with man upon the earth. We will catch from the page of history what has yet been an aphorism to decorate or garnish a speech; we will place it on our banners; it is our own motto; it seems in a spirit of prophecy to have been made on purpose for us; "In fundamentals, unity: in circumstantials, liberty; in all things, charity."

The fourth topic was—

"Topic IV.—That the members of this Alliance earnestly and affectionately recommend to each other in their own conduct, and particularly in their own use of the press, carefully to abstain from and put away all bitterness, and wrath, and anger, and clamor, and evil speaking, with all malice; and in all things in which they may yet differ from each other, to be kind, tender-hearted, forbearing one another in love, forgiving one another, even as God, for Christ's sake, hath forgiven them; in every thing seeking to be followers of God, as dear children, and to walk in love, as Christ also has loved them."

The Rev. Dr. Wardlaw, of Glasgow, said—He blessed God for having been pleased to spare his life to that hour. Within the last twelve months, and more especially within the last few days, he had seen more of that which his heart has been so long sighing to see than his unbelieving spirit would allow him to think he should ever see. He was not too young to look back on the period of religious history in the northern part of the country, when Christians of various denominations regarded each other with a painful degree of distrust and jealousy, amounting almost to what Milton so powerfully describes in the line—

"Eyeing askance, with jealous leer malign."

He rejoiced in the change. Christians could now meet in the bands of union, could unite as one body and one spirit; could rest on "one hope of their calling; one Lord, one faith, one baptism, one Father and God of all; who is with all above all, and in them all." They felt it to be a happy change; he pitied the man who stinted his Christian affection, for he who stinted his love, stinted his own happiness; and, in increasing their love to the brethren, they were increasing their own spiritual blessedness. There were two or three truths which he wished to lay before them, and the first was that some persons considered—and he had heard many ingenious arguments in favor of the position—that there were really benefits arising from denominational divisions of the Church of God; but he must say that he could not enter into that feeling, for no such idea could be held with true Scriptural principles. There were no such denominational divisions at the first, and that was the happiest state of the Church, and that was what they ought to seek to enjoy. Besides, there was a right and a wrong in every thing, and there to say that it was beneficial that there should be varieties of sentiments to divide the Church, was like saying it was better that some should be wrong than all should be right. Again, it was not at all necessary to their union that they should think lightly of the differences which existed: he did not think that some of the differences were unimportant, he considered some of them very important, but on the ground on which the Alliance stood was the great truth, and more important than all. They were united on the great truths of the faith which they all held, and were not kept asunder by their minor differences.

The Rev. Edward Frazer of Jamaica, Wesleyan missionary, briefly sustained the topic.

The proceedings then terminated with a hymn, and the Rev. Dr. Bunting pronounced the benediction.

FITNESS FOR MARRIED LIFE.

To Married life, all young women are tending, at least in expectation. A fitness to fulfill the peculiar duties of married life should compose a part of your present education. I mention this subject, not to ponder to a foolish affectation. I mention it as a minister of God. I find that it is made my duty to do so in the Bible. The institution of marriage is of God.—So should it be regarded. Most young women, I suppose, expect to be married, and will be very much disappointed if they are not. I regard the solemnization of marriage as one of the most momentuous events that can transpire. Not even the burial of the dead has any greater solemnity or impressiveness to my mind. And it deserves a more calm and serious and thoughful consideration than it generally receives. You are not to rush into its obligation as a horse rusheth into battle. You are to regard marriage as the great event in your life, and prepare for it accordingly. All other things and all other events are lost in this. Hear me, then, I entreat you, upon this matter.

You have already decided in your mind what you would regard as indispensable in a husband: are you what a wife should be? you wish to be happy in married life: are you qualified to make others so?—Have you those qualifications and those accomplishments, and that fitness which will adorn your fireside and induce your husband to praise your virtues? In the opinion of many, all that is requisite to enter the state in which so much of the good and evil of life is to be gathered, is to be familiar with some of the lighter and more showy attractions of life: To talk a little French, perform well on the piano, be acquainted with the last novel, know the shade of the silk and the fancy of Victoria, or at the Tuileries, is the fulness of preparation, I ask you, as rational beings, will such acquisitions alone make home happy? Will they aid you in the new and strange duties of your household? Those duties, at best will try your disposition; and if you know them not, confusion, mortification, regret and tears will overwhelm, but not relieve you. So are the more useful, than will the brilliant be a garland of grace about your person. And those showy accomplishments, to gain which thousands have been expended, fortunes sacrificed, and years of the most precious portion of life consumed, fade in a day before the real duties of life.—And those educated in ignorance of what is before them, are victims to excessive cruelty. Through a mistaken kindness, daughters are doomed to a bondage the most servile. They become a prey to the rapacity of servants, exposed to their impertinence, and dependent upon their caprice. The drudgery of domestic life need not be done. To other hands the absolute toil may be committed: but every young woman should know how to act and what to do. A commodore of a ship of war need not load or discharge his guns but he should know how to direct. In the storm he need not stand at the helm, but he should understand navigation, and be able to take an observation. He need not, in the gale, climb to the topmast but he ought to know the ropes in the ship, and be able to give the right word, and direct others in their toil.

I cannot resist the conclusion that the domestic education of our females is wrong. The evils that flow from the system now prevalent, may be learned from those who suffer the most from it. Your acquaintances who are settled in life can tell you, that they find little time to paint or embroider: the piano is seldom opened; and while many of them are chained down by a despotism they cannot control, such will assure you, that had they, in early life, given more attention to those duties which they are now called upon to perform in domestiic life, duties, which in importance increase year by year—they would have been far happier as wives, and as mothers better qualified. The young woman who would blush to have it known tha she is at the head of her household, and has ability to direct all its concerns, mistakes the true dignity of her sex; and throws from her that which will secure to her a commanding influence.—Rev. M. H. Smith.

THE NEW PLANET.

Since the announcement, some time ago, of M. Le. Verrier, a French Astronomer, that the singular motions of the planet Uranus could be accounted for only on the supposition of the existence of a hitherto undiscovered planet in the solar system, the attention of European Astronomers has been directed to the subject; and "the new planet has actually been discovered by the telescope at Berlin. Dr. Galle, on the 24th of September, found a star not laid down in any charts, in the precise place indicated by the French Mathematician."

"The star is of the 8.h magnitude, and even a disc seems to be precapible; but the discovery was only rendered possible by the precision of the map employed. The observed places are—

	Berlin, m. s. t.	AR—	Dec.
Sept.	23d, 12th. 0m. 15s.	328° 19m. 16s.	13° 24m. 8s. S.
	24th, 8 54 41	328 18 14	13 24 30 S.

"For some time to come it may be observed upon the meridian.

"This planet is probably about twice the distance of Uranus from the sun.

"The Boston Courier, which also refers to this discovery at Berlin, says that the planet was probably seen on Wednesday evening at the Cambridge Observatory. A star of the 8th magnitude was seen, which is not in the most excellent maps, and which is in the very place in which the planet should be found. Another night will be needed to test this observation. Its right ascension at 9 o'clock was 21h, 51m. and 33s. and its declination was 13° 32m. S."

It appears from the following communication of Prof. Mitchell, that he has also made the same discovery.

Le Verrier's New Planet.

Cincinnati Observatory, 29th Oct., ,46.

"To the Editor of the Atlas—Sir: I received to-day intelligence of the discovery of this most interesting object, and waited a fit hour for observation, with no little anxiety, to turn the full power of the Great Refractor upon it.

"At 6 o'clock and 10 minutes P. M., I took my place at the finder and my assistant at the large instrument, and the third star brought into the field of view, was instantly recognized as the planet by its beautiful disc, clear, sharp and well defined. I have only time to give the results of 12 measures for diameter with the feler micrometer, made with a full illumination of the field of view and within a short distance of the moon.

"The mean of all the measures makes the diameter a little more than 2 seconds; showing the absolute diameter of the planet, in case we admit it to be twice as remote as Herschel, to be above 46,000 miles. In color the planet resembles Herschel, only the tint of blue is a little deeper.

WESTERN RECORDER.

PUTNAM, OHIO.

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 14, 1846.

THANKSGIVING.

We are gratified that an unusual attention is being awakened up in many of the States of the Union, to the public observance of a day of Thanksgiving. It is interesting also to observe that a remarkable uniformity has occurred in the designation of the day by many States. The 26th inst. the day fixed upon by the Governor of Ohio, has also been appointed for the observance in twelve other States, viz. New Hampshire, Massachusetts, Vermont, Rhode Island, Connecticut, New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Maryland, Michigan, Indiana and Kentucky. Georgia and South Carolina appointed Nov. 5, and the State of Maine, Dec. 3d.

We notice that many newspapers are recommending the appointment, by the President, of a general Thanksgiving throughout the Union. We should be happy to see this arrangement adopted, and pursued in all future times. But for the present, we think that a national Repentance is more essentially called for, and that the appointment of a day of national Humiliation would be more appropriate. We think that the state of the times requires that all who fear God should devoutly call upon his name, that his righteous judgments may be averted and his favor conciliated.

CINCINNATI STATION.

Br. J. Dalbey, the Superintendent, in a business letter, observes, "We are still too lifeless as a church, but I think in some respects there is a decided improvement, within the last few weeks. Our prayer meetings on Sabbath evenings after preaching, are becoming quite interesting. Also on Friday evenings. Some deaths have occurred here amongst your old friends since your visit. Old sister Mack, the mother of Sister E. Hall, and sister Conklin, wife of Br. Geo. Conklin, are among the number. You will be glad to learn that— —has joined the church, You will rejoice to see the son following the example, and filling the place of his departed pious father." Certainly.

Shall we not have a biographical sketch of Mother Mack? She was a remarkable person. She was more than one hundred years of age—yet retained in an extraordinary degree her mental and physical powers up to the last time we saw her, a few months ago. So vigorous was she as to endure repeatedly a journey across the mountains to and from Baltimore, when in age almost a century. Long has she, we trust, been ripening for glory, and doubtless now has she been gathered into the garner of the Lord. May her numerous posterity, pursue her pious steps, and be heirs with her of the heavenly kingdom.

Sister Conklin, too, is gone! We knew her long, and we knew her well. She was one of the companions of our childhood. And we always admired her agreeable, inoffensive, benevolent disposition. Furthermore, we trust she was a sincere and faithful Christian. If faults she had, they were beyond our ken to discover them. We had the satisfaction to visit her in September last, during her last illness, and perhaps quite shortly before her decease. We found her submissive to her afflictions, with christian resignation. She alluded with composure to her approaching dissolution, and expressed a degree of confidence in her Savior. May her surviving companion, and children, and parents and other relatives be sustained in this bereavement, and be constrained to follow Sarah as she followed Christ.

Emancipation.—On our fourth page will be found the first number of a short series of articles, on the results of emancipation in the West Indies, which we copy from the Pittsburgh Gazette. They are written by Rev. Mr. Scott, of the Associate Presbyterian Church, who was for some time a missionary in the island of Trinidad. As he had the best possible means of acquiring correct information, and as he is a respectable and responsible citizen of Pittsburgh, his statements may be considered reliable. Not only will his papers be found to present important facts, and clear reasonings, but we trust they will be found so interesting as to repay a perusal. We are glad that the public mind is not now so unreasonably excitable upon the subject of emancipation, as was the case a few years since. Community generally, are now more willing to read, hear—and investigate truth even upon this subject. We think an attentive perusal of the articles of Mr. Scott, will relieve the minds of those who have apprehended serious difficulties, and dangers to accrue from the abolition of slavery. Just read the articles of Mr. Scott. They are in six numbers, and we expect to give them, one at a time.

Evangelical Alliance.—The reports of the speeches and proceedings of this important body would fill several entire numbers of our paper. We have therefore greatly to abridge the several addresses. They are of thrilling interest, and we are delighted with their perusal, whilst reading for the purpose of abridging.

Rail Road Accident.—We regret to learn by the Ohio State Journal, that an accident occurred on the Little Miami Rail Road, on Monday or Tuesday last, by which the engineer of the locomotive was instantly killed. No further particulars have yet reached us.

Burnt to Death.—A Mrs. Cook, perished in the flames with her dwelling, at Lordstown, Trumbull Co. in the absence of her hutband, on the 31st ult. It is said that Mrs. C. got out her children, and returned for a pocket book, and other valuables but was not able again to escape.—Dreadful.

☞We are requested to state that the sale of property of Henry Gray deceased, is deferred till Dec. 25th.

The Lebanon Secession.

Enquiries have repeatedly been expressed to us. What were the circumstances which led to the secession at Lebanon? Letters from Brs. Rose and Dalbey have been published in our paper, giving the organization and progress of the new M. P. Church in that place, but what occasioned the separation from the M. E. Church, we believe, has not been stated. Indeed we were gratified that the brethren who wrote, made no uncourteous allusions to the M. E. Church, but one of them remarked that the new society at L. seemed quite 'free from animosity towards the church from which they had seceded.' A brief statement may be satisfactory to enquirers. Some 2 or 3 hours after the rise of the Ohio Conference, at Springfield, a messenger from Lebanon arrived, with a petition from a meeting of members of the M. E. Church in that place for a minister to come and organize them into a Methodist Protestant Society. An arrangement for this was immediately effected through the President. We saw and conversed with the Br. from L. and from him understood that a large portion of the church there had for some time past felt themselves aggrieved with the administration of their minister in exercising however, only legal authority, in displacing and appointing leaders, with or without the approbation of the society &c. A petition was sent to the last O. An. Conference M. E. C. that another minister might be sent to Lebanon. The petition was responded to, by returning the same minister, to whom objections had been made. This circumstance fully opened the eyes of the Lebanon friends convincing them, that the laity ought to have some voice in the deliberations and acts of ecclesiastical bodies. But they knew that this privilege was not enjoyed in the M. E. Church, whilst it was a principle embraced in the very constitution of the M. P. Church. The Annual and General Conferences of the former being composed of ministers alone, whilst in the latter church, those conferences are composed of an equal number of ministers and laymen. The result was that rising of 100 members of the M. E. Church at L. seceded and were organized as a society of the M. P. Church. We make this statement in the kindest feeling towards our brethren of the M. E. Church. We have rejoiced, yea, and will rejoice in the increasing good will, and good understanding which exists in so good a degree between the two branches. We speak no 'evil of ministers.' We love the men, the brethren of the M. E. Church, with warm hearts, fervently. It is but the system, to which we object. We very much appreciate the candid and friendly allusion made to this Lebanon affair, in the last number of the W. C. Advocate. The Editor expresses decided good will towards the M. P. Church, the new society in L. especially, and speaks well of its minister. But we were somewhat amused with his ascribing the secession in whole or in part to the agency of certain adherents to the M. E. Church, South. Lebanon has been for many years the residence of Bishop Soule, until he recently removed to Nashville, Tenn. The son in law of the bishop, Rev. J. Hill, was recently stationed there, but at the Kentucky Conference, he adhered South, and was stationed at Covington, Ky. The Advocate represents that Br. H. and his father in law, 'headed the Lebanon schism;' that the former took an active part in organizing the M. P. Church in Lebanon'—that he publicly invited and urged the members of the M. E. Church to leave their own church' &c. Well, we Methodist Protestants, never thought that we should have the old Senior Bishop to aid us in advancing the interests of our cause. And Br. Hill, too, we must be under a compliment to him likewise, for his services. We have heretofore esteemed him a very useful and good man. But it appears that even good men err. We had rather that Br. H. had himself joined the M. P. Church, than to have gone South.

Religious Telescope.—United Brethren.—Literary Institution.—The Religious Telescope is a weekly religious paper in quarto form, published at Circleville, O. for the Church of the United Brethren in Christ, and edited by Rev. David Edwards. It is a useful religious paper, and we are pleased to have added it lately to our list of exchanges.

We observe by the last number of the Telescope that the Scioto Conference of the Brethren at its recent session made arrangements to purchase the Blendon Seminary. It is stated that 'a delegation from the M. E. Church was sent to the Conference to make an offer of the institution. The whole property consisting of eight acres of land, two spacious buildings, a library of 300 volumns, and other aparatus, is all offered for thirteen hundred dollars." It is situated at Westerville, Franklin Co. O, 11 miles north from Columbus. Who would not purchase that property? We know the location. It is a pleasant, healthful place. That's a rare chance, Br. Telescope. Tell the Brethren, for their credit's sake, not to let slip the opportunity. May we not apprehend that Rev. E. Smith's talk about the 'low standard of ministerial qualification among the brethren' will prompt them to enter the more spiritedly into this literary enterprise! We trust the 'Brethren' will succeed well in it. They certainly ought to buy that property, and establish an institution, or let us know soon, and we think we could soon find a purchaser.

Dr. L. Beecher.—The Watchman of the Valley states that the honored President of Lane Seminary, after encountering the perils of the deep, on board the Great Western, on his return from the World's Convention, has reached home in safety, and resumed his labors with invigorated health. After his return, he preached a discourse in the 2d Presbyterian Church, which was filled to overflowing. He spoke of the formation of the Evangelical Alliance as one of the most important and encouraging events of the present day. "He referred to the wonderful manifestations of God's presence in the Convention,—and spoke with enthusiastic confidence of the results of this great movement."

WHERE'S THE GENEALOGY.

A friend a great way off, has sent us the following selection, cut from some newspaper, we cannot discern what one. Wonder if he does'nt think that the Editor of the Western Recorder would stand some chance in coming in for a share of the Lord Townley estate? Our birth place was near to that same Yarmouth, and right among the the family of the Chases. Had we some good man living, not near half so old as Methuselah, he might settle the question respecting our ancestry.

Great Fortunes—Heirs Wanted.—Col. Francis Townley left England on account of political troubles and took up his residence in France. He was of a respectable family. In 1745, he returned to England with the Pretender, Prince Charles Edward, and received the appointment of Colonel of the Manchester Regiment. He was taken prisoner at Carlisle, was tried and convicted of treason, and, with 18 others, chiefly officers of his regiment, was executed in London, and in 1746, his estates were confiscated to the crown. The estates so confiscated, are said now to be worth fifty two million pounds sterling, 260 millions of dollars.

Efforts have been made for several years to reverse this act of confiscation, and restore this immense estate to the heirs of Townley—improperly called Lord Townley.

The Yarmouth Register, speaking of this property and the heirs, says:

Lord Townley's Estate.—Since last week we have obtained some additional information respecting Lord Townley's estate, and the heirs thereof in this country. It is said that the value of the estate is fifty two millions of pounds, the title to which has for many years been litigated in the High Court of Chancery, England. By a recent decree of that court, it is adjudged that three quarters of Lord Townley's immense estates belong to the heirs of William, Thomas and Aquilla Chase, and notices have been issued and published in the English newspapers, to said heirs, to come in and produce their claims to the property. The other quarter of the estate, by the same decree, is adjudged to belong to a brother of William, Thomas and Aquilla, who remained in England.

"Relative to the heirs in this country, nothing very definite is yet known. The brothers came to Plymouth about the year 1629. Aquilla settled in Newburyport or vicinity; Thomas probably settled in Rhode Island; and it is known that William was one of the first settlers in this town, [Yarmouth.] He was poor, as appears from the fact that he mortgaged his house for £5. He died about the year 1669 and left two sons, William and Benjamin. William son of William, died Feb. 28, 1684. He probably lived at Crocker Neck, Harwich, where many of his descendants now reside. Of Benjamin, son of William the elder, we know nothing. His name we are unable to find on the town records of Yarmouth, and it is supposed that he removed when a young man to Swansey, Mass. On account of the imperfection of our town records it will be perhaps very difficult for all the heirs of the three brothers to obtain legal proof of their descent. A genealogy of the Chase family would now be a very convenient document, but it is doubtful whether any has been kept. Others besides those of the name of Chase are heirs. Many of the Bakers, Bassetts and other families will come in for a share. The heirs of William will be entitled to thirteen millions.

"It is certain that a large amount of property in England belongs to the heirs of William, Thomas and Aquilla Chase; it is certain that William settled in this town. In the course of a few weeks we hope to be able to publish from original documents a full and particular account of the whole matter; meantime, we would advise the descendants of William to examine their old deeds, wills and family records, and perhaps they may find some entry that may be useful to them."

"Since writing the above, we have been engaged in the examination of ancient records, and have come to the conclusion that John Chase, who was here in 1775, was son of either Aquilla or Thomas.

Quarterly Meeting, Putnam.—A quarterly meeting has just been held at the M. E. Church in this place. We had the pleasure of participating in its privileges, during part of the time, including the love feast on Monday evening. Very interesting and profitable seasons were enjoyed; Night meetings have been kept up through the week, at which, we are informed, several conversions have occurred. May great good be done. Br. Fee, the minister in charge, is a man of the right spirit, and will be useful. Br. Jemison too, the Presiding Elder, is a man of liberal disposition, and we have been gratified to make his acquaintance. He is recently from Missouri having declined to adhere South with the Missouri Conference. By the by, what goodly times have we fallen upon. It had been full eighteen years since we enjoyed the privilege of attending a love feast in the M. E. Church. "How good and pleasant a thing it is for brethren to dwell together in unity." The Evangelical Alliance will tend we trust to produce every where, among Christians an enlarged spirit of mutual toleration and co-operation in advancing the interests of Christ's kingdom.

Arrival of the Brittania.—Bicknell's Reporter brings us the first intelligence of the arrival of the great steamer at Boston, on Saturday last. She had a boisterous passage of 18 days from Liverpool. The Great Britain, was still ashore. The Cambria, with Mr. Bancroft, our Minister had arrived in safety. Famine and malignant diseases are said to be prevaleut in Ireland. The marriage of the Queen of Spain was lately solemnized. Flour has advanced one shilling a Liverpool, and cotton one farthing. The money market is in a depressed state. There has been boisterous weather on the coast of England. Storms of unparallelled violence have been very destructive, at sea.

More D. D's South.—The Masonic College Legrange, Ky. lately conferred upon our old friend Rev. M. M. Henkle, the honorary degree of D. D. Hope he will not fail to receive also "the honor that cometh from God only." What a wonderful set of Doctorates they are getting to in down south. How d'ye do, Dr. Henkle. Shou like to shake you by the hand.

Editorial Change.—Both the Ohio State Journal, and the Ohio Statesman have recently changed hands. The former Editors having withdrawn, the Journal is now conducted by W. B. Thrall Esq. whilst S. Medary, Esq. has resumed the charge of the Statesman.

"DEATHS DOINGS."

The Philadelphia Saturday Courier announces the death of John L. Webb, Esq. Member elect, to the Pennsylvania House of Representatives. He died at his residence in Smithfield on the 17th ult. only four days after his election.

The same paper states that Jonas Earle Esq. late of the New York State Canal Commissioners died recently at Syracuse, N. Y. in the 61st year of his age.

Also, Judge D. B. Talmadge, late of the supreme court of N. York, lately departed this life.

At Stamford, Conn. Judge S. W. Johnson died on the 25 h ult. while riding out in his carriage.

COMMODORE DECATUR.—Great ceremonies were held at Philadelphia, on the removal of the remains of the departed naval hero to their final resting place, St. Peter's Church yard.

"THE SACRED MELODEON."

This is an excellent selecton of revival hymns, complied by Rev. J. Dalbey Jr. and Rev. J. B. Feat, both itinerant ministers of the Ohio Conference, M. P. Church, and recently published at Cincinnati. A copy was furnished us at last conference by the publishers, and we should before now have given it some favorable notice, but that we desired also to announce that we had a supply for sale, but circumstances prevented their being furnished to us hitherto. The work is neatly executed, with fair type and paper, comprising 312 pages, 32 no. It embraces not only a good selection of hymns, but a number also, never before published. From our examination of it, we unhesitatingly say, we like it better than any book of Spiritual Songs with which we are acquainted. It embraces all the new spiritual songs in common use we can call up, from 'Mercy's free' to 'Will you go,' &c. The publishers are deserving of encouragement, and the work is well worthy of a liberal patronage. We are gratified to state that we expect in a few days to be furnished with a supply for sale at our office, either single, or by the dozen.

☞We have republished the short poem by our friend P. because of some typographical errors which occurred in the article before.

THE SLAVE CASE.

An excitement of much more than ordinary character has prevailed in this city, during the examination of a case, which we mentioned last week, of the arrest of a slave named Geo. Kirk, who secreted himself on board the brig Mobile, whilst lying at the wharf at Savannah, Geo., and was brought by her to this city.

It appears that after the arrival of the vessel at this port, the Cpatain attempted to confine the slave, in order to take him back and restore him to his owners. Some circumstances occurred betraying the fact, and exertions were at once made to effect his rescue. A habeas corpus was sued out, and he was brought before Judge Edmonds, who released him, as we learned and stated last week, upon the ground of an informality in the original proceedings, alledging that the Captain of the brig had no right to detain him in custody, but should have gone and entered his complaint to the Mayor, whose province it was to adjudicate the matter. The slave was accordingly discharged, and the subsequent events which occurred up to the time of his re-arrest, we have before detailed. After his re-arrest, another habeas corpus was taken out, and the case again came up before Judge Edmonds. After a proper hearing, and evidence had been submitted on both sides, His Honor discharged the slave again, when he was taken away by his philanthropic friends, who at once conveyed him beyond the reach of his pursuers.

There are some principles involved in this case which will excite more than an ordinary degree of attention. The laws of Georgia are, as they must necessarily be, very rigid in punishing offences such as the Captain of the brig will be deemed guilty. His absolute innocence in the case makes no difference whatever—the slave was brought away in his vessel, and as a consequence he becomes liable to the laws of that State. Upon his return to that State he can be arrested, fined a thousand dollars, and imprisoned two years. Under this impression, and with the conviction of his innocence, he makes an appeal to the laws of this State and is repulsed. What means of establishing his innocence has he but this? What course can he pursue to avoid the impending consequences of the slave's elopement? So far as his own immediate situation is concerned perhaps, he will find his motives properly regarded by the parties in Georgia who have the most interest in the matter, and thus be released from the unpleasant responsibilities which would otherwise attach to him.

A more important question will, we fear, grow out of the case than that involving the responsibility of the Captain of the brig. The State of Georgia will ask why a reqeisition from her authorities, when made for a criminal, may not be received and responded to by the authorities of this State, with the same respect which signalizes the reception of a similar process upon other States. And if one of our citizens—for instance, the Captain of this brig—should return and be averted under the laws of that State, for a crime of which the citizens of this State cannot deem him guilty, what a clamor will at once be raised! We plainly perceive that the end of this slave-case has not yet been reached.—N. Y. Sat. Emporium.

The late Dreadful Hurricane at Havana.

Our thanks are due to Capt Hart, of the Royal Mail Steamer Thames, for files of the Bermuda Royal Gazette to the 20th ult., from which we learn that a dereadful hurricane visited Havana on the 10th and 11th October.

The Thames was at Havana at the time, but fortunately, with three other vessels only, rode out the gale in safety. The sheers at the navy yard are blown. The wharves are torn up and much injured, and are covered with wrecked property. The town has suffered comparatively little, but the suburbs, especially the Cerro, Horcon, Colon, and the Lazaro, very much. In Regla also the damage done is frighful; in one house alone, of rather out of its ruins, were dug 11 corpses. What is the total number of lives lost is not yet known. The threatre Tacon has suffered a good deal. The theatre Principal is in ruins. At the heights of the hurricane the barometer was at 27, 74. In 1844 it was 28 42.

Vessels ashore or sunk.—Ten British merchant vessels; among them we notice the Agnes Jane, Richardson, (totally dismasted, fast ashore, stern stove in, larboard side do., has 250 boxes of sugar on board) NINETEEN AMERICAN SHIPS, BARQUES, BRIGS AND SCHOONERS, whose names are not given, thirty-three Spanish, two Russians, two Bremen, four Danish, two Belgium, one Dutch, four French, one Austrian and one Brazilian. The Regla ferry steamers and Mantanzas steamers are some sund, some ashore and some useless.

Ships of War.—French frigate Andromede, 20, Rear Admiral La Place, fast ashore. French corvette Blonde, 20, ashore, masts gone, capsized—lost. French steamer Tonnere, masts and funnel gone, and serious damage. Spanish brig Habanero, 20 Vice Admiral Ribera, safe and sound. Spanish brig Constitution, 10, totally lost—gone to pieces. Spanish brig Laborde, ashore. Spanish schooner Criolla, 1, wrecked—in pieces. Spanish schooner Habanera, ashore. Spanish schooner Polka, 1, wrecked, in pieces.

Sanish schooner Infanta, ashore. Spanish brigantine Tuaniba, wrecked—in pieces, foremast gone, bowshrit and bows knocked away. Spanish steamer Guadaloupe, ashore. Spanish brig Trueno, Quarentine hulk, ashore, totally lost.

THE HAVANA GALE.—The Courier of last evening has the following paragraph in relation to the subject: "It is the opinion of nautical men of judgment and experience, with whom we have conversed, that the late gale, or rather tornado, did not extend as far as the station of the squadron off Vera Cruz. It is believed that the great swell experienced off Brazos Santiago, which prevented the mails from being put on board the Galveston, was caused by that tornado—but very little wind was blowing where the steamer lay. If this be so, Com. Conner's ships were safe from all damage. We have learned more from Havana. Three French vessels of war lying in that harbor were very much injured, but it is not said they were positively lost. The American bark Madeline, Captain Shankland, from this port, was sunk in the harbor. We do not know whether she had discharged her cargo. The brig P. Soule, Captain Delvaille, arrived at Havana on the 14th inst., from this port, safe. The brig Titi, Capt. Brown, arrived there on the 8th from this port. Whether she was injured in the gale we are not informed. Our informant says that from thirty to fifty vessels were more or less injured. There is a mystery about this business, but the news we give has been in town since Thursday evening.—N. O. Picayune of 25th.

Five vessels were driven on shore at Barbadoes, and three rode out the storm. An English ship became a total wreck in an hour. At Dominca, two vessels broke from their moorings and drifted to sea with no one on board. A vessel and cargo from Halifax were lost. The Gale was partially felt at St. Thomas.—N. Y. Sun.

The Winchester Republican announces the death of Mr. John Grim, aged 94 years, a soldier of the revolution.

THE PROSPERITY OF PITTSBURGH, &c.—Another item going to show the immense business transacted in Pittsburgh in the amount of steamboat tonnage in port and arriving and departing daily. On Wednesday there were twenty four large steamers below the bridge, and four above it, during the day. Yesterday there was about as many. Their tonnage capacity cannot be short of eight thousand tons! This simple fact is evidence of the extent and value of the shipping interest of this port. We have seen as many as forty-two steamboats in port at one time. These do not include the new boats building, or boat undergoing repairs.

As to new steamers we have noticed thirteen underway at one time this spring. We cannot say exactly how many new boats have been built this year in this city, but we believe we have averaged one per week. An eastern journal alluding to this branch of business, humorously inquires "the price of steamboats at the Factory!"

The carrying trade to and from Pittsburgh is increasing with marvellous rapidity. The means to accommodate it have increased in the same ratio. It bids fair in time to become of prodigious magnitude. Every year opens up some new feeder to our trade. It was only last year that the Erie Extension Canal was fairly in operation. This year we have the Sandy and Beaver. Shortly the Alleghany River must be improved as the Manongahela now is.—P. Gaz.

MIRACULOUS ESCAPES.—on Saturday, the immense fly wheel at the Rolling Mill or Foundry below Mill Creek, flew to pieces, scattering the fragments in all directions, for the space of one hundred feet; one piece went over the canal a much greater distance; another piece went high in the air, and came down through the roof of a house, striking the stove, at which a woman was standing, demolishing it, & knocking a bucket out of her hand. The fly wheel was very large and in rapid motion when the accident occurred, and although the fragments of iron and wood flew in every direction, to the great danger of numerous persons, we are happy to state not one was injured. All were, of course, frightened.—Cin. Com.

OPENING OF THE SANDY AND BEAVER CANAL.—The celebration of this event took place as announced with great eclat, and without serious accident of any kind to mar the Pleasure of the trip. There is a good deal of business to do between New Lisbon and Glasgow, where the Canal debouches into the Ohio, but there is a want of Boats. The craft on all the Canals are very busily employed, and the amount of tonnage far short of what the trade pouring through them requires. In the spring a line of steamers will be formed between Pittsburgh and Glasgow. By that time the entire canal will be open, and Boats plenty. The quality of the work on it, its Locks, Dams, &c., is pronounced very superior by competent judges.—Pitts. Gaz.

STORM IN THE CHESAPEAKE.—The North easterly gales which prevailed throughout all of last week, with but slight intermissions, were very severe in the Bay, so as to cut off all communication between Baltimore and Norfolk from Tuesday evening until Saturday night.

At Norfolk the gale blew from sea most furiously, and the swell of water in the bay and harbor is said to have been very great. The papers, however, are silent on the subject, and from this we infer that the damage sustained in the lower part of the city, by the rise of the waters, could not have been so great as there was reason to fear.—Alexander Messenger.

GREAT FRESHET—DAMAGE TO PROPERTY.—The Baltimore papers of last week, contain long accounts of the great damage done to property in Maryland, by the heavy freshet caused by the last storm. We compile the following from the Clipper. The Catocin Whig, says:—

The Catocton overflowed its banks, and for some distance on each side swept every thing within reach—fences, trees, corn, wood, &c., were swept away in large quantities. Considerable damage was done in the village, particularly in the Western part. Many of the gardens were literally swept of their effects and lost; the cellars were filled overflowing.—Alexander Messenger.

Captain T. R. Linnard, of Philadelphia, U. S. Typographical Engineer, who has been superintending the works on the Raft above Alexandria, has been ordered to Monterey.

LADY BYRON SUNK.—This steamer left Pittsburgh on Thursday evening for St. Louis, heavily laden with iron. At the foot of Phillip's Island, seven miles below Beaver, she struck a rock and instantly sunk.

FIRE.—The Fouring Mill of Mr. Aaron Austin at Oxford was consumed by fire on Monday night of last week. About 5000 bushels of wheat was in store at the time of the fire, which was also destroyed. The loss is estimated at from $8,000 to $10,000.

SINGULAR ACCIDENT.—On Friday last Edward O Knowles, a boy of 12 years of age standing in the blacksmith shop of Stephen Tillsbury, South Boston, about 12 feet from the anvil where two men were forging, was struck in the thigh by a small piece of steel escaping from one of the sledge hammers.—The main artery was severed, and he bled to death in five minutes.

The voyage from New York to Halifax and back, has been made in the unprecedented travelling time of 4 days and 7 hours.

At the last dates from New Orleans, water was so very scarce in the Faubourg Freme, that 50 cents a barrel was demanded for it.

The trial of Albert J. Tirrel, for arson, at the time of the murder of Mrs. Bickford, will take place in January next.

Long Bridge over the Potomac, at Washington, was injured by the late freshet to the extent of about 150 feet carried away. It is impassable. A breach was also made in the Washington canal.

We are informed, says the Boston Transcript, that the manufacture of railroad iron is becoming a very important branch of labor in our vicinity. At the foundry on the Mildam, one day last week, 243 rails, or forty-two tons, were turned out in twenty-four hours

FEMALE COURAGE.—A servant girl of Lisle, remarkable for her fearless disposition, laid a wager that she would go into the charnel house at mid-night, and bring from thence a dead man's skull. Accordingly, at the appointed time she went; but the person with whom she made the bet, intending to terrify her, had gone before and hid himself in the place. When he heard her descend and take up the skull, he called out in a hollow, dismal voice—Leave me, my head! The girl instead of discovering any symptoms of horror or fright very cooly laid it down and took up another, upon which the voice repeated—Leave me my head!—but the heroic girl, observing it was the same voice that had called before answered in her country dialect—Næ, næe, friend, ye canna ha two heads!

The Infidel on his Death-Bed.

The writer of this was called about mid day to visit a young man in the last moments of life. He was a professed infidel and refused any spiritual aid or the services of a minister. On entering the room, the scene was truly awful—the young man was dying—near the bed sat his widowed mother and sisters. He was struggling to hide his tears, and appear calm and collected in the conflict with death. As I approached him, the window was slightly opened to admit sufficient light; he turned towards the window, and as his eye for a moment rested on me—it was only a moment, however, for he as quickly turned away with his face towards the wall—seeming determined to prevent my conversing with him. I took his hand, he withdrew it; I asked him to look at me and talk about his latter end, he groaned and hid himself beneath the bed clothes. Again I held his hand, and by gentle force turned him towards me. His countenance was intelligent, and his features good; his appearance indicated twenty-one years of age.

Shall I pray with you, my dear friend?

No, no, said he; I dont believe in prayer.

Shall I read a portion of God's holy word!

No; O don't worry me; I don't believe in the Bible. Why add to my sufferings with such things? I tell you I am an infidel, and all I ask is to be left alone.

Do you know you are dying my young friend?

Yes, I know it well enough—I shall never see that sun rise or set again—I wish it was over—I wish I was dead—I wish you would leave me—I did not send for you—mother, mother, send this man away, it is useless to talk with me.

Oh, my boy, cried the almost heart broken mother, do listen to the word of truth. You will soon be beyond its reach—you are fast hastening to the judgment. Oh my child, it is a fearful thing to meet God unprepared.

Her sobs choked her utterance. I knelt by his side, and prayed for God's Spirit to bring the wanderer back. He rolled and tossed in his bed, and constantly interrupted me during prayer; I then read from the Bible such verses as I thought would lead his mind to right reflection. He hid his face, placed his fingers in his ears, and begged me to desist, and groaned so audibly as to alarm those in the room. After several ineffectual attempts to get him into conversation, I rose to leave the room. As I passed towards the door, I grasped his hand and said, Farewell my friend. —He raised his eyes towards me, and seemed to be willing to listen.

Suppose said I, we were on board a ship together, and in some violent storm the ship was wrecked—I had secured a plank; and as I clung to it for safety, refused to let you take hold. What would you think of me?

Think of you? said he, I would think you were a selfish wretch.

We have been wrecked—here (pointing to the Bible) is the plank on which I rest; the billows of death are riding over you; and will you lay hold before it is forever too late. Before you is the cheerless ocean of eternity; the voice of mercy may yet be heard. Turn you for why will ye die? Your infidelity is no security for such a storm.—Think of your Savior—O look to him as your only staff, your only sure support.

He kept my hand; the tear started in his eye; his whole soul was centred in the gaze of agony. It is too late, he raid too late, there is no mercy, no hope for me, I am lost, forever lost.

Before the sun set, his soul was in eternity; gone to the audit. At twelve years of age, he left the Sabbath school; commenced his apprenticeship, associated with infidelity, and drank the poison. At twenty summoned to the bar of God, without a ray of light to cheer the darkness of the valley of the shadow of death. Young man, think of this sad story: flee from sin to holiness and God.

A GOOD' UN.—The Pittsburgh Dispatch tells some good jokes on one of its friends who is styled the "Doctor" one of them is as follows:

The Doc. had also a way of claiming every body who was at all distinguished, as a cousin, uncle, or other relative of himself. One day Jim asked him whether he knew one Joseph M——, of——county, Mo.? Of course the Doc. "didn't know any body else." Jim mentioned his occupation, described his personal appearance, spoke of his wealth; all agreed with the Doc's views—it was "his own uncle by his mothers side," he said. "I'm sorry I've bad news for you Doc." said Jim, deliberately drawing from his pocket a St. Louis paper, and reading an advertisement of the sheriff——Co., Mo., offering "$250 reward" for the arrest of "Joseph——," a forger, who "escaped from custody!"—There was no getting out of the scrape, and "the Doc." again "stood treat all around!"

The Vicksburg Whig learns that Col. Jefferson Davis, who is now with the Army under Gen. Taylor, has forwarded his resignation as member of Congress, to the Governor of Mississippi.

Lowliness of mind is not a flower that grows in the field of nature, but is planted by the finger of God in a renewed heart and learned of the lowly Jesus.

A gentleman has sent to the editor of the Petersburg Intelligencer, a potatoe weighing nine and a half pounds, and a turnip weighing seventeen pounds. He has a cow that gives thirteen quarts of milk at a milking. This is pretty well for Virginia. Ohio can beat that.

PROCLAMATION.

EXECUTIVE OFFICE, OHIO,
October 5, 1846.

In pursuance of a resolution of the General Assembly of the State of Ohio, passed March, 2, 1846, requesting the Governor within the present year to issue his proclamation to the citizens of this State, recommending to them the observance of a day, previous to the first Monday of December next, of thanksgiving to Almighty God for his blessing to us as sa people, I, M. BARTLEY, Governor of the State Ohio, do hereby respectfully recommend to the citizens of this State, to set apart Thursday, the 26th day of November next, as a day of Thanksgiving and Prayer to Almighty God for his beneficence in a bountiful dispensaiton of His blessings to us as a people.

The antiquity of this laudable practice, its authenticity, its infinite importance, and its beneficial effects upon the minds and habits of those who have hitherto revered it, is a sufficient guaranty that the citizens of the State will, on the day designated, suspend their secular business, meet at their various places for religious worship, consecrate the time to thanksgiving, prayer and gratitude to Him from whom emanates all temporal and spiritual blessings. M. BARTLEY.

Our increase of subscribers has been so rapid since our new volume, that some of our early numbers are exausted, and we need them to supply those who request them. If Mr. Newcomb, or any other obliging post master will do us the favor to return to us copies of our first 3 numbers especially, it will oblige us, and we will reciprocate the favor when opportunity serves.

Br. Springer acknowledges the receipt by A. Ferguson, of $6 from J. Evans, for which he is credited to middle of 6th Vol. $1, is still due to Br. S. and $2 is due us for 7th vol. Likewise, $1 12½ received from James Russell, for which he is credited in full.

Br. P. T. Laishley, the P. M. at Morgantown informs us that M. D. Wells, a sub. given us at Conf. does not take his paper from the office. Please attend to that case, and inform us.

Br. Springer wishes us to inform Br. Hitt of Swan, O, that a letter enclosing $2 for the Christian World, was received, and forwarded, money and all, to Br. Stockton, in June last, since which time, no account of it has been received.

POETRY.

Written for the Western Recorder.

A CANZONET.

The sun that glorious on his way,
Gives to the world his cheering light,
Dispels by each enlivening ray
The gloomy darkness of the night:—

But wo to her, for whom no sun
Sheds a serene and holy beam;
For winter reigns, with gloom and storm,
And silent then each purling stream.

No incense floats upon the gale,
Nor bird sings blithely on the spray,
Nor flowrets bloom within the vale—
For birds and flowers have passed away.

'Twere better could the green grass be,
Now waving gently o'er her head;
And winds their dirges mournfully
Were softly sighing round her bed.

P.

COMING OF WINTER.

Autumn's sighing,
Moaning, dying,
Clouds are flying,
On like steeds,
While their shadows
O'er the meadows
Walk like widows
Decked in weeds.

Red leaves trailing
Fall unfailing,
Drooping, sailing
From the wood,
That, unpliant,
Stands defiant,
Like a giant Dropping blood.

Winds are swelling
Round our dwelling,
All day telling
Us their wo;
And at vesper
Frosts grow crisper,
As they whisper
Of the snow.

From the unseen land
Frozen inland,
Down from Greenland
Winter glides,
Shedding lightness
Like the brightness
When moon-whiteness
Fills the tides.

Now bright pleasure's
Sparkling measures
With rare treasures
Overflow!
With this gladness
Comes what sadness?
Oh, what madness!
Oh, what woe!

Even merit
May inherit
Some bare garret,
Or the ground;
Or, a worse ill,
Beg a morsel
At some door-sill,
Like a hound!

Storms are trailing,
Winds are wailing,
Howling, railing,
At each door.
'Midst this trailing,
Howling, railing,
List the wailing
Of the poor.

Humanity and Divinity of Jesus Christ.

NO II.

Mr. Editor: The reasons why I conclude the Divinity of the Lord Jesus is not, in the abstract, called the "Son of God," are first, those already presented; secondly, because, as I believe, this appellation is applied, to his humanity, in consequence of his miraculous conception and birth; thirdly, because of the union of the Divinity and humanity in the person of the Saviour; and fourthly, on account of his resurrection from the dead. The reasons for the first. I am not under the necessity to recapitulate. They are already in the possession of the reader. The second, will be, or at least is to my mind, apparent, since none of the human family had ever been conceived or born under similar circumstances with those attending the conception and birth of the Lord Jesus. God was the grand procuring cause. "But when the fullness of time was come. God sent forth his Son, made of a woman, made under the law," Gal. IV. 4. Divinity was never made; but here we see that the "Son," was made consequently, Divinity in the abstract, and the "Son," are not the same; and since reference obviously, is here made to the Lord Jesus, who possessed two separate and distinct natures, manhood and Divinity, the term, "Son," must apply to that nature which was made, the humanity, or in consequence of the union of both. The third reason is sustained by the Lord, by his prophet, where it is said, "unto us a child is born, unto us a son is given; and the government shall be upon his shoulder; and his name shall be called, Wonderful Counsellor. The mighty God, The everlasting Father, The Prince of Peace." Isaiah, IX. 6. Here, the union of the humanity and Divinity of Jesus Christ is obviously refered unto; nnd in consequence of this glorious union, he is called, the "Son." The apostle says, "And again, when he bringeth in the first begotten into the world, he saith. And let the angels of God worship him. And of the angels he saith, Who maketh his angels spirits and his ministers a flame of fire. But unto the Son he saith, Thy throne, O God, is forever and ever; a sceptre of righteousness is the sceptre of thy kingdom." Heb. I. 6-8 The Divine nature of our Redeemer was ever present in this, and in all other worlds but his humanity was brought into the world at Bethlehem in Judea, when the angels appeared to the shepherds in the field; hence, it must have been in consequence of the union of the Divine and human natures, that the Saviour is here called, "the first begotten" "the Son." Again. The apostle says, unto you first, God having raised up his Son Jesus, sent him to bless you, in turning away every one of you from his iniquities." Acts. III. 26. The Divine nature never died—was not laid in the tomb; hence, was never raised from the dead; but the "Son" was raised from the dead; therefore it was because of the exalted character of Jesus Christ in consequence of the union referred unto, that he is styled, 'his Son Jesus." Relative to the fourth reason, I quote, "And when they had fulfilled all that was written of him, they took him down from the cross, and laid him in a sepulchre. But God raised him from the dead; and he was seen many days of them, which came up with him from Gallilee to Jerusalem, who are witnesses to the people. And we declare unto you glad tidings, how that the promise which was made unto the fathers, God hath fulfilled the same unto us their children, in that he raised up Jesus again; as it is written in the second psalm. Thou art my Son, this day have I begotten thee. And as concerning that he raised him up from the dead, now no more to return to corruption, he said on this wise, I will give you the sure mercies of David." Acts. XIII. 29-34. I need not attempt to prove that the resurrection of Jesus Christ, is here the principal subject discussed. And, it is clear, that in direct reference to this, the apostle quotes the second Psalm, where the same language is used; and that it is in direct relation to the Saviour's resurrection he says, "Thou art my Son, this day have I begotten thee." See, also, where it is said. He, Jesus, "who is the beginning, the first born from the dead." Col. I. 18. And I may add, that wherever the same, or similar language is used by the inspired writers, though other subjects may be the principal object, yet the resurrection of the saviour, is alluded unto. Hence, I have been led to conclude, that Jesus Christ is styled the Son of God, in consequence of his being "the first begotten from the dead."

Aid Society contributions Explanation.

[The following communication from the Secretary of the Muskingum conference will set us right in the little matter pertaining to the 'Minutes' lately referred to. We remark that we forwarded the minutes by Br. Duling to Br. Case, which was the first opportunity that occurred, not having been instructed to send them by mail. Ed.]

Br. Bassett. We are informed in the "Recorder" of 24th inst. "that Br. I. Thrap of Sandusky circuit has amused himself somewhat at the expense of somebody in relation to the statement published with the Con. minutes in regard to the Aid Society.' At this I am not "surprised" but can say with Br. Thrap that "no part surprised me more than the liberality with which the brethren present were said to have contributed to the support of the Preachers Aid Society.

When the "Recorder" of the 3d Sept. brought to me the intelligence relative to the liberality of the brethren I was not only "surprised" but inquiries were started in my mind to the following effect, viz. 1st. Whence this increase of "liberality" since the close of conference and the dispersion of its members? 2d. How did the "Printer" obtain said information? if correct. And on the other hand if incorrect whence and how the mis. take. Presuming that you were absent according to your expressed intention at Steubenville. I put to rest for the time being the inquiries in my mind upon this subject anticipating light when you returned, but being disappointed in this I awaited the arrival of the minutes desiring to ascertain what information they would give in the premises. But the "Recorder" brought not the intelligence nor were the minutes forwarded to me until the "Recorder" of the 24th the article refered to above. After reading said article "Surprize" Expanded her wings and fled, and the whole mystery was explained by the information contained in the following sentence viz. "When we got the above letter we forthwith went and examined the manuscript minutes and found that the Printer had followed copy. There was the dollar mark ($) opposite most of the fifties and twenty fives." But though "surprise" had fled from and the mystery to my own mind. Yet supposing you still had the minutes for your satisfaction and the satisfaction of others I was about to request you if you pleased to look at the minutes once more and see if the Decimal mark (.) was not there also when by the politeness of Br. Wm. Duling the minutes were forwarded to me, and I had the privilege in company with Bros. Duling, Hamilton and Lancaster to examine them for myself when I found it to be even so. The names figures and characters as follows viz. R. Andrews $, 50. W. Maynard $, 25, &c the Decimal mark or point at the right and separated from the Dollar mark by the figure or figures denoting Dollars and to the left and between the Dollar mark and figures denoting cents to this there are four exceptions. The first is A. Channel as follows viz. A Channel 50 Pd &c. omitting both the dollar mark ($) and the decimal (.) and explains why four men set down $, 50 and the ballance $50. In consequence of the printer having overlooked this little mark or point (.) it has inadvertantly been permitted to drop among a large flock of "Surprises" and caused them forthwith to take wing and not only to pass by the Sandusky Brother but without doubt more or less of them have appeared to every careful reader of the "Recorder." But now if you will take said mark or point (.) from their proper resting place and put it where it ought to be and properly belongs viz: at the right of each $ 25, which are and ought to be 25 dollars and to the left of each $, 50 which are and ought to be 50 cents. I presume the whole tribe of "Surpises" will quietly settle down and cease to either annoy or "amuse" the good brethren at least until something else shall stir up their nest. And also respond to your call in the words following viz. "And let some one who knows please correct this money matter if it is incorrect." Yours with respect,

J. W. Case.

THE MEDICAL PROFESSION.

"One of the greatest men in the world said I know of nothing in the world more contemptible than a cowardly soldier or an ignorant medical man.—The ignorant medical man compromizes hourly the life and welfare of his fellow creatures." See Dr. Knight's communication in Western Recorder, Oct- 31.

I would wish to inquire of Dr. Knight, which is to be the most deprecated, an ignorant medical man, or a class of Physicians who have no settled principles of practice?

It was proclaimed by a learned Doctor in the medical convention held in Columbus the last spring—"That the practice of 20 years ago would at this day be called errant quackery—and still he remarked that the system of practice is not settled. Many of the physicians of this city have abandoned the use of cold water and ice in Hydrocyphilas and all cases of inflamation, while others make use of cold applications until the patient is cold in death.—Some repudiate bleeding, blistering, and powerful cathartics, while others use us the lancet with the butcher's success—deal out mineral poisons with a profusion which causes rotten and toothless jaws; and if the potient survive, he only tries to deprecate this deadly practice. With some the dose of 20 grains of Quinine is administered in cases of chills and fever, while others condemn the practice. With all this jargon of medical practice, what say you Dr. Knight? To what class of Physicians do you attach those practitioners? Will you call such practice scientific, when such Physicians as Dr. Forbes of London has recently publicly declared, that more than half the deaths under the alopathic treament die with the mortification, and the rest of those who get well under the same treatment are restored by the third power, viz, the power of nature.

PHILANTHROPY.

Mr. Editor: The holy Scriptures, admonish men, and especially christians, to be ware of sundry things, which may in their seductive influence prove detrimental, and even ruinous. They are admonished, to be ware of false prophits, or prophets who "prophesy falsely"—when "priests bear rule." To be ware of false philosophy—or "philosophy, and vain deceit.' To be ware of false science, or "science falsely so called." To be ware of false religion, or seeming to religious which "religion is vain." To be ware false liberty or "liberty, as an occasion to the flesh"—or "as a cloak of maliciousness." To be ware of false faith, and false charity, or "faith without works," and a charity that is "puffed up"—"vaunteth himself"—is easily provoked—is rash, &c. &c. Now, Mr. Editor, may there not be such a thing as false philanthropy? Or a philanthropy tempered with a zeal, not according to knowledge, which is selfish, limited, sectional and partial? The significant term, at the head of this article, is defined, "love of mankind, good nature." This philanthropy, like "the wisdom from above," is, "without partiality and without hypocricy," resembles divine benevolence, "no respecter of persons."—It is like the gospel, which is "good will to man," whether Jew or Gentile, bond or free. But after reading, in the Western Recorder, sundry communications, and resolutions, adopted by ecclesiastical councils, or Conferences. I am amazed, that the admonitions, and warnings of the bible have so little influence, even on professing christians—and I am forced into the conclusion, that false or mistaken philanthropy, is rife in these days of intemperate zeal. Men speak of "the Spirit of Christ"—who may have mistaken their own Spirit for the Spirit of Christ—to whom the rebuke of the philanthropic Jesus, might be appropriate—"ye know not what manner of Spirit ye are of." Some speak of the morality of the bible," who evince a superficial knowledge of that treasury of divine truth, and very contracted views of the morality it teaches.

Slavery is servitude, whether impelled by civil law, or the laws of necessity—and in either case, oppression, fraud, or cruelty, is sinful—is contrary to the morality of the bible, and is adverse, to the spirit of Christ, and of true philanthropy. But the broad, indefinite, and uncharitable assertion, that "slavery, is a sin against God, under all circumstances," is a bold assumption, and requires proof, which cannot be adduced from the scriptures without a strained construction, or strange pervertion.

Are those heated, mistaken, but possibly sincere brethren real. true and consistent philanthropists? Do they really love all mankind? And yet, as far as their assumptions and decrees go, consign millions of professing christians dead and living, to hopeless dispair—to suffer the wages of sin!!! Do they indeed and in truth, "sympathise with those that are in bonds," and yet pursue a course, that must of necessity, exclude themselves from all chance to remedy their condition—or of affording them, the light and consolations of the gospel? Do they, candidly, soberly, and in the light of reason, and revelation, look at the bearing, and tendency, of their assumptions, resolves &c. Do these professed philanthropists, expect to exterpate the evil of Slavery," by decrees or resolves—by conventions, division or secession? The M. E. Church, sought "to extirpate the evil of slavery," half a century ago—and what have they done? Why, they have beat the air—stirred up strife—divided the church, and accomplished little or nothing toward the extirpation of the evil—but contrarywise, have contributed to riveting the chains of boadage more tight, and the enactment of more rigid laws. Do these men, merely look at the surface of things? Can they expect, to "rid themselves" of all connexion with the evil of slavery, by "dissolving all connection with the southern portion of the church? Would such a hasty step free them from all political, commercial, and social connexion with slavery? could this be, without dissolving the social campact, severing the bonds of civil Union—and ceasing to trafic in, or use articles of commerce—of food and clothing, the product of slave labor? Would such a procedure, lessen the quantum of human misery, and increase the quantum of human happiness? Would it remedy the evil, or benefit the slave? Should they organize "a free church," will it be pure—or free from slavery, or servitude impelled by circumstances or the laws of necessity? Will there be none in it, who practice fraud, and "oppress the hireling in his wages"—none whose avrice, prompts them to "grind the face of the poor?" Will there be none among, or around them, who are doomed, by the laws of necessity, and surrounding circumstances, to servitude for life—poor and dependant? Would those ill judging philanthropists, have immediate, and universal emancipation to take place? Whither would the the thousands of unlettered, ignorant, and degraded—not to say indolent and dishonest sons of Africa, fly, or find a resting place? Would they escape from, what one of those heated philanthropists, styles "the southern atmosphere of tyranny and oppression," and seek to "breathe the pure air," of a free State? Might they not be repulsed like the liberated states of John Randolph—or threatned with violence, like those whom the Governor's (of Ohio) proclamation is designed to protect? Would their condition be better, when cast out from the protection and care of their matters, upon an heartless world, exposed to the insults and cupidity of unfeeling sharpers? Reason and facts often keveloped, assures us that it would not.

Now Mr. Editor, permit me to say, that I am no slaveholder, nor an advocate for slavery, or oppression, physical or mental. I have endeavored to preach the gospel, to multitudes of bond and free, in slaveholding states, for more than fifty years—and have witnessed the happy effects of that gospel, which is the power of God unto salvation—and have seen multitudes of masters and servants rejoice together, in hope of eternan life. But I have never believed it to be my duty, or the duty of ministers, or the church, to intermeddle with civil institutions—or to do any more than Paul did, viz. exhort servants to obedience and fidelity—and masters, to "give to their servants that which is right." Neither the examples or precepts, of the New Testament authorise more, or enjoin more, upon the ministers of religion. Suppose these mistaken zealots, should get up a convention, produce a schism, and organize a "free M. P. Church"—what great good will they accomplish? Will they benefit the Church South or North? Will they contribute, in any degree, to the extirpation of the evil of slavery? Will they lighten the burdens of those with whom they profess to sympathise? Will they promote the cause of true religion? Will they convince the world, that they are real, rational, and consistent philanthropists—loving all mankind, with a sincere affection? Or will they augment "doubtful disputation," "sow the wind, and reap the whirlwind? Let them then rather pause, and think soberly, and give themselves to prayer. Let them evince the spirit of the true mother, e're the child is divided. L. G.

Emancipation in the West Indies.

No. I.

Mr. Editor—As I have resided a considerable time in the Island of Trinidad, one of the British West Indies, I have been much interested in observing the results of the measure of emancipation which took effect in those colonies, August 1st. A. D. 1838. I now deem it my duty to make public the result of my observations, for the information of my fellow citizens, and in order to aid them in determinating the great question, "Shall slavery continue in the United States?"

When this measure was determined on by the British Government, it was natural for us to watch its operation with anxiety. Its success, or its failure must have a great influence on the institution of slavery in this country. I remember that at that time, while philanthropists were rejoicing at it as a great triumph of justice and humanity, its enemies confidently predicted its failure; and it has been surprising to me that since that time, while the former have been exulting in it as entirely successful, the latter have as confidently been asserting that it has proved a failure. I wondered how such opposite statements could be made when both parties had the same sources of information. I was therefore glad of an opportunity to see and judge for myself.

Three questions may be asked in relation to emancipation,—does justice require it?—is it safe?—is it beneficial? The first of these I intend to consider a settled question. Few in the United States would venture, publicly at least, to answer it in the negative. Slavery is admitted to be wrong, and those who plead for its continuance commonly do it on the ground that its abolition would produce some greater evil. Were the people of the United States convinced that such would not be the result, but the reverse, no objection to emancipation would remain. My object has therefore been to find the answers to the questions—has emancipation in the British West Indies proved safe? and has it proved beneficial?

My inquiries on this subject, it will be observed are mostly limited to the colony of Trinidad, as that is the only one in which I have resided. To that Island I went from this country in the summer of 1845, and returned lately. I have, it is true, had opportunities of obtaining information from the other islands, but I intend to confine my remarks chiefly to the state of things where I have had opportunities of personal observation.

And first, has the measure proved safe? When the emancipation law took effect, Aug. 1st, 1838, it did so with entire safety. I refer to this as a thing well known. There was no violence—no anarchy—no disposition manifested to violate the rights of person or property. Whatever difficulties were experienced, they did not arise from any turbulence. They simply took possession of the boon offered them, and peacefully submitted to the control of legal authority. These facts are notorious.

The law took effect in Trinidad under circumstances more unfavorable, perhaps, than in any of the other colonies. It came upon them suddenly without any time for preparation, either on the part of the colonial government, the planters, or the laborers. Some vague rumors had arisen, it seems, in the summer of 1833, that the apprenticeship system (which had taken the place of absolute slavery in the year 1834, but was found to be little better) was to terminate on the first of August of that year; but the Lieutenant Governor issued his proclamation bearing date July 7th, specially addressed to the laboring classes, in which he states as follows: "Information has reached me that the field apprentices on some states believe that their period of apprenticed labor for their employers is to cease on the 1st of August next, and it has become my duty to undeceive them, and tell them the truth. The truth, then, is, that her Majesty the Queen, and her Parliament have determined to continue the law, that the predial apprenticeship shall be observed until 1840. Those apprentices are therefore bound to serve their employers for two years after the 1st August next." This settled the public mind, and all seems to have gone on quiet as usual till the 26th of the same month, when the Lieutenant Governor issued another proclamation, in which it is announced, "That all persons who, on the 1st of August, 1838, shall be in a state of apprenticeship, as predial apprenticed laborers within the island and its dependencies, shall upon, and from, and after the 1st day of August 1838, become, and be to all intents and purposes whatsoever, absolutely and forever manumitted and set free."

Five days only were thus allowed for this great change, and it seems that the time actually arrived before the proclamation reached some of the more distant quarters. The news was astounding.—Only nineteen days before, the Governor had told the laborers as a truth, that the Queen and Parliament had determined to continue the apprenticeship labor two years longer. Now they were free. What would happen next? This was well calculated to unsettle their minds. The feelings raised by this event were mingled too in the minds of many of the most intelligent and industrious of them with the most bitter indignation for numbers on the strength of the Governor's proclamation of the 7th July that they should serve as apprentices till the 1st of August 1840, had in the mean time purchased their time, and paid their employers for it, rigidly calculated at two years from august 1st, and now every idle and careless person had obtained the same thing for nothing.

The condition of the proprietor and planter too, was sufficiently embarrassing. No time had been allowed to consider of the rates of wages, or to make contracts by which to secure a supply of labor to carry on the business of the island. A deficiency of laborers was anticipated, and should they even succeed in getting the growing cane crop cultivated, they had no security of obtaining laborers enough to manufacture it when the season should arrive; for the manufacture of sugar requires an additional amount of labor. No one had any certainty that he would be able to obtain hands enough to start his sugar woaks. Besides, many estates had been bought sold and leased under the expectation of a supply of apprenticed labor for two years longer. Here was enough to embarrass—to irritate—to exasperate on both sides.

In the mean time the Colonial Government was as much embarrassed as any other party. The measure had come on it with the same suddenness. No time was allowed to prepare a single ordinance or regulation which the change required, and for a time the island was without the legal regulations needful to protect its peace and welfare in the new state of its society. This will be better understood hereafter, when it is stated that the island is a crown colony having no Legislation of its own. Its government is administered by the Governor and a legislative council. These have the power of framing ordinances for the regulation of the affairs of the colony, but they have no validity, till they receive the sanction of the Home Government. At the same time the colonial government is bound to carry out all the measures of the Government at home relating to the colony. It will thus be seen that while emancipation produced a new state of things, the island government was for a time wholly unable to adapt itself to it.

Notwithstanding all these untoward circumstances, however, there was no disturbance—no riots—no violence. All remained quiet and peaceful. "The day of emancipation," said the Rev. Mr. Kennedy, of Port of Spain, who has been in the island since 1836, 'was a day of peaceful rejoicing—of mutual congratulation. The people by whom it had been said we would be massacred if they were set free, came in crowds to shake me by the hand in token of their warm friendship, and their gratitude. Instead of riot and revenge, the only feelings manifested were those of peace and joy." These expressions as nearly as I can remember were used by this gentleman in conversation on this subject, with much feeling. It seemed to do him good, and to awake the most kindly feeling to reflect on the exhibition of human joy which he had that day witnessed.

One naturally concludes, that if under such circumstances, emancipation took place without any interruption of the public tranquility, no apprehension need be entertained but that it would operate peacefully elsewhere, especially if the proper legal precautions were used to prepare for the measure.

The facts mentioned above are taken from the public and authentic documents. I have refered for information, on these points, principally to a book in my possession written by the Hon. Wm. H. Burnley, one of the most considerable proprietors and planters in the colony; and a member of the legislative council, entitled, "Observations on the present condition of the island of Trinidad, and the actual state of the experiment of negro emancipation." This book was written expressly for the information of the government and people of the mother country, and there can be no doubt of the accuracy of the facts which he states.

As the measure went peacefully into operation, so it has continued to operate peacefully ever since. There has been no attempt at insurrection—no disposition towards it is shown and no one dreads it. The laborers submit to the laws and abide by them like other people. So far as I have been able to see, as much respect is paid to the authority of law by the common people of Trinidad, as by any other people among whom I have resided. Many immoral practices, it is true prevail in the island, but they are by no means confined to the emancipated. But I do not think that crimes punishable by law are more common among them than among the common population of the United States generally. During my stay in the Island I paid attention to the proceedings of the criminal courts as reported in the public papers. The prevailing crimes for which convictions were made were larceny, and assault and battery. The latter were sometimes serious affairs, resulting in loss of life, and generally arose from drunken quarrels, which frequently take place there as elsewhere. The parties in these cases are, however, I believe, fully as often Spaniards as negroes. I cannot speak with entire accuracy, but my impression is that the number of criminal causes before the courts is not greater in Trinidad than in the United States generally, but of an equal number of population.

Should any be disposed to think that the population is kept in order by means of military force and that were it not for the presence of strong bodies of troops, order could not be preserved, I may just state that such is not the fact. The military force in Trinidad is a mere handful, far inferior I am informed, to what it was before emancipation. Then it was necessary, it seems, to maintain strong detatchments in the island. Besides, the white militia was regularly drilled, in order to be ready for any emergency. Now no such thing is done. There is a mere handful of troops in the island, stationed at three or four different points, and should the people revolt, the handful of soldiers would scarcely be an obstacle in their way. Many of the people keep fire-arms, and I never heard of any restriction on their keeping them. Besides, as the cutlass is an implement of agriculture there, every laborer has in his possession what, in case of an insurrection, could be used as a most deadly weapon. Another fact is, that part of the soldiers are negroes, and another, that many of the police officers whom I saw were negroes. The truth is, insurrection is a thing never dreamed of. Should any person express any apprehension of it, he would be stared at, or laughed at. The answer to the question, has emancipation proved safe? is in Trinidad as satisfactory as it could possibly be; and I have no intimation that it has been otherwise in the other West India colonies. I shall therefore dismiss this part of the inquiry, and in another article, with your leave Mr. Editor, present some statements in relation to the other part, viz: "has emancipation proved beneficial?"

JOHN SCOTT.

WE CAN ALL HELP.

Four little children were playing together near some water, when one of them fell in and would have been drowned, had not his brother jumped in after him and pulled him out. Another brother helped to carry him home, and their little sister followed them. A little while after, their father, who had heard of what had taken place, called them into his study, that he might reward them as they deserved. He then asked the first, "What did you do when you saw your brother drowning!" "I rushed in after him and brought him out." "You did well; here is your reward." "And what did you do!" turning to the second. I helped to carry him home." "That was right; here is your reward." "And what did you do when you saw your brother sinking!" speaking to the little girl of three years old. "I prayed, papa." "Well, that was all you could do; here is a book for you too.'

Now, dear children, some of you, when you grow up, can go to the heathen who are perishing, and tell them the way of salvation. Some, like the second brother, can help in leading them to heaven by assisting the missionaries, and giving your money to their support. Some of you cannot go to heathen lands, and you are too poor to give any money; but you can cry to God for them; you can pray that he would bless the missionaries and make them very, very useful.—You can all help.

Webster's Habit of Reading.

Daniel Webster is a great and rapid reader. While travelling in stages, unless his attention is attracted by the company, he will devour as many books as a horse will quarts of oats, and generally provides himself at starting with a stock for the purpose. A correspondent of the New York Commercial Advertiser, who lately had a stage ride with him in Massachusetts, speaks of him as follows:

He reads the books through with great rapidity, catching at a glance what each page unfolded, and mastering their contents within a quarter of the time which I should consume. He did not, however, like the Emperor, tear out the pages as fast as he perused them, and from the windows of his carriage scatter them on the winds. To me it was instructive to see him read a book. He first went over the index, and apparently fixed the frame of it in his mind, then he studied with equal earnestness the synopsis of each chapter; then he read it, passing rapidly over what was commonplace, and dwelling only on whatever was worthy of note.

"At one time, while conversing on the subject of reading, and topics worth the attention of men, he said he wished he could live three lives while living this. One he would devote to the study of geology, or, to use his own expression, 'to reading the earth's history of itself;' another life he would devote to astronomy. He said he had lately been reading the history of that science, written so clearly that he although no mathematician, could understand it, and he was astonished at seeing to what heights it had been pushed by modern intellects. The other life he would devote to the classics. He spoke in the highest terms of commendation of the acquirements in this respect of Mrs. Choate, who, by the daily habit of reading them, has become as familiar with those languages as they who wrote them.

While at school he (Mr. W.) had never read much Greek or Latin. He had, however, read the latter considerably while in the study and practice of the law. The best of his life has been devoted to law and politics, and he mentioned what great authors he had studied, on both subjects, with most attention. For his light reading, and for his amusement, he had chosen the travels and biographies of men more or less eminent in various respects; but for the last ten years he had studied natural subjects, and from these only could he derive any adequate satisfaction. As years crept upon him, he felt his mind involuntarily drawn more to the study and contemplation of sober realities—to the book of Nature itself rather than to the fancies and speculations which belong to youth and early manhood.

The Quaker and the Countryman.—A Quaker, passing through a market, stopped at a stall and inquired the price of citrons

"I have none," said the honest countryman, "that will suit you; they are decayed, and their flavor is gone."

"Thank thee, friend; I will go to the next stand."

"Hast thou any good fruit to day, said he to the dealer.

"Yes, sir; here are some of the finest nutmegs of my garden. They are small, but rich of their kind."

"Then thou canst recommend them?"

"O certainly, sir."

"Very well; I will take two." He carried them home, and they proved not only unsound, but miserably tasteless.

The next morning he again repaired to the same place. The man who sold him the fruit the preceding day asked him if he would like some more.

"Nay, friend; thou hast deceived me once, and now, although thou mayst speak the truth, still I cannot trust thee; but thy neighbor chose to deal uprightly with me, and from henceforth I shall be his patron. Thou wouldst do well to remember this, and learn by experience, that a falsehood is a base thing in the beginning and a very unprofitable one in the end."

Remedy for Chills and Fever, or Fever and Ague.—Take one pint of sweet milk and one table-spoonful of ground ginger, mixed thoroughly, and heated over the fire as warm as it can be drunk, when the chill comes on or commences. Repeat the dose once or twice, if necessary, and the cure will be effected.

N. B.—If the system be costive, an aperient may be necessary in order to prepare it properly for the above prescription.

This is the most accessible, the cheapest, the most efficacious, and the speediest remedy in the world.

Railroad Accident.—The Coroner on Wednesday held an inquest on the body of Benjamin Ernst or Huet, who was crushed to death between two trains of coal cars at the Reading railroad bridge, at the falls of Schuylkill.

On taking out your Watch during Sermon.—This is no small exploit. There are many advantages arising from it. In the first place, it will be known that the man has a watch. In the second place, he will show that the sermon has not very much affected him. Thirdly, it will be a modest hint to the minister that he has preached about long enough, and should bring the sermon to a close. Fourthly, it will take up a portion of the time and attention, so that a part of the sermon, certainly, (if not the whole,) will pass by the man as the idle wind, and be lost. Fifthly, it will show what estimate the man puts on the message of grace. Sixthly, it will abstract the notice of others around, and turn away their attention from the message in like manner. Seventhly, it is an act very much in harmony with a passage of Scripture; "When will the new moon be gone, that we may sell corn; and the Sabbath that we may set forth wheat?" Amos viii, 1.—Essex Register.

Economy in Cooking Cranberries.—To each quart of berries, very shortly after the cooking of them is commenced, add a tea-spoonful of saleratus. This will so neutralize the acidiferous juice which they contain, as to make it necessary to use only one fourth part as much sugar as would have been requisite had they been cooked without using saleratus.

Influence of Railrods on the Weather.—The German Schnellpost says, that the well known natural philosopher, Dr. August has made a communication in a Berlin paper, in which he states, that when an extended portion of the earth's surface is brought, by a net of railroad tracks into connection of electrical conductors, the accumulation of electricity in the lower part of the atmosphere is prevented; as the iron tracks effect a constant electrical equilibrium between remote regions. By this means a violent storm is rendered unlikely, and if one should arise, it would undergo a considerable diminution. The doctor states it as a fact, that since Berlin has become the focus of several railroads, there have been no violent storms; and all that have risen, have had a rapid and gentle termination.

Mt. Vernon, O. Nov. 13, 1846.

Br. Bassett:—"He died at his post," is an encomium which my ambition prompts me to desire and to deserve. I have been reconnoitering the scene of action assigned to me for another years' campaign, on Licking Circuit, and have just returned to my quarters well satisfied;—it is a fine, fertile country,—with plenty of room,—where something is to be done: and now I can announce that I am fairly "at my post," whether to live or to die there God only knows; but is a matter of indifference so that I be found "at my post." We began operations in good earnest on the last day of last month, at the first Quarterly Meeting held in Hopewell Meeting house, near to Homer, Licking Co. On account of the inclemency of the weather, but few of the officiary and of the members of the other classes were in attendance, yet we had fine congregations and a good time. There was the rushing wind, and the rainy tempest, and the rolling thunders: but after all these there came "a still small voice" more powerful than the stormy blast and more impressive than all the warring elements of nature. Inaudible to the outward ear and speaking only to the inner man, it was, to Gods' dear children, a voice of recognition by which "He, whom having not seen, we love," whispered, my beloved is mine and I am his;" but to the unconverted, it was a voice of alarm, which cried "Escape for thy life;" and while those who had the witness-bearing spirit with their spirits made the house to resound with their glory—shouts, and leaped for joy, "the sinners in Zion became afraid, and there was a stirring among "the dry bones." As a commencement, it gave us no little encouragement; for some accessions were made to the Hopewell class;'—the membership were revived and rekindled their zeal for the prosperity of the cause of God; while many of those, still "without," were stirred up to consider their ways.—(By way of parenthesis)—I wonder if our cool calm Baptist friends are aware that the disciples of John the Baptist were religious jumpers; but it is a fact. The passage translated in the English version, "ye were willing for a season to rejoice in his light'—reads in the Greek, "Ye were willing for a season, in his light to leap for joy:"—the original word is the same as 'Calisthenics," which is the modern fashionable name for the art of dancing.

The Saturday following the Quarterly Meeting, a protracted meeting was commenced at Becks' School-house, about three miles east of this place, where we have a small society, which is a germe of much promise, likely soon to bring forth abundantly. The house was crowded, the attention of the hearers soon became rivetted, and considerable feeling began to make its appearance among those "ready to perish;" but after laboring on by myself through Saturday, Sabbath, to Monday night, being unable to get Ministerial help;—Br. Cahn being absent in Pennsylvania on a visit to his motherless children; and the unstationed Brethren having gone to the aid of Br. Dafley at West Union,—when I had exerted myself through eight successive services, my strength failed, and we had to suspend for a few days, the exercises, amid the most pleasing indications of a great awakening, just ready for the outbreak. The Meeting will recommence on Sabbath next, when, having recruited our exhausted energies, and "the men of help," responding promptly to the Macedonian cry, rally for the rescue, we trust, the work will go on again, and never cease till all, who hear, "fear and turn unto the Lord with full purpose of heart."—God took the work of mercy into his own hands, as soon as we, through the infirmities of the flesh, failed; and when the human voice could no longer articulate the words of warning in the sinners ears,—God began to preach to them by the silent but more effective voice of his providence. Our venerable father, Samuel Creppin, a meek and lowly follower of Jesus, and a member of this class, died suddenly the day after the meeting was suspended. He was present from the beginning of the meeting to the close. On Monday at the Love-feast he gave a noble testimony to the power and blessedness of religion and spoke of his future prospects as without a cloud. On the night of the same day he was in his accustomed seat in apparent health; and when the call to the unconverted was given, he, in anxiety for the perishing souls, was to be seen mounted on the benches, and peering into every corner and on every side, to see if any poor sinner needed a helping hand to assist him to reach the anxious seat. It was his last meeting and his last labor of love on earth! Yesterday I attended his funeral obsequies, with a deeply impressed audience. "He, being dead yet speaketh;"—his death, so sudden and at such a time, will, we trust, emphasize, by an inestable confirmation, all the calls and pleas, and warnings of the living voice which has so earnestly addressed them; and give to them a home-stroke which will prove to be a saving impression! Brethren, pray for us, that the Word may have free course and be glorified!

Thomas Potter.

Delaware Ct., Nov. 12, 1846.

Br. Bassett: Our first quarterly meeting closed the 2nd day of Nov. 1846. Our friend E. Butt, of Morganville Ct. came to our help, and labored to the satisfaction of all present. We had a wet time, but notwithstanding the rain, the people found their way to the church, and although we had no conversions or accessions, the church was somewhat revived. You need not wonder why it is that we had no better time, I will say that it is plain; when I came on I found the brethren on this circuit strangers almost to prayer and class meetings, you may judge the condition of sinners. Truly the Lord hath said, "The ox knoweth his owner and the ass his master's crib, but Israel doth not know, my people doth not consider." Isa. 1. 3. Finding this the condition of our Zion here, I have by the help of God taken up the gospel mattock, and am engaged in digging after those who have been dead and buried in idle indifference, and I think I have had a glimpse of the corpes; and I am looking for a resurrection, and as soon as this great scene takes place, we will let you know, that you may rejoice with us in saying, the dead's alive and the lost are found. The clouds are giving away, for on my last round we had shouting in the camp and those members that have been trying to withdraw from the church were encouraged to remain, and look for better days. My health has been so good that I have not missed an appointment, and am determined to see what can be done on this circuit this year. The people have called for me in Eden and also in Delaware. Pray for us, all you that know the worth of prayer.

We are going to hold a watch night meeting, commencing on the 31st day of December, 1846, at 11 o'clock A. M. at a school house near Br. John Westbrook's, 7 miles west of Homer, and 2 miles from Lock. We expect to continue the meeting several days, and we invite Brs. Thos. Potter, S. Catlin, A. S. Robinson, P. Inskeep, J. Baker, S. Akins, John McCann, Wm. Sears, C. J. Sears, A. Channel, J. W. Southard, J. Wilson, C. S. Callihan, and Wm. Marshall. Come Br. Robinson, and all the rest, for you have no excuse. Time and place is given this time.

From the Conference Missionary, Ohio Conference.

Dear Br. Bassett: My name is published as Conference Missionary, and perhaps the brethren wish to know what has become of me. I will now inform them, through your excellent paper, that I was attacked with the intermitting fever on the evening the conference closed, and was confined to my bed two weeks; and five weeks passed away, before I ventured abroad. On the 29th of last month, I set out with my wife on a visit to our children in Xenia, Waynesville, &c. On Sunday 1st of this month, I rode from Waynesville to Lebanon and preached at 11 and at night. Saw a number of my old friends, to whom I preached when I was in the old ship. We had a feeling, weeping time together. When I came down from the pulpit, they crowded around me to get a shake of my hand, as though I had been some near relation, just returning from a long absence. Well! they had got their eyes open to see as I had seen for more than twenty years, and union of sentiments or principles will increase our love toward each other, and having now got on board of the new ship with me, they felt like sailing with me to the port of heaven, which port we are sure to gain, if we will but keep Jesus our unerring pilot on board. They are advancing fast with their meeting houses. I expect the brick work is nearly done by this time. Is it not a blessed thing that  power presses hard enough (if only at times) to wake up its subjects to a sense of their rights as men, as citizens and as Christians?

IMPROPRIETIES IN PRAYER.

Public worship is a very solemn and significant act. It implies the united approach of an assembly unto God—the approach of a guilty assembly to a lofty God. The object that each worshipper proposes to himself is the offering of praise and supplication. Consequently, the heart is supposed to be engaged in the exercises of the occasion. Now anything which seems inconsistent with the sobriety, humility, and solemnity which ought to characterize the worship of guilty creatures, is a great evil, and tends to everything but edification. The apostolic injunction is, "Let everything be done decently and in order." Now, to my great grief, a number of improprieties in public worship have fallen under my eye, yea, some of them I have detected in myself, and that my thoughts and reflection thereon might not be fruitless; it has appeared best to publish them in the present form.

1. Preaching in prayer.—Some ministers turn their prayers into sermons, in which they explain and enforce Christian doctrine, and express their opinion of Christian practice. There is much that may be called "praying at people." Certain individuals are obnoxious on account of certain opinions or practice, and the ministers takes the occasion of public prayer to pray at and against their peculiarities, for the purpose of giving them a lecture. The object is generally perceived, and such prayers edify no one. Let a proper distinction be always observed between praying and preaching.

2. Gesticulation in prayer.—On this point I would not be harsh. Earnest feeling often times vents itself in gestures, unperceived by the speaker, and yet I venture to suggest that it may on the whole better be avoided as far as possible; except in peculiar circumstances. There is to a spectator, (for there are such in churches,) something irreverent in gesticulation in ordinary circumstances. It wears the appearance of an attempt on the part of him who prays, to lead the people to think that he is very importunate in his entreaties.

3. Use of irreverent epithets.—Some ministers hardly mention the name of God or the Savior without connecting it with some fondling of irreverent epithet, such as "dear," "blessed," "precious," &c. These are not improper in themselves abstractly considered, but their too frequent repetition greatly degrades prayer, and strips it of all true reverence and dignity. It is too familiar for God and man, and is more like the intercourse of loving friends. The language seems in nine cases out of ten to be forced, and is a very cheap way of gaining a reputation for communion with God. Let us always remember, while we come with a filial spirit, what God is, and what we are.

4. Attempts at eloquence.—These are disgusting to every pious soul, and form almost an entire disqualification to the ministerial office. Yet how often does there seem to be attempts in ministers to be particularly eloquent in prayer, and especially on some important occasion. How heart sickening were the prayers of a certain chaplain in Congress some two or three years since, as reported in the public papers. One specimen will answer instead of further remarks: "O God! while the wing of the national eagle shadows these council halls, and Washington, in pale, passionless marble, overlooks the debates in both Houses of congress, we beseech thee to overshadow the President and members of this Senate chamber with the wing of the cherubim," &c

5. Too sudden change to other things.—I have heard ministers join a notice of meetings on to the amen of their prayer, so that it seemed to be all one sentence, adopted by its incongruity to excite a smile, and to dissipate solemnity. There ought to be a short pause after prayer before proceeding to any thing else.

6. I may be pardoned for alluding to one other impropriety—the introduction of prayer for personal reasons. There are some men who at public meetings of ecclesiastical bodies, of the American Board, &c, are always ready, when an opportunity offers, to propose prayer. They rise in their places and remark in this way, "Mr. Chairman, this is an important subject, and before proceeding further I propose that some one be called on to lead in prayer." The chairman of course feels bound to call on the individual who proposed it, and I have heard it remarked by those present, "that is a cheap way of gaining a reputation for piety." Would it not be better for the chairman to make the proposition when needed, and then call on some minister present. My readers will pardon the digression, as it was caused by the association of other things.—N. Y. Evang.

A Lesson for Conferential Bodies.—An important lesson may be learned by religious deliberative bodies, from the London Convention. We refer to the devotional spirit which prevailed in all their sessions. The first hour of every session was uniformly occupied in religious exercises—such as reading God's Word, singing, prayer and exhortation. It is customary with all religious bodies, we believe, to open their sessions with prayer; but it is seldom that sufficient time is allowed for such exercises to warm the heart and expand the soul with that charity so necessary on such occasions. What Christian has not been pained to see the careless manner in which the opening prayers of Conference sessions are sometimes performed. How often is a brother called on to open the session by prayer, when the members are collected in groups talking on various topics, seemingly without any preparation to appear before the Lord;—a hymn is then sung—but more frequently only a verse or two—and a short formal prayer offered, and this too often is all the religious exercises there is during that session. Would it not be better as Christian ministers to spend time enough in the beginning of every session to draw our souls out to God, who is the source of all true wisdom and righteousness? Would it not be even a saving of time? The more we rely upon God in all our deliberations, and the more calm and resigned our spirits, the better we are prepared and the more successful we will be in transacting any business whatever. —Religious Telescope.

A third great meeting of the friends of the Evangelical Alliance was held on Thursday evening, in Exeter Hall, John Henderson, Esq., of Glasgow, in the chair.

The proceedings were commenced by the Rev. Dr. Massie, of Manchester, who gave out a hymn, and then read the forty-fifth Psalm, after which the Rev. Mr. Johnson, Presbyterian minister of Tullylish, Ireland, engaged in prayer.

"Topic 1.—That, inasmuch as this proposal for union originated, in a great degree, in the sense very generally entertained among Christians, of their grievous practical neglect of our Lord's "new command ment" to his disciples, to "love one another," in which offense the members of the Alliance desire, with godly sorrow, to acknowledge their full participation—it ought to form one chief object of the Alliance to deepen in the minds of its own members, and, through their influence, to extend among the disciples of our Lord Jesus Christ generally, that conviction of sin and short-coming in this respect, which the blessed Spirit of God seems to be awakening throughout his Church; in order that, humbling themselves more and more before the Lord, may be stirred up to make full confession of their guilt at all suitable times, and to implore, through the merits and intercession of their merciful Head and Savior, forgiveness of their past offences, and Divine grace to lead them to the better cultivation of that brotherly affection which is enjoined upon all, who, loving the Lord Jesus Christ, are bound also to love one another, for the truth's sake, which dwelleth in them."

The Rev. John Tod Brown, Minister of the Established Church of Scotland, of Liverpool. If they looked at the Church in times past, they found she had been a chaos of contention, a cauldron of bitterness, a camp of controversy; sect struggling with sect; doctor defying doctor; denominations denouncing denominations; forgetting that love which they had thrust into a corner and made to weep at the spectacle; they had seen wrath, and malice, and anger, and bitterness, like a legion of fiends, lording it over professing and pure Protestant Christendom to such an extent, that instead of the evil of Babylon, they had the folly and the fatality of Babel. They ought to weep day and night that Christians had been thus "hateful and hating one another." Let them suppose that that teeming Hall, and that magnificent assembly, were miraculously raised to the third heaven; let them suppose that having been thus landed in front of the palace of the Great King, that roof and those walls should vanish away and they should find themselves before the glorious and great white throne, beaming with dazzling light, and that they should join in an oratorio from the harps of ten thousand angels, ravishing soul and sense: would not a flame of love, gleaming from the eye of the glorious humanity of Emanuel, be kindled in each heart? Would not each heart resound with strains of congratulation? And, when they were again lowered to the dingy atmosphere of what man called earth, the remembrance of what they had heard sung there would so soften their differences and disagreements, that it would quench disputation and kindle a flame of love—it would annihilate anger, and engender good will—sinking trifles, and uniting them upon transcendental truths; a union glowing with holiness, and thenceforth they should breathe the atmosphere of peace. And that, and nothing short of that greatest, grandest, and most Godlike achivement, was the cardinal aim of the Evangelical Alliance.

The Rev. M'Owan, said,———

Sir, I hail the formation of the Evangelical Alliance as the dawn of a brighter era than the Church of God in the world has ever yet beheld. Among the blessed results which I anticipate from this Evangelical Alliance, I mention but a few when I enumerate the deepening of our personal piety, the revival of the work of God in our respective Churches, the enlargement and increased success of our missionary societies, and the destruction of whatever is unchristian in spirit or in doctrine. But, sir, in order to realize these and kindred results, we must, if we mean to promote the great design of this Alliance, be at pains individually to secure a vital union with the Lord Jesus Christ. This is essentially a religious movement—a godly Alliance. The Lord Jesus is the great centre of unity, and the only source of spiritual love. If we are not joined to him by a living faith, it is impossible that we should add either to the strength, or beauty, or unity of that spiritual temple of which he is "chief corner-stone." If we are not vitally united to Christ, we are not of his body, and consequently we can neither enjoy nor transmit that fellow feeling which thrills through every member. If we are not vitally united to the Lord Jesus, we belong to the unshapen, lifeless, cold mass in the quarry; or, at best, we are but isolated and unpolished stones, lying in the vicinity of the temple, mingling with the dust, and obstructing the operations of the great Master-builder in rearing the spiritual temple. Sir, the unity we seek to promote implies love—the love of the brethren; and all who understand true religion know that the love of the brethren emanates from the love of God, and that love of God is never shed abroad in our hearts till we believe in the Lord Jesus Christ with our hearts unto righteousness. "Without me," says our common Head and Master, 'ye can do nothing," and if we can do nothing that He can account a spiritual service, and rewardable act, surely we cannot exercise and cultivate the chiefest of the three cardinal virtues—charity. O, my dear brethren, if we would be found helpers in this movement, let us seek and secure a personal union with the Lord Jesus Christ. This is our life; and let me say that this is the life of the Evangelical Alliance. We commenced this Alliance as Wesley and the first Methodists began the work they were instrumental in carrying on. They began, not by condemning others, but by condemning themselves. In this case we have done so. The "topic" that was last read speaks of confession." O, let us get into the dust! O, let us ascribe to God the glory of all the good that now exists in the Church, and take to ourselves the shame of all the evil and all the confusion. God only can help us in this great work.

The Rev. T. R. Birks, Rector of Kelshall, Oxfordshire, said. In the foundation of of the Evangelical Alliance, they had taken Christian love as the basis, and they had succeeded in rearing it to a prosperous and successful termination, and the top-stone had been brought out with shouting, saying, "Grace, grace unto it." What had been the consolation of one of the most ancient and most upright of the prophets, when he looked upon the Church and people, and saw the Church of God torn and scattered in Babylon? It was the knowledge that God would revive his work in the latter day. Daniel was comforted by the promises, which had been the stay and support of the Church for eighteen hundred years, that God would, by the diffusion of his Spirit in the latter day, bring the scattered parts of the Church into unity, peace, and love. Those promises were repeated time after time by their blessed Redeemer. There was no passage which taught humility more strongly than that which closed the parable of the Pharisee and the Publican—"Whosoever exalteth himself shall be abased; and he that humbleth himself shall be exalted." That was the strength of the present movement; and all who took a part in it must enter by that lowly portal, they must come in the spirit of deep humiliation. That was their only safeguard. There were many dangers on every side, and unless they were humble they would realize the suspicions which even some wise and good men had thrown out, that from the different materials collected together there would be so many jealousies and suspicions, so many differences on important, though subordinate truths, that they would not be brought into unity, or any approach to outward unity. What was their safety by which they could dissipate those fears and suspicions? It was by agreeing to enter by the lowly portal which the resolutions recognized.

The Rev. Andrew Thompson, minister of the Secession Church in Scotland, congratulated the meeting upon the spectacle before him. From every branch of the Church voices were heard—voices from the banks of the Thames from the banks of the Rhone, the Danube, the Mississippi, and the St. Lawrence; voices from Africa, and from Asia, were all heard speaking in sweetest unity on the leading principles of Christianity, and again and again and, as they deliberated, had they shown the spirit of the hymn—

"Ten thousand thousand are their tongues,
But all their hearts are one."

One of the most eminent and beloved fathers in God who was present on that platform, and who had taken great part in the deliberations of the Alliance, (he referred to Dr. Wardlaw, from Scotland,) had, in a biographical sketch of Dr. M'All, of Manchester, described the great truths as "the kernel of the Gospel; the kernel of the Gospel which the hand lays hold of in the day of conversion, and which it grasps more firmly in the hour of death." In the basis of the Alliance they had implanted the "kernel of the Gospel." He did not agree with some, who thought the basis a meagre or a mean thing. Why they had seen Methodism walking hand in hand with Calvinism; Independency with Presbyterianism, and Presbyterianism with both. They had seen them come from the outer circle of denominational differences, into the inner circle of saving and essential truth, and unite under the very shadow of the Sun of righteousness, as "members one of another." They must now divide about measure, not truths: in the name of Jesus they raised their banner, and written on it, in living, large, and illuminated characters, "The one faith, and the one hope of all the saints." He for one did, in no way, regret that there had been discussions, as it had proved to them and the Christian public, that the union was not mechanical, not one of course, but was the effect of conviction—the conviction of honest and independent minds. He anticipated no such thing as the breaking up of the Evangelical Alliance. When it commenced vigorous action, some incongruous particles might fly off, like the dust from a machine; but if they were true to their divine Master, it would go on increasing in numbers until it had brought into the sween of its action all the most pure of the Churches of the saints.

Topic II.—That the great object of the Evangelical Alliance be, to aid in manifesting, as far as practicable, the unity which exists among the true disciples of Christ; to promote their union by fraternal and devotional intercourse, to discourage all envyings, strifes, and divisions; to impress upon Christians a deeper sense of the great duty of obeying our Lord's command, to "love one another;" and to seek the full accomplishment of his prayer: "That they all may be one, as thou, Father, art in me, and I in thee; that they also may be one in us that the world may believe that thou hast sent me."

The Rev. Dr. Olin, President of the Wesleyan University, Connecticut, America, said,—He could not see upon what substantial or rational ground any wise and upright men could maintain a long contest; for they proposed to banish as far as they could from their hearts, and their communities, every feeling and act inconsistent with Christian charity. they proposed to do away with all the evils which disunion had so long inflicted on the Church; and contemplatieg the union on those principles, he could not see how Christians could object to co-operate with them, or at least justify a continued opposition to them. Wiser men than he had adopted the opinion, that controversies were a benefit to the Church; that Divine Providence had intrusted the development of some great religious truth to a certain party, in order that it might be brought out in greater prominence; but he thought that there was a shorter process of finding these great essential truths—that of referring to the word of God, from which they professed to draw their basis, or creed; those doctrines so plain that a wayfaring man might read and understand them. It had been alledged, that while they were contending against sects, they were only organizing another and larger sect—that while they professed to be contending for charity, they were in danger of falling into all the strife which had troubled their peace; but they were firmly and solemnly pledged to unite in the spirit of charity, and if they had any controversies, he trusted they would be conducted in the same manner as the discussions of that confederation of Christians. He could not see how men who maintained their own orthodoxy could wage a war long against the Evangelical Alliance, which held a creed as sound, and an orthodoxy as sound, as their own.

The Rev. Dr. Alder said the Rev. George Fische would next address the meeting in French, the Hon. A. Kinnaird having consented to act as interpreter.

The Rev. George Fische, of Geneva, said—He did not expect to address that assembly, and had not had time to collect his thoughts, but he would pour out before it, and before God, the feelings of his heart. The Christians was always at home, though he be five thousand miles from his own land. They would allow him to speak to them of a very small portion of the Christians family, namely, the little Church of which he had the happiness to be the pastor. On the eve of his departure, he assembled his flock to receive from them their instructions, what commission he should bear to that Alliance; and all hands were raised to convey to them the deep sympathy they bore to that Alliance. That Church in itself formed an Evangelical Alliance. Since its formation, its congregation had been composed of all denominations—Lutherans, Calvinists, Baptists, Pedo-Baptists, Dissenters, Established Churchmen—members of every denomination united in peace around the table of the Lord. But also in another respect that Church formed an Evangelical Alliance, inasmuch as it had received the Christian sympathy of the various denominations of this vast kingdom. If they were to run their eyes over the list of subscribers to the recently built church at Lyons, there would be seen the names of persons of every denomination; and, in that church, too, Roman Catholics were assembled. From the bottom of his heart, and with feelings of joy and gratitude, he stood before them to second that most glorious topic. They had formed an Alliance to discourage all strifes and divisions, and to seek the fulfillment of the prayer of Him who now prayed for them in heaven. They were but a small army, a small body, but they had prayers of Him who must prevail; they had in their hands the thunderbolts against which Satan could not stand—the thunderbolts of love.

The Rev. Octavius Winslow, of Leamington, said—There were times, when the greatness of an occasion, and the deep and intense feeling which that occasion inspired, forced one to adopt the language of the poet—

"Come, thou expressive silence,
For thou canst best express the feelings of my soul."

He felt overwhelmed with the vastness of that occasion; but, praying for the grace of the Lord, he would endeavor to express his opinion of its magnitude. What mystic power had attracted those kindred particles of the one Church from every part of the Christian globe? What mystic word was it that had almost enabled every Englishman to understand, without an interpreter, the language which had flowed from those eloquent lips in a language with which most of them were unacquainted? It was that small but mystic word—love.

Having but a few moments to address them, he would refer more especially to what he conceived would be the grand practical result from the holy Evangelical Alliance. It would place the Church in a position for the examination of revealed truths which she had never before occupied, from the time of her primitive and holy existence. They had been so surrounded by the fogs, and mists, and dust, which collision and controversy created, that they had not been in a position to examine the great and glorious truths revealed in their common Christianity. He anticipated a more enlarged spiritual development of the grand doctrine of Christianity, springing from that one grand cause—the love of Christ shed abroad in their hearts—binging those hearts together, and bearing them on side by side, candidly and consistently to look at those grand truths, and so bring them out and place them before a Christ-denying world, as the great truths on which they all agreed. There was nothing so calculated to bring men's minds in harmony with truth, and to carefully weigh and sift those evidences, as the love of God shed abroad in their hearts: it would have more effect in converting the infidel scoffer and schismatic opponent, than at housand volumes of Paley bearing all the evidences of the truth of Christianity; for while hatred to God dwelt in their hearts, they would never receive the truth of Christianity and divine revelation. One ray of love coming from the heart of Him, whose name and essence was love, would do more to bring them to understand the truth, which came from heaven than all the volumes which had been compiled to prove it.

The Rev. Wm. Toase, of Paris, gave out a hymn.

The Rev. W. W. Ewbank, incumbent of St. Stephen's Everton, said—The desire of such an Evangelical Union as this is no new thing in the hearts of Christian men. Shortly after joining this Alliance, I was struck with a letter written from the continent, by that excellent servant of God, the late Rev. Mr. Fletcher, of Madeley. It was addressed to a distinguished friend in England, and its especial purpose was the formation of an alliance similar to the present. Mr. Fletcher told his friend he had been much struck by a story from a poor man in one of the Swiss mountains. "The Swiss cows," said the man, "oftentimes fight, the one with the other, while they find the wolves abroad: but, when they feel in danger from their natural enemies, they directly form themselves into a firm and compact phalanx for the common safety." "It is very hard," observes Mr. Fletcher, "that the Alphine cows can have the sense to do this, and that Christians in England cannot have as much sense to band together against the world, the flesh and the devil." * * * * * I heard a friend state, that one objection to the union was, its drawing together heterogenous persons. Now, without entering deeply into derivation, what does the word mean? It means "of another genus." But I maintain that our magnet will only attract particles of the real steel. There may be a man who has in his constitution some tin, or copper, or brass: if he has nothing more than this we cannot draw him; but if he possesses the slightest particle of the real metal which the magnet can act upon, he may be attracted and attached to us. Our first and great object is, to do away, as much as possible, with the divisions of the Church of Christ. Love brought Christ to the earth; and nothing great has ever been done on the earth without the influence of love. I will go further than my friend, Mr. Noel: he said we should not fail: I say, we have succeeded. We have been blessed of God already, and he will still further vouchsafe his blessing to his own work.

The Rev. Dr. Brown, Moderator of the Free Church of Scotland, said, that Alliance was based upon a large portion of Gospel truth; and he took it as a token of the revival of God's truth among themselves and in every quarter of the world, when so many men, of so many different denominations, had been found to exist in agreement of so much of God's truth—that they had manifested a great constancy in the maintenance of that truth—and that their earnest and anxious desire that the agreement, and that that truth should be proclaimed throughout the world. That was said to be the age of discoveries; and the Alliance was a great and remarkable discovery—a great, a glorious, an important, and a most satisfactory discovery which would be attended with the most important and practical results, as it showed to the world that they were agreed on so many essential points of Gospel truth, and because they were so, that they had so much of Christian love in them. He trusted that every member of the Alliance had great faith in the efficacy of prayer—prayer which was the natural language of the renewed and redeemed soul. They had special promises that in answer would be given to faithful and believing prayer; and he believed that they might entertain the confident expectation that, in answer to the prayers of that Alliance, the spirit of love and truth would be more and more diffused in their hearts, and that they would have an increase of unity from year to year.

The Rev. Dr. Alder, then read the next topic as follows:

"Topic III.—That, in furtherance of this object, the Alliance shall receive such information respecting the progress of vital religion in all parts of the world as Christian brethren may be disposed to communicate; and that a correspondence be opened and maintained with Christian brethren in different parts of the world, especially with those who may be engaged, amidst peculiar difficulties and opposition, in the cause of the Gospel, in order to afford them all suitable encouragement and sympathy and to diffuse an interest in their welfare."

The Rev. Dr. Archer, of London, was prepared to assert, that the people were more ready for Christian union than the ministers of the Church. The people of the Church looked at the points of differences as a means of keeping them apart; the ministers looked upon them as matters which they were to expound and dwell upon; and they had done so until they had lost their influence. They ought to regard the great truths of the Gospel of their blessed Master, rather as spiritual things on which they were to live, by which they were to be fed, nutured, and comforted, than as matters of controversial discussion and bitter antagonistic display. If they were to go to their pulpits and preach the love of Christ—getting their logic not from their heads but from their spirits—using rhetoric not of the imagination and of the schools, but the rhetoric which flowed from hearts steeped in love to the cross of Christ, how different would their preaching be! He did not look upon the powers of rhetoric and oratory with contempt. Let them go to Parnassus, and cull their flowers there; let them go to Helicon, and be inspired with its poetry; but never let them forget that the fairest, and richest, and most fragrant flower of all was the Rose of Sharon: and if they transplanted that glorious flowers into their sermons, they would be endued with so rich and beauteous a fragrance, that every spirit would be inspired with love to it and to each other. They would preach the truth and feel the truth—and preach the truth because they felt it, and as they fear it. Again, let them have more intercommunion with each other. It had been said,

"'Tis distance leads enchantment to the view."

It was nothing of the kind with regard to them; the nearer they came to each other the more they would be enchanted, the more distant they remained the more their difficulties augmented. When they came to meet under the same roof, and blend their hearts at the same altar, and offer up their supplications to the throne of God in unison, there was not the most intense Presbyterian, with the banner of the covenant flaming before him, who was not ready to make advances to his former opponents. There was a magic sympathy—a freemasonary in Christian love; the living truth which effaced and merged down all differences, which made them glow and melt with love when they came to know each other's hearts. And when men told him they had done nothing, he would say they had done much, more than they expected, more than they dared to hope for; they had drawn from heaven the archetype of love; they had washed their hearts as they would be washed when they should stand before the throne of Love; and had felt the magic of that love which was stronger to bring them together and keep them together, than their passions were to keep them apart. His next point was, that they must all be prepared to make sacrifices; they must recollect that the man who differed from them had as much right to ask them to make sacrifices as they had to ask him: they forgot that he had certain principles which they believed to be true, if he had upon theirs.

The Rev. M. Kuntze, of Berlin, said. He had been much struck that day and the day before, by hearing so many dialects—he had heard the dialects of Scotland, of Ireland, of England, of America—and then he heard the broken accents of the foreigner; they might have sounded harsh to the ears of an Englishman, but it was sweet music to his heart; for there was always heard unity; love, and harmony. The Evangelical Alliance was not a new thing in his country. He had traveled through Germany, and had stood in the pulpits of the Lutheran, the Calvinist, and the Moravian, and preached everywhere the same Gospel; and wherever he met with the brethren they were ready to shake hands with him. When he came to England, he met with the Moravian or Baptist, and found that they all agreed on the main points of doctrine. He might be asked why he came to that country, if they had already an Evangelical Alliance in his own land! It was because the Christians of this country had first proclaimed it to the world; they had brought it into a system, in order that the glorious truths of unity and harmony might be spread over all the world. That Evangelical Alliance would bring great peace to the Church; but there would still be strifes and envyings, for, from all time, the seed of the serpent had been against the seed of the woman, and it was said that its animosity would be more and more open in the latter day.

The Rev. Th. Froissart, of Nismes, France, said. That Evangelical Alliance had done him much good, and humbled him, for he must confess that he had not loved his brethren spiritually enough or earnestly enough. It had comforted and encouraged him: he had been despondent under the divisions which had afflicted the Church. It had roused him, for it seemed as if a new heaven had been opened to his view, and that they were setting up a window by which they might peep into heaven, for he that "loved was born of God, was known of God, and was loved of God." He bore testimony to the integrity and sincerity which had distinguished the proceedings of the Alliance; he had feared that they might concede some particle of vital truth, but they had not done so. His reverend brother, Adolph Monod, had shown how each nation was marked out by its character to take a peculiar part in that Alliance; he thought that each sect was also marked with its peculiar character, that each sect was chosen for a time to bring out a great truth; that they were the natural results of this religious liberty and faithfulness. Without giving too much effect to what he was going to say, he must say that he admired in the brethren of the Church of England, order and dignity—in the Wesleyans, burning zeal—in the Moravian, burning and tender love—in the Independent, a feeling of the eternity of the Church—in the Quaker, great Christian philanthropy—in the German Christians, sense—in the French Christian, fidelity under persecution. In conclusion he invited any of the brethren who should visit the south of France to visit Nismes, where his pulpit should be at their command, and if they could not speak French he would interpret for them.

The Rev. Dr. Morrison, of Chelsea, said,—If his heart did deceive him, he felt that he loved all who loved the Lord Jesus Christ in sincerity and truth; and he did not understand how he could love all who so loved the Lord Jesus Christ, without being ready by every proper expression to manifest that Christian love, which he believed the grace of God had put into his heart and he did rejoice, that he did not seem to live in the element of the Evangelical Alliance; and he would have been peculiarly guilty if he had lived in any other, for he was trained among persons remarkable for Christian love. More than that, he had conducted a Christian organ—which had as large a circulation as almostall of the religious periodicals—and he was prepared to meet a challenge that he had ever written, in the most trying times, any article at variance with the spirit of that Alliance. They were now entering into a new era of the Christian Church, and it became all, who were right-minded and right-hearted, not to be content with not doing any thing against the Alliance, but to do every thing they could properly to help on that cause. It rested with them to prove to the people their sincerity. They had put their hands to the Gospel plough, and, having put their hands to it, let them not look back. He did love, and would love, his brethren in Christ, of whatever name or denomination they might be; and he was ready, in every fit way, and on every occasasion, to manifest that inward affection which he felt.

The proceedings of the meeting were closed by a hymn, and the Rev. Mr. La Trobe pronouncing the bendiction.

FOREIGN NEWS.

From the N. Y. Sun.

ELEVEN DAYS LATER FROM EUROPE.

The steamer Great Western, Captain Matthews, from Liverpool 31st ult., arrived here last evening. The steamer Hibernia, with news of he capture of Monterey, arrived at Liverpool on the 29th ulto.

It is stated that Mr. Mackintosh, the contractor and army accoutrement maker, has undertaken to float and bring off the Great Britain from the position in Dundrum Bay, where she still lies.

There has been an advance on the price of bread, one halfpenny on the quarter loaf.

At the late meeting of the Repeal Association at Dublin, Mr. John O'Connel alluded in his speech to the distress occasioned by the tempest, having kept the vessels with food away from the shores of Ireland. The famishing condition of the people is very fearful. The latest accounts of the potatoe are more gloomy. Only one fourth of a crop will be secured. The government is making arrangements to supply the Irish poor with seed rye and barley as a temporary substitute for the next year's crop of potatoes.

The dowager countess of Liverpool, died suddenly from disease of the heart. The entries of American produce are greater than was expected, in one day in London, 75,000 bushels of wheat was entered, with flour and provisions proportionate.

Mr. Jay, the grerat dissenting preacher of Bath, has married at the age of 77, a lady with £30,000.

The British Goverment are bringing all their vast resources to the aid of the Irish poor; and the drain on the English purse is seen in a tight money market and exports of gold and silver to America.

Revolutions in Switzerland seem to be the order of the day. Basle has followed the example of Geneva, and the Radicals monopolise the Town Council.

The French government have granted 5,000,000 francs, to repiar damage done by recent inundations, and to relieve the distressed.

France, in the south, has been visited with an awful calamity. Part of its population have been swept into death, and the property of whole districts has been carried to the ocean. So awful a calamity has suspended the proposed festivities on the arrival of the Duc de Montpensier and his royal bride. M. Guizot has taken upon himself the merit or blame of the marriage of the King's youngest son to the Queen of Spain's sister, and it is suggested that the state may appoint a new minister for the purpsse of conciliating England and the continental powers.

WESTERN RECORDER.

PUTNAM, OHIO.

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 21, 1846.

"Radical Church."—This is the name assumed by a small secession from the Wabash Conference of the M. P. Church. In publishing the Minutes of said Conference, a few weeks ago, the names of five preachers were entered as withdrawn. Three others, we believe who united at the same conference, also identified themselves with the secession, and with sundry lay brethren, forthwith organized themselves into what they have termed the "Radical Church." The reason given for their secession, and separate organization, is that the M. P. Church "in all her general assemblies was determined to remain Pro Slavery.'! The Minutes of their proceedings have been sent us for publication, and it would be a pleasure to us to do the brethren any favor. But if they cannot avoid ringing the familiar changes in reference to a "pro slavery Church," "slaveholding Church," &c. we do not deem it our duty to publish for them.

But whilst we are unwilling that any thing abusive of the M. P. Church should appear in our columns, we assure those brethren that we are equally unwilling that any writer should through the same medium, abuse or misrepresent them. Most of the brethren of this new organization, are personally known to us, and several of them we number with our old friends. And whilst we differ from them in reference to the necessity of setting up for themselves, we do not question their sincerity, or the uprightness of their intentions. We certainly wish them well, but the brethren will please accept of our expression of opinion, that if they adopt the denunciatory system used by some folks, they will not prosper. Here are the appointments of the preachers, as reported to us officially:

President—Hiram Griggs.
Wabash Ct.—Benj. Allen, J. Dollarhide.
Eagle Mission—E. Horner, W. W. Rigdon.
Newcastle—D. M. Cannady.
London—B. Tout.
Conference Missionary—C. Jeffries.
An array of nominal Missions, nine in number, left to be supplied.

Revival.—We are gratified to learn of reviving seasons and ingatherings to the church, in several adjoining, and contiguous Circuits. At a recent Quarterly meeting of Cambridge Ct. at Hoskinsville, we are informed, a goodly number of conversions took place. Brs. Winn, Lawson and Ensminger, inform us of ingatherings within their several charges. Particulars from those brethren, next week.

We learn by the 'Telescope,' as per letter of our old friend S. J. Brown of Cincinnati, that the United Brethren in that city have recently enjoyed a very cheering revival. Numerous conversions have taken place, and the 'brethren' begin to feel the need of another house of worship.

Apology.—We are sorry to receive information that some numbers of our paper have got out to subscribers, defective in the impression. We certainly have spared no expense either in materiels or apparatus, for executing a first rate paper of the kind. And if occasion has existed for the complaint referred to, we will endeavor vigilantly to see, that no such occasion again occurs.

Correction.—Br. Jewett, of Columbus writes us that a few errors appeared in his article as published last week, effecting the sense. In the 19th line from the top, 'only tries,' should be "only lives to deprecate the practice." In the third line from the bottom, read "die with the medication," instead of 'mortification.' Again—"While others use us the lancet," the 'us' should not occur. We regret these and every other error that occurs in our paper. And whilst we promise amendment wherein we come short, we must kindly request our old friend, and some others, to take a little more pains with their manuscript. In regard to the first two errors above named, we think any Philadelphia lawyer would have read the copy just as we did. The third error must have been ours. Write again Dr. and let us try again.

Rev. W. G. Fowler.—This brother some time since notified the President of the Ohio District that he thought necessary to decline assuming the responsibilities of his appointment by the last Conference. We are gratified to learn however, by private letter, from Br. F. that he had subsequently taken charge of his Circuit, (Buford Ct.) and he observes that 'prospects are by no means discouraging.' Br. F. and a number of excellent friends in B. circuit, have a warm place in our affections, and we shall be glad to learn that they do not faint by the way. Br. F. we trust, be encouraged to look for good times, this season.

Rev. Israel Thrap.—We learn that this brother has again been severely afflicted with congestive fever. His colleague, Br. Scott writes us, that his case was for some time a stubborn one, but that medical skill by the blessing of God has been successful in breaking his disease, and it is hoped he will recover. In severe affliction, we are told, Br. T. found the consolations of religion precious.

Thomas Clarkson.—This distinguished philanthropist, died at his residence, near Ipswich, Eng. on the 26th Sept. 1846, at the advanced age of eighty-six. He was an early and persevering foe of slavery and the slave trade. Through countless difficulties and opposition, he pursued his humane objects, till he happily succeeded in procuring the abolition of the latter by England and France, and then the former, throughout the British domain. His death is generally lamented; but especially by the Society of Friends, of which he was a member, yet more particularly by the people of color, who regard him as a benefactor of their race.

Reformation Begun.—Our readers may recollect that a few weeks ago, we had an article on the reformation of the press. We directed attention to the spirited labors of the Saturday Evening Post to procure the suppression of immoral publications, and especially the late work of Eugene Sue, published in numbers by the house of the 'Harpers.' We are glad to be enabled to announce upon the authority of the last number of the 'Post' that 'Harper and Brothers' have relinquished the publication of any further numbers of "Martin, or the Foundling." These gentlemen can never lose by this excellent determination. They will meet with a two fold patronage for the numerous valuable and useful works issued from their press. Our readers will rejoice with us, in this triumph of virtue. Let public sentiment frown upon the vile trash that is peddled through the country, with the semblance, and the name of cheap literature, and with the Harpers to set the example, we shall soon have a purified press.

Luther and the Great Reformation.—A copy of a discourse with this title has been sent us by the politeness of the Exclesior Society of Wittenburg College, Springfield, O. It comprises an intersting sketch of the life and Character of the great Reformer, and of the Reformation.

Here is a specimen of the style of Luther, furnished by Mr. Hall.

Hear how he treats the golden Bull of Pope Clermont, who proffers peace at the sacrifice of conscience!

"The Pope tells us, in answer, that he is willing to throw open the golden doors. It is long since we opened all doors in Germany. But these Italian Scaramouches have never restored a farthing of the gain they have made by their indulgences, dispensations, and other diabolic inventions. Good Pope Clement, all your clemency and gentleness won't pass here. We'll buy no more indulgences, goldden doors and golden bulls; get ye home again. Look to the Italians for payment; they who know you, will buy no more. Thanks be to God, we know that they who possess and believe the Gospel, enjoy an uninterrupted jubilee. Excellent Pope, what care we for your Bulls. You may save your seals and your parchments; they are in bad odor now-a-days.

Hear him once more on his favorite article of justification by faith.—"Well, then, I, Doctor Martin Luther, an unworthy Evangelist of our Lord Jesus Christ, do confess this article, that faith alone, without works, justifies in the sight of God; and I declare, that in spite of the Emperor of the Romans, the Emperor of the Turks, the Emperor of the Tartars, the Emperor of the Persians, the Pope, all the Cardinals, Bishops, Priests Monks Nuns Kings, Princes, Nobles all the Worlds, all the Devils, it shall stand unshaken forever." Well might Jean Paul Richer say, "his words were half battles."

"Christian Souvenir."—This is said to be the title of a new Monthly Magazine published at Philadelphia. We have observed notices of it in some of our exchanges, but through some oversight the publishers have not done themselves the honor of sending us a specimen number, though we recive nearly all the Magazines in the country. A circular however has just reached us, stating that the subscription price is only one dollar per year—that engravings accompany each number—to be issued promptly on the first of each month. The style of the work is said to be 'attractive,' and its 'contents conformed to the spirit and law of Christianity.' Any one sending 3 subscribers with the $3 in advance; will receive a useful family book as a premium. For five subscribers and $5, a finely illustrated copy of the 'Pilgrim's Progress' will be furnished, or a copy of Snethen's Sermons. For ten subscribers, with the pay, both the above works, and an additional premium will be given. We see that our friend, Rev. A. A. Lipscomb is an Associate Editor. This circumstance alone will commend the work to a numerous portion of our readers. As Magazines of fiction and fashion are so much the order of the day, we are glad to learn that the 'Souvenir,' is to claim a place as one of the few religious Monthlies. We wish it great success. Any of our friends who choose, may make us their agent, by sending the name and the dollar, and we will be pleased to do what we can to advance the interests of the work.

The American Pulpit, for November, came to hand this week, and is as usual, a treasure of good things. One whole sermon, and two sketches of sermons occupy this number. We have two or three sermons from this work, on choice subjects, in reserve, which we desire to place before our readers. when we get through with some lengthy matters. The 'Pulpit' is a neat and useful work, worthy the patronage of all denominations. Published at Worcester, Mass, at $1, per year. Address Samuel Chism.

The Anti-Jesuit.—This work is quite improved. The second number of the new volume is before us, containing the finest portrait of John Wickliff we have seen. The life of that reformer is given in this number—and is the first of a series of lives of the Reformers, to be given in this work, with accompanying portraits. We wish Br. Sparry a good patronage. Only $1, per year, in advance. Nassau St. N. York.

☞Br. Pelan reminds us that we omitted to publish the notice of his quarterly meeting. We thought him under a mistake, till we examined the file. We use great exertions to be accurate and prompt. But there is so much laid upon us that we find it will not do to trust our memory a moment. Br. P. we regret the omision and think it will not happen thus again.

Godey's Lady's Book, for December, is a very fine affair. A new ornamental title page. The Beau's Stratagem, The excursion, The Lady Equestrian, Music &c., are some of its attractions. The "book" has more embellishments than any other of the fashionable Magazines. Great improvements are promised for 1847. Terms, $3, per year, in advance. Two copies for $5. Louis A. Godey, publisher, Philad.

Rev. Philip Munger.—The Olive Branch notices the death of this gentleman. He was a member of the Maine Conference, M. E. Church, and one of the oldest ministers of that denomination.

Ladies' National Magazine.—The December number, is before us. It contains three fine engravings. The best is a portrait of Mrs. Stephens. Among the improvements promised for 1847, are, Domestic and Scriptural Scenes, a Floral Department &c. C. J. Peterson, publisher, Philadelphia. $2 per year in advance.

The Generals.—Gen. Gaines is said to be 68 years of age; Gen. Scott, 64; General Taylor about 59.

John Grim, a revolutionary soldier, died near Winchester, Va. Aged 94.

The Waynesville Accident.—The name of the locomotive engineer killed a week or two ago, on the Little Miami Rail Road, was Wm. G. Farmer. He is said to have been a young man of excellent character.

Human Magnetism.—Mr. I. I. Keely has been entertaining the citizens of Zanesville, for the week past, upon the merits of this novel science. He holds forth each evening, in lectures and demonstrations, at what is called the Senate Chamber, (Stacy's.) We embraced the opportunity of attending on Wednesday evening, and found that the lecturer understands well his subject. A number of satisfactory experiments were performed, challenging the credulity of those who doubt or oppose. A part of the experiments were too amusing to suit the feelings of the grave and thinking portion of the audience. This was the only objection we have heard offered. Mr. K. insists that Human Magnetism is to be found very beneficial as a remedial agent, in cases of blindness, deafness, rheumatism and nervous head ache. A number present, afflicted with partial deafness, were magnetized, and professed to have been partially relieved. We have just noticed in the Ohio Statesman, a report of a committee of citizens of Columbus, in reference to performances by Mr. Keely whilst in that city a few days ago. They give the names of seven partially deaf, and one partially blind, who have been more or less benefitted by the experiments of Mr. K. The Committee are, Gen. Stockton, Dr. J. B. Thompson, and W. W. Ripley Dentist. The last named gentleman, extracted a tooth of a lady, whilst under magnetic influence, without any indication of pain on her part, or knowledge of the operation until aroused. For five dollars, Mr. K. undertakes to initiate any one into the entire mysteries of the science, with the ability to perform the same experiments with himself.

Boston Olive Branch.—This popular, and widely circulated sheet, comes to us this week in a new dress of type, and with a new ornamental head. The number for Nov. 7, did not reach us—missed it very much. Can we be favored to receive it yet? Got the 14th.

Fatal Accident.—As William Lacy was trimming the light on board the Light Ship stationed near the mouth of Port Tobacco Creek, he fell to the deck, forty feet, and broke his neck.

The death of Commodore Nicholson of the U. S. Navy an officer much beloved and esteemed occurred on Sunday night at Washington. He died of apoplexy. He was a printer by profession, but his genius led him into the navy. The flags of the Navy Yard were at half mast, as a token of respect for his memory.

Bulwer and the People.—Sir Edward Lyiton Bulwer, relinquishing his wanderings in the region of romance, and having abandoned the errors of his youth, is becoming an active philanthropist. At a late dinner in Hertfordshire given by the Herts Agricultural Society, he distinguished himself by his rational remarks upon the useful purposes which assemblages of the people might tend to promote, and he spoke also with practical earnestness upon the promotion and improvement of the agricultural interests.

[COMMUNICATED.]

Mr. Editor: In giving the enclosed Circular a place in your paper, you will confer a favor on the public, and be the means of inducing many of the old pioneers of the West, (who are fast going from among us) to comply with the request of the society, in rescuing many interesting incidents of the first settlers from oblivion.

Yours, J. C. Guthrie.

CINCINNATI HISTORICAL SOCIETY.

This Society was established for the purpose of collecting and preserving in one place, and in a permanent form the fragments of the early history of the Great West that are now scattered throughout her broad and magnificent region and exposed to oblivion by the death of the aged, who have facts still in remembrance; the forgetfulness of the young who have traditions of facts but feel not the importance of keeping them in recollection, and by changes constantly taking place that tend to the destruction of such document as may be of essential service. Such an object cannot fail to receive the hearty response of every person who looks back upon what we have been, and forward to the glorious prospect before us. This Great Valley possesses a fruitfulness of Soil, grandeur of Scenery, and every natural advantage unsurpassed by any portion of the Earth, and is destined to be the residence of many millions of people enjoying abundance of physical comforts, and the riches of true mental developments. We shall pass away, but generations will come after us; they will behold, from the great Gulf on the South, to the unequalled Lakes on the North, one sublime spectacle of human happinesss: and while kindled with pleasurable emotions by the scene, will anxiously enquire for the history of their ancestors, and the toils, privations, sufferings, dauntless energy and heroic courage that laid the foundation of this splendid structure of civilization, intelligence and felicity. Shall they ask in vain? Shall they reproach us for our slothfulness in permitting the data for an ample history to pass into oblivion? Let us, then, improve the opportunity now presented for discharging our duty to them. The trouble is but little, and the pleasure of the persuit will be more than an adequate remuneration. We have all heard of Greece and Rome, and know that the sages of their periods of greatness could find only fabulous accounts of their ancestors. Their primative generations were excusable for suffering the lamp of their pioneer history to be extinguished, as letters had not been invented, nor the darkness of barbarism dispelled. We have no such excuse. We have the printing press in all its glory; distant people are brought into a single neighborhood by the power of steam, and the electric wire that conveys the news with lighining-velocity. Let us, then, thoroughly perform the task of collecting the elements of a perfect history.

There must be—there is—we know, an immense amount of historical information hidden from the public eye; and to collect the memorials of the past and present, the Cincinnati Historical Society appeal for aid to all, and to you personally to assist in collecting them, that justice may be done to the past, the present and the future.

1st. Difficulty of procuring Materials.—To accomplish our object, we very much need, and depend on you and other individual assistance. The written and published matter relating to the history of the West, is not voluminous; but it is scattered so widely, and has, most of it, been so long out of print that the great difficulty is in getting a copy of it. For this purpose we invite the attention of all those who look with pride upon the doings of our pioneer fathers and the civil institutions which they established here, to forward any volumes or matter they can, relating to our history.

2nd. Necessity of Such a Collection.—There is not, so far as we know, a single library in the West where all the works relating to its early occupation may be found. They are scattered throughout the country; but, perhaps, nowhere collected in one library. Many of them are to be found upon the shelves of private libraries one volume in a place, not valued in itself, because too meagre and imperfect, and are thus suffered to remain in obscurity until finally dispersed or lost. We wish to arrest this process, by collecting and preserving them; although a single pamphlet, or book, is not an object of much importance, but when a thousand books are united they derive value from each other, forming a complete department of history.

3d. Kind of Materials Wanted.—It is not in printed books alone that history is to be found; all manuscripts, or copies of manuscripts of a historical or biographical character, or which will serve to illustrate, in any way, the deeds, habits, manners, customs and pursuits of the pioneers and early settlers; files of old newepapers or odd numbers; scraps of newspapers containing personal incidents, obituary notices or narrations, letters, or copies of letters of the same time; magazines, reviews, and other periodical publications; journals of Congress, legislatures, general assemblies, conventions, public bodies etc, etc; especially those that have been published on account of their historical value, or relating to the Indians, or travels, or discoveries, or expeditions to examine the country; facts respecting the navigation of the western waters; statistical documents, or tables of population, meteorological observations, agriculture, commerce, manufacture, etc; topographical descriptions of cities, towns, counties, states, etc; reports, descriptions, and doings of benevolent political, literary, religious, or other associations; historical works, relating to American history, or subjects in any way connected with it; old maps of all kinds, no matter how much dilapidated, they will be valuable to us; portraits, views of cities, towns, antiquities, buildings, or curiosities in the West, will be particularly acceptable, as we wish to make a collection of the portraits of persons deserving our country's regard; the stories of pioneers, reduced to writing; the first settlement of your town, city or county—when it took place, whence came the emigrants, what peculiar circumstances attend the location; your first churches, schools, mills, court houses; notices of prominent settlers deceased; of the hardships and dangers they underwent. Every thing of this nature will be within the scope of our design; because valuable not only to ourselves and our fellow citizens, but to all posterity. Shall we ask for such materials in vain? There is no one who cannot furnish something. We hope all will forward, at once, such as they may be willing to part with.

4th. The Indians.—We are particularly desirous to do justice to our predecessors, the Indians; and for that purpose, shall endeavor to snatch the few fragments concerning them, still in existence among the whites, before they are irretrievably lost. We wish to collect the early Indian treaties before 1784, and such facts as you may personally know, or can collect from others, respecting their prominent chiefs, sachems, and orators; their sons and civil regulations, habits, rites, customs, implements, dress, etc; their wars, ancient residence, numbers, ancestry, alliance, and present condition.

5th. Race of the Mounds.—Are there, within your vicinity or knowledge, ancient mounds, walls, ditches, pyramids, or excavations which you can describe, with the implements or utensils found in them? If you are unable to give a drawing, and description in detail, will you inform us where they are situated, and who would be likely to give us an account of them, as we wish to make a catalogue, and mark their localities on a map?

6th. Catalogue of Books, Maps, etc.—The society are preparing as complete a catalogue as possible, of books, pamphlets, maps, etc, relating to American, and more particularly, Western History, statistics, and antiquites; giving the title, name of the author and publisher; when and where published, etc, and remarks on the authenticity, especially if its statements are thought to be incorrect or fabulous: we hope, therefore, none will omit to communicate such facts as they are in possession of, that will aid in completing the list.

7th. Our Publications.—We expect to be able to publish the most valuable manuscripts that come into our posession, and to reprint many of those rare and ancient historical works and pamphlets, no longer to be found in book stores.

8th. Newspapers.—Editors may do us much good, with little labor, by forwarding to our address all newspapers that contain articles of the kind above alluded to, to be preserved and arranged in our library, and for such favors, they will be remembered in our distribution.

9th. Deposits or Loans.—Persons possessing books, volumes of newspapers, original manuscripts, letters, papers, etc, and do not feel willing or at liberty to part with them, may make a special deposit of them, taking a receipt for the same, and having the liberty to withdraw the same at pleasure.

10th. How to Forward.—Communications, when sent by mail, may be directed to the society, care of A. Randall, librarian. Packages the same, care of R. Buchanan, No. 26 Columbia st, between Main and Sycamore.

Those who forward any manuscripts, documents, or information, above alluded to, will receive, in such manner as they may direct, equivalent publications of our own.

By giving your particular attention to the preceding requests, you will greatly promote the cherished object of this association. We hope you will not neglect to forward a single page of manuscript, letter, scrap or fact that you may have from its trivial appearance, disconnected from others, but forward it at once, for it may correct some error in our history.

If you cannot furnish anything, will you inform us of the existence of such materials as are within your knowledge, or of any person that would be likely to.

Respectfully, your obedient servant,

A. Randall

SCIENTIFIC.

LE VERRIER'S PLANET.

By Professor Olmsted, of Yale College.

Although this body is equal in brightness only a star of the eighth magnitude, and will therefore never be visiable to the naked eye, or bear any important relations to our world, yet the mode of its discovery, evincing as it does, the great reach of mathematical analysis, in penetrating the arcana of nature, renders it one of the noblest triumphs of modern astronomy. Here a body, thirty-six hundred miles from us, sends to us the feeble light of a telescopic star, which is not only recognized as beloning to our solar system, but its solitary dwelling-place in the depths of space was shadowed forth to the mathematician in his closet, before even the largest telescopes had revealed its existence. Let us see by what successive steps this extraordinary result was reached. We must keep in mind that, in accordance with the law of universal gravitation, every body in the solar system attracts every other and tends to disturb its motions. Such large bodies for example, as Jupiter and Saturn, exert so powerful an attraction, that their influence is felt at a vast distance, extending even to the planet Uranus, and alternately accelerating and retarding its progress around the sun. Now the nature and intensity of a force can be estimated from its effects, and the weight or quantity of matter in Saturn or Jupiter, and even its distance at any given time from Uranus, might be determined from its effects on the motions of the latter planet. Moreover, were one of these disturbing bodies, as Saturn, for example, altogether insensible, its existence and even its weight, and its place in the heavens, could be inferred from these effects on Uranus. The problem would indeed be one of great difficulty, requiring all the resources of the infinitessimal analysis, guided by the law of universal gravitation.—Still, it could be done. It was by a method somewhat like this, that the existence of the new discovered planet was inferred, and its distance and place in the heavens assigned. After estimating all the disturbing forces that accelerate or retard the motion of Uranus around the sun, arising from the united attractions of all the known bodies of the solar system, it was found that they all failed to account for the actual places occupied by the planet, as determined by observation. Hence, some hidden force, besides these, must be in operation. Le Verrier was the first to show that this force was actually that of an undiscovered planet, moving around the sun at twice the distance of Uranus, and having on the 1st of January next, a longitude of 325 degrees. This hypothesis was first proposed to the French Academy at their sitting, Nov. 10, 1845, but was more fully expounded at a meeting of the same body, June 4th 1846.—On this subject, Sir John Herschel used the following language, as reported to the London Athaeneum of October 3d: "In my address to the British Association assembled at Southampton, I stated, among the remarkable astronomical events of the last twelve months, that it had added a new planet to our list; adding—it has done more—it has given us the probable prospect of the discovery of another. We see it as Columbus saw America from the shores of Spain. Its movements have been felt, trembling along the far reaching line of our analysis, with a certainty hardly inferior to that of ocular demonstration.' After stating that the late illustrious astronomer Bessel, had intimated to him as early as July, 1842, the probability of such a planet beyond the sphere of Uranus, Sir John proceeds to observe, that at the time when he made the foregoing remarks, he was aware, not only of the circulations of Le Verrier, but also of a similar investigation had been made by Mr. Adams, a young mathematician of Cambridge, while in entire ignorance of the conclusions of Le Verrier. Nothing could exhibit more strikingly, both the sublime reach of physical astronomy, and the immutability of truth itself, than that such results should have been obtained by two independent routes, by mathematicians in their closets, each directing the practical astronomer where to point his telescope in order to see a member of the solar system, twice as far from the sun as the remotest planet before known, which was supposed to be on the farthest confines of that system, and nothing seems more to liken man to the Divinity, than this possession of a mind which, by its own creations, can fathom depths of space so profound, and of a hand to construct an instrument which clothes the eye with such extraordinary powers of vision, as to be able at once to verify these wonderful revelations of the intellect.

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

Railroad Accident.—Detention of the Western Mails.—The train of cars from Cumberland, due at Baltimore on Monday evening, at six o'clock, did not arrive until Tuesday afternoon, about half past 2 o'clock. It left Cumberland at the usual hour, and after proceeding as far as Dough Gulley Tunnel, encountered a land slide, which threw the engine and two cars off the track, causing a detention of between five and six hours. After removing that obstruction it proceeded on as far as Opequan bridge, when it was found that the freshet had washed out the tresslings, and it was deemed prudent to make an exchange of passengers with the train from Baltimore, which was on the opposite side. The train then proceeded on to Baltimore, being obliged to travel very slowly in consequence of the land-slides, washed culverts, drifts, &c., and had arrived at Woodbine, about 38 miles from Baltimore, when it suddenly came in collission with the extra train for Frederick, the engine of the downward train being forced through the baggage car, which was almost entirely destroyed. Both of the engines were badly broken, but no person was injured. This accident would have been avoided had the conductor of the extra Frederick train obeyed the explicit orders of the Company, which required him on no account to pass beyond Ellicot's Mills, until the downward train had arrived at that point or been heard from. But the train being delayed so long he was persuaded by the supervisors of the road to proceed onward, thus causing the collission. The parties concerned in this violation of orders were promptly removed from their situations by the President of the Company.—N. Y. Sun.

Veterans Gone.—The Winchester Republican announces the death of Mr. John Grim, aged 94 years, a soldier of the revolution. Died, at Westmoreland, Oneida county, on the 17th of October Henry Francis Aaron Keckland, aged 100 years and 5 mon. Mr. Keckland was a native of Germany, came to this country as a soldier in the army of General Burgoyne, was made prisoner at Saratoga, afterwards enlisted in the American service, continued a faithful soldier during the war, and marched into New York with Gen. Washington when the city was evacuated by the British, and was honorably discharged.

Gen'l. La Vega Exchanged.—Orders have been issued by Gen. Scott for the release of Gen. Vega and his officers, who have been exchanged for Captain Carpender, and the crew of the Truxton.

On the morning of Monday, the 2d inst. just before day the large store of Messrs. Macauley & Butler, of Madison, Ind., was discovered in flames. The building and its contents, together with the two adjoining stores, were entirely consumed. The loss is estimated at upwards of $30,000, and is, we understand, covered by insurance to the amount of $24,000.

Mr William Carpenter, the proprietor of the Steam Flouring Mills at Maysville, (Ky.) was thrown from his horse on Saturday last and instantly killed, the concussion having dislocated his neck. He was a much respected and very enterprising citizen.

Drowned at Rochester, on Friday last, Mrs. Bridget Doud. She fell into the mill race, where a hole had been opened, and carelessly exposed. Two other women had fallen into the same place, one on Saturday, and another on the Thursday following, both of whom were saved with much difficulty, yet the place was left open again.—N. Y. Sun.

A fatal accident occurred at the house of Mr. J. Lewis, near the village of Spotswood, N. J., on the night of the 11th inst. It appears that Mr. Lewis had been oiling his gun, and was in the act of hanging it up, when it accidentally discharged, the whole load entering the posterior portion of his wife's thigh, the unavoidable hemorrhage causing her death before any surgical assistance could be rendered. Mrs. Lewis was a native of Wales, a very worthy woman, and much respected. Her death is deeply lamented by all who knew her.

Farewell Missionary Meeting.—A company of missionaries is to sail to-day from Boston, in the ship Flavio, for India. It consists of Rev. Levi Spaulding and wife, Rev. John Scudder, M. D., wife and two daughters. Rev. Wm. W. Scudder and wife, Rev. John E. Chandler and wife, Rev. George Forde and wife, and Rev. E. P. Hastings. A farewell meeting was to be held last evening, in the Park street Church.—Com. Ad.

Steamboat Disasters.—The Tonnaleuka, bound from Cincinnati to St. Louis, struck a snag on the 30th ult. and sunk near "Widow Baird's Island." The Hendrick Hudson, bound from New Orleans to Cincinnati, struk a snag and filled. The James Madison, bound from the Ohio to New Orleans, struck a snag on the 29th ult. at President's Island, in the lower Mississippi, and sunk to her main deck. The Sea Bird struck a snag near Island 18, causing her to spring a leak, and compelling them to unload her. The Planter, bound from St. Louis to New Orleans, struck a snag in the lower Mississippi, and damaged her cargo. The Anawan, loaded with produce, from St. Louis to New Orleans, struck a snag on the 26th ult. opposite Island 35, which knocked a hole in her hull. She was run ashore, where the leak was stopped, the cargo consisting of produce was much damaged. The Clermont No. 2, from St. Louis for Weston, Missouri river, struck a snag at Glasgow a few days ago, and was injured a little.

The Self made Man.—John Young the Governor elect of New York, was born of poor parents; he qualified himself as a teacher in a Common country school, was elected a member of the State Legislature, then a member of Congress, and is now Governor of the principal state in the Union.

Congress.—The ensuing session of Congress commences on the 7th of December and terminates on the 4th of March, having considerable business to transact and time enough to do it in if there is a disposition to work and not make long speeches.

Information Wanted.—Bartholomew Congrove, between 70 and 80 years old, left Philadelphia on the 7th of September last, by the 7 o'clock line for New York, to visit his friends, and has not since been heard of.

The Sandy and Beaver Canal.—The Pittsburg Gazette of Thursday week says that on that day this work was to be opened, and boats pass through from New Lisbon to the Ohio river. It congratulates the friends of the improvement that, after so long and severe a struggle, it has at length been so far completed. The ballance of the canal is fast progressing towards completion; and by next Spring the entire line will be opened through to the Ohio Canal.

Railroad Accident.—Thos. Baty, a respectable resident of New Jersey, 70 years of age, was killed at the outter depot of the Ohio and Baltimore Railroad. He was walking on the opposite side of the road, but when the conductor blew his whistle he stepped on the rail and was killed.

Passengers.—Seven hundred and seventy-eight steerage passengers arrived at New Orleans Oct., 27th, viz: per Bremen ship Victoria, from Bremen, 310; ships France and Alabama, from New York, 293; bark Stafford from Hamburg, 175.

Death.—At Westport, Essex Co., on Wednesday, the Hon. Gideon Hammond, in the 60th year of his age, departed this life. Also on the following day, his son-in-law, Mr. Dan. H. Kent, aged 36 years.

Casualty.—At Malta, Saratoga county, N. Y. Mr. Ephram Coon, while pushing a boat from the shore with a loaded gun, the muzzle of which was turned towards him, received the contents in his lungs. He died in a few minutes.

Fire at Newark.—On Tuesday last, the 3rd instant, the Livery Stable of Mr. T. W. Berry at Newark, was burned down. Five horses were lost, four belonging to Mr. B., and one to Dr. McMillen, together with their harness. The carriages were saved. It is not known how the fire originated.—O. State Journal.

Accident.—We regret to hear that the steamer Del Norte was so badly injured a few days since by running on Flint Island bar, below Louisville, that she was obliged to discharge. We hope that the damage will not prove so great as to prevent her from continuing her trip.—Zanes. Cour.

The California Emigrants.—The party that left St. Louis last spring for California have fared badly. A letter from one of the company dated Fort Bridger, July 23, states that many of the emigrants sold their waggons at Fort Laramie, and proceeded on their journey on horseback. The men composing the party had quarreled, and some of them had changed their minds, and taken the Oregon route.—The letter says.—

The emigrants were heartily tired of their journey, and nine-tenths of them wished themselves back in the States.—The whole company had been broken up into squads by dissatisfaction and bickerings, and it was pretty much every man for himself. The accounts they have received of Oregon and the Californias, by the parties they met returning to the States, had greatly disheartened them, and they had horrible anticipations of the future, in the country which they believed to be, when they set out, as beautiful as the Elysion fields.—State Journal.

A Death by Charcoal.

Dayton, (Ohio,) November 6.

Four of the hands employed in the brewery of Mr. J. W. Harries, and who slept in the building, took a pan of ignited charcoal into their bedroom on Wednesday night for the purpose of warming it.—The men did not appear as early as usual the next morning, and Mr. Harries went to the room to wake them. He called one who lay near the door, and he seemed to be aroused, and Mr. H. left the room. After waiting some time, and finding that the men did not come down, he sent one of the hands to call them again. The messenger found one of the men, his own brother dead, and three others either stupified or senseless. Two of these recovered, so as to be about yesterday, while the other remained in a most critical condition during the day, but is out this morning. The name of the deceased was Henry Thomas. It seems strange that, after the occurrence of so many deaths from the use of ignited charcoals in close apartments, and the pains which have been taken to make its fatal effects generally known, there should still be cases like the above to chronicle.—Journal.

Goths and Vandals.—We are frequently compelled to blush for outrageous acts committed with impunity. The Church of the Holy Trinity, at Brooklyn, contains a window of beautiful stained glass, representing Christ blessing the children, exquisitely done at the cost of $800, which was dashed to pieces by some wretch who is yet undiscovered.—Should not the Corporation of that City offer a reward for his apprehension.

Death of an Emigrant.—The Coroner held an inquest yesterday, on board the ship Rappahanock, foot of Rosevelt street, on the body of an emigrant, named Eliza McCormick, a native of Ireland, aged 30 years; who came over with upwards of 500 others in said ship from Liverpool and died on board the ship soon after she arrived last night.—About 526 embarked on board at Liverpool, many of whom were paupers and many diseased. The Captain put ten ashore at Liverpool who had concealed themselves on board. Fourteen died on the passage and were thrown overboard, and many others are now sick —some of whom will die.

Northern Enterprise.—Six brick houses near the Girard College, Philadelphia, are to be removed to the opposite side of the road, which task has been undertaken by a New York company. Four are to be removed together and the residue by themselves in consequence of some difference in their construction. This removal of brick buildings is wholly an American invention.

Governor Ford in Nauvoo.—The St. Louis New Era of the 5th says:—"By a gentleman who arrived last night in the steamer Tioga, from Keokuk, we learn that Gov. Ford, at the head of 250 men, two brass cannons, and some thirty baggage waggons, entered the city of Nauvoo on Wednesday, the 28th ult. It is said that he has gone there for the purpose of restoring the new citizens, or Jack-Mormons, to possession of the city again, and to put the law in force against those concerned in driving them out.

Rail Road Travelling.—A London letter writer says——"In England, railroad travelling, although exceedingly expensive—for first places $5 per hundred miles—is vastly more comfortable and speedy than any where else. From London to Exeter, via. Bristol, 220 miles, the distance including stoppages, is regularly run over in four hours and a half! Between Liverpool and London, the line is about the same length, and the express cars go through in about six hours."

The close of the Week.—A week! Its but a short time indeed, but its events are a host. To whom has the week just closed brought joy? to whom sorrow? to whom riches? to whom poverty? to whom friends? to whom health? to whom life? to whom death? to whom enemies? to whom misery? to whom happiness? What! all these changes in one week? Yea, and a host more numerous than the sands of the sea. Many who see the dawnings of this week, will be in another world ere it closes—many whom fortune smiled upon but a week ago, are now groaning beneath the withering frowns of poverty—many who were floating gently on the bark of life, o'er the unruffled sea of happiness a week ago, are now wrecks of ruin, on the shores of affliction—many upon whom the Sun of last Sabbath shone propitiously, have ere this met with some ill-fortune, and are turned upon the children of poverty, and many whose expectations and hopes were beaming forth bright and prosperous, at its close, are the sad and miserable beings of disappointment. And such is the life of man! It is subject to changes in a week, day—nay, even an hour. The world is still in commotion—revolution succeeding revolution—time speeding its rapid progress, leaving behind traces of destruction—and even in a small community, many thrilling and exciting circumstances might be summoned up and recorded at the close of each week.

NOTICES.

New Alexander, O. Nov. 12, 1846.

Dear Br. Bassett: You will please say in the "Recorder," that if able, I will visit the Belmont Ct. (at Belmont,) on first Saturday and Sunday of December.

Second Sat. & Sun. of Dec.		Woodsfield	Ct.
16th Dec. Wed'y., candle light, Summerfield, at S.
Third Sat. & Sun. of	Dec.	Pisgah	circuit.
Fourth "	"	Pennsville	"
First "	Jan.	Morganville	"
Second "	"	Cambridge	"
Third "	"	Pleasant Hill	"
Fourth "	"	Mt. Pleasant	"

I will be gratified, if brethren will give me notice through the Recorder, of the place of my appointment on each circuit, and endeavor to fix my appointment so as to give me as little unnecessary travelling as possible.

The indication of a return of the ague, to which I alluded in my last, proved to be reality. It lasted me over two weeks, though not severe.

I started from my fathers on the 7th inst. for my appointment on the Georgetown Ct. not expecting to be able to do any labor; my desire to see my old friends of Farmington neighborhood, (the place of my appointment and also the place of my residence, the first year of my travel on said circuit.) being so great, that I almost overlooked any risk to my health from the journey. And I thank God that through his mercy, I had strength for the journey; and after spending a few of the most pleasant days of my life, with a people whose kindness cheered and gladdened my heart, during which time I tried to preach four times, I returned home on yesterday, being much improved in health and greatly cheered in spirits.

Br. Linder is at his post, and is esteemed as a faithful zealous laborer, and his efforts are not without some cheering success. The society at Farmington is doubtless in a much more prosperous condition than at any prior time, since our acquaintance with it. There are on this circuit many good members, among whom any man might delight to labor; to which we might add, Brs. R. Scott and H. Heberling, two of the most intelligent and useful unstationed ministers in the District. Such men are a blessing to any Ct.

Yours in peace and love,

Geo. Clancy.

Mad River Mission.—We commence a protracted meeting, Dec. 5, four miles south of Belfontaine, to which we invite Brs. I. Hunt, D. Moore, J. B. Peat, with any others who can come.

L. Ensminger.

To the President of the Muskingum Conference.

Br. D. White, who was appointed to the Newark Circuit have not yet arrived, to enter upon his duties, nor has the circuit received any information from him. The Quarterly Conference have therefore employed Br. D. Kinney to serve in his place, the remainder of the year provided your consent be given. W. Maynard.

Belmont Circuit.—I have appointed a protracted meeting at Mercer's Meeting house, to commence on the 28th November, to which we invite Brs. N. Linder, H. Heberling and R. Scott of the Georgetown Ct.

I would say to our worthy President, I received his note, and all will be right but the place he has fixed for his meeting. The Quaarterly Conference ffxed upon Concord as the place for his appointment instead of Wrightstown. Will Br. Clancy come to Concord on Stillwater, as I have not time to change the appointment now?

J. M. Winn.

Br. Bassett: I have so far recovered from my affliction, as to be able to perform some service. You will please to publish the following plan of appointments:

Twin Creek. Ct.	Nov.	14, 15.
Xenia	"	21, 22.
Lebanon	"	28, 29.
Cincinnati Ct.	Dec.	5, 6.

THANKSGIVING.

We are gratified that an unusual attention is being awakened up in many of the States of the Union, to the public observance of a day of Thanksgiving. It is interesting also to observe that a remarkable uniformity has occurred in the designation of the day by many States. The 26th inst. the day fixed upon by the Governor of Ohio, has also been appointed for the observance in twelve other States, viz. New Hampshire, Massachusetts, Vermont, Rhode Island, Connecticut, New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Maryland, Michigan, Indiana and Kentucky. Georgia and South Carolina appointed Nov. 5, and the State of Maine, Dec. 3d.

We notice that many newspapers are recommending the appointment, by the President, of a general Thanksgiving throughout the Union. We should be happy to see this arrangement adopted, and pursued in all future time. But for the present, we think that a national Repentance is more essentially called for, and that the appointment of a day of national Humiliation would be more appropriate. We think that the state of the times requires that all who fear God should devoutly call upon his name, that his righteous judgments may be averted and his favor conciliated.

PROCLAMATION.

Executive Office, Ohio.
October 5, 1846.

In pursuance of a resolution of the General Assembly of the State of Ohio, passed March, 2. 1846, requesting the Governor within the present year to issue his proclamation to the citizens of this State, recommending to them the observance of a day, previous to the first Monday of December next, of thanksgiving to Almighty God for his blessing to us as a people, I, M. Bartley, Governor of the State Ohio, do hereby respectfully recommend to the citizens of this State, to set apart Thursday, the 26th day of November next, as a day of Thanksgiving and Prayer to Almighty God for his beneficence in a bountiful dispensaiton of His blessings to us as a people.

The antiquity of this laudable practice, its authenticity, its infinite importance, and its beneficial effects upon the minds and habits of those who have hitherto revered it, is a sufficient guaranty that the citizens of the State will, on the day designated, suspend their secular business, meet at their various places for religious worship, consecrate the time to thanksgiving, prayer and gratitude to Him from whom emanates all temporal and spiritual blessings. M. Bartley.

Union Circuit.—O. Con.—Our first Quarterly Meeting will be held at Catawba, Clark Co. commencing the evening of Dec. 24th at candlelight. Quarterly Conference on the 26th at 2 o'clock. We invite, our President, Br. Young, and our brethren from adjoining Circuits. Come, and help us. David Moore, Supt.

"THE SACRED MELODEON."

This is an excellent colection of revival hymns, complied by Rev. J. Dalbey Jr. and Rev. J. B. Peat, both itinerant ministers of the Ohio Conference, M. P. Church, and recenly published at Cincinnati. A copy was furnished us at last conference by the publishers, and we should before now have given it some favorable notice, but that we desired also to announce that we had a supply for sale, but circumstances prevented their being furnished to us hitherto. The work is neatly executed, with fair type and paper, comprising 312 pages, 32 no. It embraces not only a good selection of hymns, but a number also, never before published. From our examination of it, we unhesitatingly say, we like it better than any book of Spiritual Songs with which we are acquainted. It embraces all the new spiritual songs in common use we can call up, from 'Mercy's free' to 'Will you go,' &c. The publishers are deserving of encouragement, and the work is well worthy of a liberal patronage. We are gratified to state that we expect in a few days to be furnished with a supply for sale at our office, either single, or by the dozen.

Br. Winn, the paper of W. L. was stopped, simply because, it appeared from the books that he was indebted for three volumes and a half. For $2 we credit him for vol. 7. and will hand the other $1 to Br. Springer, towards his claim. We are pleased to send again to Br. L. but we hope he will send within three months, instead of three years, next time.

Our old friend, Br. Kezerta, will pardon us that through some unaccountable oversight, his paper has not been sent heretofore. He knows it could not have been intentional.

Back Numbers.—The P. M. at Fairmont Va. kindly informs us that F. Christy declines taking his paper from the office. A week ago he favored us with the like notice of F. Peirpoint. We only think hard that we were not notified of discontinuance at the first of the volume so as not to send 4 or 5 numbers to no purpose. Our increase of subscribers has been so rapid since our new volume, that some of our early numbers are exausted, and we need them to supply those who request them. If Mr. Newcomb, or any other obliging post master will do us the favor to return to us copies of our first 3 numbers especially, it will oblige us, and we will reciprocate the favor when opportunity serves.

Annual Register, 1847.—We have struck rising of 5000 copies of this little publication, and trust that brethren who have ordered copies will soon receive them. Meanwhile, every subscriber to the Western Recorder, who pays $2 in advance for 8th volume, may look out to receive a copy by mail.

☞The pamphlets ordered in the Ohio and Indiana Districts have been sent by steamer Newark to Cincinnati—care of Br. Geo. Conklin. Br. C. will please forward the packages for Lawrenceburg, Madison, and Edinburg, Ia. to their destination. Likewise the parcels for Brs. Young, Rose, Hunt, M'Guire, Stephens, Kezerta & Webster, to Br. O. P. Stephens, Springfield, O. care of H. Hedrick.

The parcels for brethren in the Pittsburgh District, have been sent to Br. C. Craig, Pittsburgh. The brethren will please send and obtain them.

The parcels ordered by brethren Andrew, Cushman, Cowl, John & Joseph Burns have been sent to Br. R. Andrew, Steubenville, care of M. M. Laughlin.

Six hundred copies ordered by the book Agent, and 50 copies ordered by Br. W. M. Edwards, Va. have been forwarded to Baltimore, to E. Y. Reese, Book Agent.

Brothers Warrington, Dobbins, Evans, Trumbo, White, Dalbey, & Pelan will please receive their pamphlets if Br. Conklin, Cincinnati.

Brs. Craig, Pittsburgh, and Conklin, Cincinnati, have also a small additional supply for further orders.

OBITUARY.

MRS. ESTHER INSKEEP,

Wife of Rev. John Inskeep, departed this life on the 9th of October, 1846, after an illness of a paralytic disease of about twelve days continuance. She had enjoyed unusual good health through the last summer and fall. But on Sabbath; the 12th of Sept. after she had been for some time alone in the sitting room, reading one of our church papers, it was discovered by some of the family that she had fallen from her chair. Much alarm was excited, and medical aid called in; but all found ineffectual, though she revived again, and some hope was entertained of her recovery, on the part of physician and friends. But this soon vanished, at return of the disease. She told them that it was of no use to take medicine—that she was going to die and bore her affliction with a great degree of patience, and Christian fortitude, being perfectly in her proper mind. She said that the grace of God was sufficient, and expired in the triumphs of living faith, leaving a comfortable hope to her friends that she had gone to rest. Sister Inskeep was born in Culpepper Co. Va. June 11, 1787; was joined in wedlock with Br. John Inskeep, Dec. 20, 1804; removed to Ohio in the fall of 1805—settled in the dense forest, underwent toils and privations of early settlers in what is now called Logan county. In company with her consort, she united with the M. E. Ch. in 1807, before an itinerant minister trod that wilderness soil, and continued an acceptable member until 1835, when she joined the M. P. Church, and remained a highly esteemed member to the day of her death. We doubt not that she has gone from toil to rest, from labor to reward, and from the church militant to the church triumphant, leaving behind to lament their loss an affectionate companion and ten children with a numerous train of friends and relatives. May the Lord, by his grace, sustain them in this bereavement.

POETRY.

From the Louisville Journal.

THE BANKS OF OHIO.

They say that afar in some bright sunny climes,
There are beautiful rivers and streams,
Whose murmers are soft as a poet's sweet rhymes,
Or the sound of sweet music in dreams;
They may be as bright as their own native lands,
And gush 'mid the bright flowers free,
That stand on their margins in radiant bands,
But the banks of Ohio for me!

I've read of bright streams in the land of the vine,
Where the myrtle and orange tree bloom,
In fancy I've roamed on the banks of the Rhine,
When the season of vintage had come—
And I've wandered by streams that were given to fame
By the deeds of the brave and the free,
By others, as lovely, that knew not a name,
But the banks of Ohio for me!

We are scattered abroad, who so often have stray'd
On the banks of Ohio's pure wave,
And some of the dear ones are silently laid
To rest in the damps of the grave;
And some are still left who remember the hours
When we wandered unfettered and free,
When we dream'd that life's pathway was covered with flowers—
Oh! the banks of Ohio for me!

I know that beneath the bright sky's azure cope
Flows many a glorious stream,
But to me thou art written all over with hope
And illumined by memory's beam,
They may sing of the rivers whose fame has grown old,
Of the beauty of lake and of set,
But when all their brightness and witchery's told,
The banks of Ohio for me!

ATHEISM.

BY MRS L. H. SIGOURNEY.

"The fool hath said in his heart, 'there is no God.'"

"No God! No God!" the simplest flower
That on the wild is found,
Shrinks, as it drinks its cup of dew;
And trembles at the sound.
"No God!" astonished echo cries
From out her cavern hoar,
And every wandering bird that flies
Reproves the Atheist lore.

The solemn forest lifts its head,
Th' Almighty to proclaim;
The brooklet, on its cristal urn,
Doth leap to praise his name;
High sweeps the deep and vengeful sea,
Along its billowy track,
And red Vesuvius ope's its month.
To hurl the falsehood back.

The palm tree, with its princely crest—
The cocoa's leafy shade—
The bread-fruit bending to its lord,
In you far island glade—
The winged seeds, borne by the winds,
The roving sparrows feed—
The melon on the desert sands—
Confute the scorner's creed.

"No God!" with indignation high
The fervent sun is stirred,
And the pale moon turns paler still
At such an impious word!
And from their burning thrones, the stars
Look down with angry eye,
That thus a worm of dust should mock
ETERNAL MAJESTY!

Humanity and Divinity of Jesus Christ.

NO III.

MR. EDITOR: I have, measurably, taken it for granted, that Jesus Christ is Divine—truly and absolutely, without the least diminution—God. Arius and others, have not only denied this sacred and fundamental doctrine, but they have strenuously opposed it. I say, fundamental doctrine; because if Jesus, is not Emanuel—God, I cannot discover how it is possible that he should be, "the propitation for our sins, and not for ours only, but also for the sins of the whole world." Though, I am fully apprised, that those who deny the Divinity of the Lord Jesus, uniformly, also, deny the sufferings and death of our Redeemer to be vicarious. That Jesus Christ is God, not nominally only, or by delegation, but really and positively, is clear to my mind, from the word of the Lord.

And first, as I understand the matter, it is a settled principle in theology, that whatever any person or being is called, or named in the scriptures in reference to his character, he is truly, what he is called or named. If I am here correct, then it will follow, that Jesus Christ is God, from the quotation already made from Isa. ix. 6. "Unto us a child is born, &c. and his name shall be called, Wonderful, Counsellor, The mighty God, The everlasting Father, The Prince of Peace." Again. "In the beginning was the Word, and the Word was with God, and the Word was God. The same was in the beginning with God. All things were made by him; and without him was not any thing made that was made. In him was life; and the life was the light of men." That, in these portions of the bible, the Lord Jesus is, only, refered to, I conclude, none will for a moment dispute; and if the names here used, are designed to give us correct views of the Lord Jesus th n it will, inevitably follow, that he is absolutely God.

That no being, besides the Deity, let his nature be as exalted as it may, possesses, or can possess those atributes of God, termed, incommunicable, to my mind is most clear. That none but the Lord Jehovah, is eternal, omnipotent, omnicient, omnipresent and immutable, no rational person, as it seems to me, will entertain any doubts whatever. Now, if it is shown, that the Lord Jesus, really possesses these incommunicable attributes of the Deity, then, of consequence, he is truly God. I remark, from the nature of things, it is impossible that any finite being, no difference how exalted, can possibly possess these attributes. God alone is from Everlasting to Everlasting, Almighty. All seeing and All Knowing, and every where Present at the same time. It is impossible that there can be two Almighties. There can be but one who possesses all power; and all other b ings must derive their power from him. All created beings must necessarily be finite: they cannot occupy but one place at any given period; and if they remove from this point in a limited space to another, the first will be unoccupied by them. Created beings, without Divine aid, can only take cognizance of that which comes within the range of their senses; and since they can only occupy a limited portion of unbounded space, and have a knowledge of that which takes place within the range of their limited senses, they cannot know all things. But to proceed, I remark, that Jesus Christ is Eternal, is confirmed by the following, viz: "All things were made by him; and without him was not any thing made that was made." John i. 3. Now, if Jesus Christ made all things, "and without him was not any thing made that was made," it will follow, that he himself, was never made; and since the Lord Jesus, now exists, and was never made, he, of necessity, must be eternal or without beginning of days; consequently, God. He who is before all things must be eternal, and of consequence, God. The apostle says, "And he is before all things, and by him all things consist, and he is the head of the body, the church: who is the beginning, the first born from the dead." Col. i. 17, 18. This most clearly, having been spoken of the Lord Jesus, it must follow that he is eternal—that he is God. Jesus says, "I am Alpha and Omega, the beginning and the ending, saith the Lord; which is, and which was, and which is to come, the Almighty." Rev. i. 8. Language, better calculated to express the eternity of the Lord Jesus could not be selected; as Alpha, is the first letter in the Greek alphabet, and Omega, the last, so Jesus Christ is from everlasting to everlasting—the first and the last. That Jesus Christ is omnipotent has been shown already, by the foregoing quotations. The work of creation can only be performed by infinite power. It is so far above the ability of any of God's creatures, that it is very doubtful, if those of the highest order, can comprehend the modus operandi, much less perform so exalted a work. Jesus Christ is the Creator of all things; John i. 3. as already quoted will clearly show. And the apostle says, "For by him were all things created, that are in heaven, and that are in earth, visible and invisible whether they be thrones, or dominions, or principalities or powers; all things were created by him, and for him, And he is before all things. and by him all things consist." Col. i. 16, 17. Jesus Christ is, by himself, called, the Almighty. Rev. 1. 8. If Jesus Christ is the Creator and preserver of all things and, as all must admit, that nothing short of omnipotance is sufficient for so great a work; then, since it has been shown, that he did make, and still preserves all things, he must be the Almighty God.

He who knows all men, and all things, must possess infinite knowledge. The disciples said to our Lord and Saviour, "Now are we sure that thou knowest all things, and needest not that any man should ask thee." John xvi. 30. Peter said, "Lord thou knowest all things; thou knowest that I love thee." John xxi. 17. "But Je us did not commit himself unto them; because he knew all men." John ii. 24. Here we have the most conclusive evidence, that Jesus knew all men—he knew all things. Then, since Jesus Christ is omnicient, he must be God.

None but Jehovah is omnipresent. Jesus Christ claims this atribute of the Deity. He said to Nicodemus, "If I have told you of earthly things, and ye believe not, how shall ye believe if I tell you of heavenly things." And no man hath ascended up to heaven, but he that came down from heaven, even the Son of man which is in heaven." John iii. 12, 13. The Lord Jesus, was addressing Nicodemus upon the all important subject of the new birth, which is indispensable here on earth, to prepare us for heaven after death. The new birth with other matters, Jesus Christ here calls, "earthly things;" because necessary in this world. The "heavenly things" are, obviously, placed opposite to the earthly things; and are not the same, but they are those things in that world of bliss, at Gods right hand, to which, the Saviour says 'no man hath ascended.' No being, we conclude of a finite nature, can be on earth, and in the heavenly world at one end the same time; but Jesus Christ, while on earth, and addressing Nicodemus, was at the same time in the heavens above; he says, "even the Son of man which is in heaven," hence, Jesus Christ is unlimited, or omnipresent. The Saviour further says, though on another occasion, "Where two or three are gathered together in my name, there am I in the midst of them." Mat. xviii. 20. Again. "Lo I am with you alway even unto the end of the world." Jesus Christ must be boundless, if he is present throughout all the world—where two or three, are assembled in his name, while he is, likewise, present on the throne of God, in glory, This being true, Jesus Christ must be omnipresent consequently, God.

The Lord our Maker, alone, is immutable. All created beings, of necessity, have their limits, over which they do not pass; but these boundaries may be enlarged or contracted by the Deity. The nature of intelligent beings is such, that, while exertions are made by them, their capacities are expanded; but if they remain inactive, they are contracted—they are always changing. All created beings had a beginning, and they are now older than when their existence commenced; they have, then, in this particular, changed, since they were created. But the scriptures ascribe unchangeability to the Lord Jesus. "And, thou, Lord, in the beginning hast laid the foundations of the earth; and the heavens are the works of thy hands They shall perish; but thou remainest; and they shall all wax old as doth a garment; and as a vesture shalt thou fold them up, and they shall be changed; but thou art the SAME, and thy years shall not fail." Heb. i. 10—12. Again. "Jesus Christ the same yesterday, to day, and forever." Heb. xiii. 8. Then if Jesus Christ has been, now is, and will be forever the SAME, he must be immutable, and consequently, the Lord God.

JOHN HILL.

Batavia, O. Sept. 14, 1846.

Written for the Western Recorder.

BR. BASSETT: You will oblige, not only the author, but myself, by giving him a hearing on the subject proposed in the enclosed sheet. Although I do not agree with him in all his sentiments relating to slavery; nor do I accord to some points of casuistry referred to in this paper, yet I agree with him most decidedly, that the Gen. Conference has no right to decide for the judiciary or the church, moral questions. And for that body to assume to dictate to, or influence the judiciary, is evincing on officious medling and tyranny which should be indignantly resisted by every friend of ecclesiastic freedom. For the highest assembly—the assembly at the head of any ecclesiastical association, to assume to dictate on moral questions and to govern the standing of members accordingly, is the very worst species of tyranny. I would far rather swear fealty to a bishop—to single handed despotism, than to render submission to such authority. For it is possible to propiciate individual tyranny, but, you might as well mount the Peak of Ten eriff and reason with the raging storm as reason with the excited despotism of the multitude.

That church which has not in her organization, a judiciary, seperate from the rule or law making department, whose appropriate and exclusive duty it is to decide moral questions, has not secured the boon of religious liberty. Such a judiciary the M. P. church has; and it is perfect tinkering for the General Conference to assume to interfere with its special duties. We hope such interference will be promptly resisted by the church, and are glad to see such able hands take hold of the subject as the Rev. gentleman before us.

If you want to see the power we oppose in exercise, look at the divison of the Presbyterian church of the new and old School parties. See the Meth. E. church rent by Mason and Dixon's line. Review the history of the old Scotish church and behold her scattered and peeled by her General Assembly undertaking to decide questions of morality and orthodoxy.

We are glad to learn that the "Associate Reform" church,—which is composed of a union of the Burghers, anti Burghers, and Reformed Presbyterians, of this country—knowing the source of their former difficulties, have taken from their General Assembly the power to decide questions of heresy or moraltiy. This is the only confederated church, we believe in the United States, except the Meth. P. church, which thus guards the sacred rights of her membership. But some would be ultra philanthropists, in order to gratify an insatiable appetite, would so interpret our government as to graft upon it this old principle of despotism.

So our friend will see, from these hasty remarks, that we do not approve of the resolution of the Gen. Conference to which he objects. We voted for it, only, on the principle of two evils, submitting to the best.—Br. B. will oblige us by publishing the resolutions we offered to the Gen. Conference, on this subject, so that we may stand in our right position before the public.

C. SPRINGER.

NO. I.

Rev. Sir: Long before the period had arrived for the meeting of the late General Conference of the Methodist Protestant Church, the eyes of statesmen, as well as the eyes of the ministers and members of the church, were directed to the meeting of that body, to make its decisions on the subject of domestic slavery. This attention was excited, because all believed that those decisions would be pregnant with the gravest consequences to the union of the states, as well as to the integrity and prosperity of that recently organized denomination of christians. The hopes of those who were adverse to the peculiar institutions of the south, that the colored members should not only be exalted to a perfect equality with the white members, but that all slaveholders should forthwith be excommunicated from the church forever without exception, and without pity. Those who had an interest in the institutions complained of, and who were anxious to retain the places in church which they had filled so long, as well as to maintain the supremacy of the word of God over sectional and popular prejudices, greatly dreaded the intemperate zeal of the abolitionists. Many circumstances contributed to the intense, but opposite feelings, of the respective parties—the deep, and according to some, the growing opposition to domestic slavery in some of the Northern states—the split in the Methodist Episcopal Church on this very subject about two years previously—the late division in the Baptist church with regard to Foreign Missions on the same cause—and the introduction of the question into the Presbyterian Church, served to elate the one party with an assurance of success in their project, whilst these very circumstances tended to sink the hearts and hopes of the other.

But "the long agony is over," and history is left to record the rusults. Will it be deemed presumptuous then, for one who has often been denounced for opposing the assumptions of modern ecclesiastics, to offer his objections to the decisions of the General Conference on the subject of domestic slavery? He is disposed to do this, not because at his time of life he has got the cacoethes scribendi, wishes to obtain popularity, or to appear in print. Nor is it because he claims to possess more wisdom than the congregated body of laymen and divines who composed that assembly, and who have expressed that most extraordinary and objectionable decree under the name of an "opinion." But he does it, that hereafter, an "opinion" which it may be said was unquestioned at the time, as it regards the right of the General Conference to expres it, may not be set up as a precedent for proceedings equally preposterous and absurd. He does it because this decree has given birth to a formal protest by the minority—to the adoption of several resolutions by some of the Annual Conferences, and in all probability will give birth to more—and because it has led to the publication of numerous pieces in the Recorder, pro and con, and yet the writers of those prices have not touched the gist of the subject, but each has been writing "about it, and about it," and so they may continue to write until they write their ink wells dry.

In offering this objections to this most extraordinary and objectionable "opinion" he distinctly says, he does not, in these letters, wish or intend to discuss the merits of domestic slavery. This he has already done with the Rev. Luther Lee, one of the champions of modern abolitionism, through the columns of the Western Recorder while that paper was under the control of Rev. C. Springer. And this is a fitting opportunity for him to express his thanks to that gentleman, who though himself strongly opposed to domestic slavery, and knowing that his paper was patronised and supported by anti-slavery men, had the magnanimity to open his columns to a slaveholder, to hear what he had to say in justification of the institution. Thanks to you my old friend for this unparalled mark of kindness. It surely is a proof of the nobleness and greatness of your soul. May your successor never display less courage in the cause of aspersed innocence, or violated truth.

And by the way, it is amusing to reflect on the manner in which I and my writings have been treated by those champions of "human rights." One man commenced, what he called, an answer to my letters, and labelled his piece No. 1. but has got no further in two or three years. He stuck fast in the mud at the very commencement of his undertaking, and there remains to the present day if not "a pillar of salt," at least a monument of rashness in attempting to do what he was not competent to perform. A second, who like many others who want to say something, but have nothing to say, pronounced me a "Calvinist." A third was sure I was "as much an infidel as Voltaire or Tom Paine." A fourth has been profuse in his encomiums, telling the people that, "Alexander McCaine was a grand scoundrel"—that "he was a great impostor"—that "he was a hypocrite"—that "he was as great a scamp as was in the United States"—and that 'he had no more confidence in him than he had in Belzybub.* Now all this from Jonathan M. Flood, a travelling preacher in the M. P. Church, in the Ohio Conference. A fifth, the Rev. Luther Lee, published me "insane" and decline replying to a 'crazy man." And the last that I shall mention is the Rev. John Clarke chairman of the committee appointed by the G. C. to examine my pamphlet entitled, "Slavery defended from scripture against the attacks of the abolitionists," who offered the following resolutions:

"Resolved, That while the General Conference feels unprepared to express any judgment on the merits of the work, we recommend that brethren use their influence to extend its circulation, especially at the North, that the true position of their brethren at the South may be rightly understood and appreciated.

Resolved, That the author be respectfully requested, either to make arrangements with some agent in Cincinnati, by which the work may be furnished to order at cheap rates, or to transfer the copy right, that a new edition may be published at the North." One or two remarks on these resolutions.

First. The chairman of the committee on slavery, and "the General Conference felt unprepared to express any judgment on the merits of the work." "Unprepared!" "unprepared!!" Thank you Mr. Clarke for this expression of your opinion a greater compliment could not be paid to my writings. My pamphlet was a poser to you, the committee, and the conference, and neither you nor they were "prepared" to say any thing against a work which was so strongly fortified by scripture and reason.

Second. As this pamphlet, you say, may do some good if circulated at the North, now I, Alexander McCaine, author of the said pamphlet, for and in consideration of the good will and christian feeling I bear to my brother in Christ the Rev. John Clarke, do hereby relinquish, transfer, and make over to the aforesaid Rev. John Clarke, all the right, title and interest that I, as author, have heretofore had to the said pamphlet, entitled 'Slavery defended from scripture against the attacks of the abolitionists," to be reprinted by him, or by whomsoever he may appoint. But to return to my subject.

The General Conference is the highest tribunal known to the Methodist Protestant Church. Its "composition," or the manner in which it is constituted, and the "powers" with which it is invested, are explicitly laid down in the constitution. As its duties are clearly defined, it must be admitted, that all its acts and proceedings ought to be confined within the prescribed limits of its organization; and should be characterized by Wisdom, Justice, and Truth. If, at any time, that body should lose sight of its legitimate "powers," and arrange itself on the side of some political party—if it should adopt the peculiar notions of any fanatical denomination—or if it should suffer itself to transcend the "powers" which are prescribed to it in the constitution, then will its existence become an obstacle to the church's prosperity, if it will not ultimately work the church's overthrow. Its proceedings, therefore, ought to be watched with the closest attention by every member of the church, and every departure from its prescribed course of action, and every instance of its overslipping the line by which it is circumscribed, ought to be promptly exposed, that incipient errors may be corrected, or wanton abuses be arrested and condemned.

That the General Conference has exceeded its "powers" in passing the resolution which it has passed, with reverence to domestic slavery, I hope I shall be able to prove before these letters are closed. Unpleasant as is this task, I now take up my pen to perform it; notwithstanding I am fully aware to what censurse I shall expose myself, by placing myself before the public as being opposed to any of the decisions of the General Conference. In relation to myself, it is a small matter with me what may be thought, or what may be said of me, in reply. I have been so long accustomed to receive abuse from the teachers of religion, because I have opposed their ecclesiastical claims, that I shall not be surprised if the like portion is dealt out to me for calling in question the right of the late G. C. to pass this objectionable resolution. Not so, however, with reference to the Church with which I have been identified from its very infancy—'for which I have labored and suffered reproach"—and in which I hope to continue to have a place until I end my days on earth. Its stability, its purity, its prosperity, lie near my heart; and although the aspirant, the demagogue, or the fanatic may question my declaration, my present task is undertaken to promote her welfare, and contribute to her establishment. Let those who feel it a duty which they owe to themselves for the course they have taken, and for the vote they have given, in passing this objectionable resolution, reply to my objections; but in their reply, let them not carp at a word in my writings, and leave the principles I condemn unnoticed and untouched. I have seen so much sophistry employed in polemical discussions that I warn my opponents against it on this. If they have arguments or authorities to offer by which they can prove that they did not exceed their prescribed "powers" in passing this resolution, and that the doctrines contained in the first sentence of it can be sustained by scripture and reason, then shall I, as well as the church and the public, be able to judge of the weight and conclusiveness of these reasons, and of these scriptures. If they have not, let them be silent; for every thing beside scripture and reason will be considered vox præ ereaque nihil.

The resolution to which I object is the following—"Resolved, That in the judgment of this General Conference the holding of slaves is under many circumstances a sin against God, and in such circumstances should be condemned by the Methodist Protestant church: nevertheless it is our opinion that under some circumstances it is not sinful. This General Conference does not feel authorized by the constitution to legislate on the subject of slavery and by a solemn vote we present to the church our judgment that the different Annual Conferences respectively should make their own regulations on this subject so far as authorized by the constitution." Now this resolution was "presented" by Dr. John S. Reese and contains two sentences. Had he and the conference confined themselves to the last sentence and omitted the first, I am certain I should never have troubled the public to read any thing from my pen on it. But they have proceeded otherwise. Wherefore? It is not for me to determine their motives. Waiving for the present all remarks on the phraseology of the resolution, as well as the dangerous principles contained in it, I ask had the General Conference a right to pass the first sentence in this resolution? They had not, and for this assertion I assign the following reasons. 1st. I was one of the five elected by the convention of 1828 to prepare a Constitution and Book of Discipline to be submitted to the Delegates of "the Associated Methodist Churches" which were to assemble in Baltimore in November 1830; and I know the committee never contemplated giving such "powers" to any General Conference as were exercised by the last one. 2nd. I was a member of the Convention of 1830 when the constitution was adopted, and I appeal to those who were in that convention to say, were there any such "powers" proposed to be given to the G. C. as were exercised by the G. C. of 1846? Such a thing was not thought of. 3d. The Constitution fixes the "powers" of that body and prescribes the limits beyond which it shall not go: but it no where gives it authority to pronounce a "judgment," or give an "opinion," by which the character of thousands in the church is injured, and their membership jeoparded, by an ex-rajudicial decision which is pronounced without authority, and is unsupported by proof. 4th. The resolution itself declares "this General Conference does not feel authorized by the constitution to legislate on the subject of slavery;" and yet, in the same resolution they declare, "the holding of slaves is under many circumstances a sin against God." It seems they were not" prepared to express any judgment on the merits of any pamphlet entitled, Slavery defended from scripture against the attacks of the abolitionists;" but they were ready and prepared to decree, without a single reason, or text of scripture offered to support their "opinion," that the holding of slaves is under many circumstances a sin against God."

But it may be said that, in denying the right of the General Conference to pass the resolution under consideration, I am pleading against the right of private judgment. The very reverse is the case. The right of private judgment is secured to every member of the Church in the Elementary Principles of the constitution: "Every man has an inalienable right to private judgment in matters of religion; and an equal right to express his opinion in any way which will not violate the laws of God, or the rights of his fellow men." This right I hold sacred. I advocated the exercise of it in the M. E. Church, and was expelled. I plead for the exercise of it in the M. P. Church, and it is against the abuse of it by the late G. C. I now record my objection:

The act of the G. C. in passing the first sentence in the resolution under consideration is an outrage on the right of private judgment in the members; because, in their collective capacity, the G. C. pronounces an "opinion" which is calculated to prevent the exercise of that right in the members of the church. Their "opinion," if expressed by the members of the conference in their individual capacity would avail nothing, to effect or disturb "the rights of their fellow men:" but as that "opinion" has been pronounced by a body of men, the case is quite otherwise. 2. There is reason to believe that the G. C. were anxious to accomplish by numbers and a "solemn vote" (jesting and joking it seems had nothing to do in the business) what they were conscious could not be accomplished by scripture and reason. 3rd. And lastly, he must be exceedingly ignorant of human nature who does not know that the decisions of higher tribunals have a great tendency to influence and direct the decisions of inferior ones. Although, in the present case, Annual Conferences are supreme, as having the sole power to legislate on the subject, yet the decision of the G. C. is likely to influence, if it was not intended to over awe and direct, Annual Conferences in all their legislation on the subject.

Emancipation in the West Indies.

No. II.

MESSRS. EDITORS:—In a former article, I showed that emancipation in the British West Indies has operated with entire safety. I now propose to consider the question—has it proved beneficial? And first, has it proved so to the emancipated themselves? And why may they not be allowed here to speak for themselves? What better witnesses can be found whether persons have been benefitted by a change in their condition, than the persons themselves who have experienced the change—who know experimentally the advantages and disadvantages of both conditions? If we wished to know whether a number of people who had emigrated from Europe to America were better or worse off than before, of whom would we inquire? Who would think of inquiring of their former friends or connections in Europe? of their present employers or neighbors, or any where else but of themselves, if we had access to them? Let then, the emancipated answer for themselves: But every one anticipates the answer. What! ask a man which is the better condition, one who is free—where he gets wages for his labor—where he can call himself, his wife, and his children his—where he enjoys the protection of law, and can obtain redress if he is wronged; or one where himself, his wife and children are alike the property of another man, and may be sold away from one another—where he is compelled to labor hard without wages, and liable to be cruelly treated at the caprice of his taskmaster! The truth is, I have never asked the question of them. I am sure they would not have thought me in earnest if I had. No, the manner in which they speak of the year of liberty, and their annual rejoicings on the 1st of August, are a sufficient testimony from them on this point. Nothing can be more certain than this, that in their present condition, all the needful comforts of life are within their easy reach. Nothing but moderate industry, economy, and steadiness of habits is necessary to obtain and enjoy them, and in the enjoyment of them, they are protected by the law. In this respect, they are equal to the laboring population of any part of the world.

It has been, all good, however, that many of the aged slaves, and those who were unfit for labor, suffered in consequence of emancipation, as they were then turned out to shift for themselves.—That some, perhaps a good many, have suffered from this cause, I have reason to believe. I have seen some such persons whose condition was destitute enough. But it does not follow that the amount of suffering among the lower orders has increased since emancipation. I have no doubt that were the laboring population slaves, far more wretched, suffering creatures would be seen than now. I am sure that I saw far more such people in Louisiana, while I resided there, than I saw in Trinidad. But even if the cases of suffering from this cause were far more numerous than they are, what would it prove? Not that emancipation has not been beneficial, but that the law providing for emancipation was defective, in not making special provision for this class of persons. At the same time it ought to be mentioned, that public provision is made for the poor and diseased.

But has emancipation proved beneficial to them in a moral and religious point of view:—This is the more important part of the inquiry; and here I admit that themselves are not so competent witnesses. We can readily imagine how a person becoming vicious may fancy his condition better than it was. The young man escaped from the restraints of his father's house, and plunging into dissipation, may imagine that he is now in the enjoyment of glorious liberty, and that his present is preferable to his former condition.

That the greater part of the laboring population of Trinidad is both ignorant and immoral, I have no disposition to deny. The latter part of the charge, however, is not confined to them. Some of the most gross and prevalent vices are as openly practised by the white as by the colored population. But has no change for the better taken place since emancipation? From my own experience, during my residence there, in the capacity of a moral and religious instructor, I should say that a change of that kind is constantly going on. Comparing the moral state of the free people of Trinidad with that of the slave population of Louisiana, where I remained a considerable time, I should certainly decide in favor of the former. I have no reason to suppose that they were any better before emancipation. The practice of stealing, for example, is not so common there as I found it in Louisiana. In the latter place, I remember, nothing could be left out of doors over night with safety. In Trinidad, we were no more careful to secure property of this kind, than in the most moral parts of the Northern States, where I have resided, and I never knew any thing to be taken.

The testimony of intelligent and respectable persons, clergymen as well as others also, some of whom were on the island before emancipation, is most decisive that a great change has taken place. Rev. Mr. Eckel, of the Church of England, near whom I resided, uniformly spoke of the improvement of the common people in morality, and in general civilization, as having been very great.—Rev. Mr. Kennedy, Presbyterian minister, gave the same account. Both these gentleman were in the colony before emancipation.

I have stated that the poulation is both ignorant and immoral. Emancipation found it so, and time has not yet been given to raise it above this condition. And perhaps some vices have even increased since emancipation. I have already mentioned the sudden manner in which the measure took effect in Trinidad. No time was given to fix the rates of wages, or to make contracts for labor. At the same time the colony being thinly settled, there was not a sufficient number of laborers to supply the demand. The consequence was that immediately there arose a competition among the planters to obtain laborers. The people finding this, would make no engagements for any length of time at one place. Generally they would not engage longer than a day at a time. They would hear of higher wages on some other estate, or some other cause would induce them to remove. Thus they became unsettled, and a wandering habit was induced, and every one knows how unfavorable wandering habits are to correct moral habits. This evil was, however, I believe, in a great measure peculiar to Trinidad, as the colony being comparatively new and thinly settled, laborers were scarcer than in the other colonies. Now, however, since wages have become more uniform, and since the number of laborers has increased by emigration from the older Islands—from the United States—from Africa, and by the importation of coolies from Hindustan, the evil has abated, and the people are becoming more settled.

Another evil arising from this competition among the planters, was the practice of giving allowances of rum to induce laborers to come, or to prevent them from going away. This practice still continues, and I need not point out its demoralizing effects. At the same time rum shops have been established in all parts of the island; one meets with them every mile or two on the public roads, and they are there as elsewhere schools of vice, and sinks for the wages of the laboring population. They give rise too, to drunken quarrels, which it is said have increased since emancipation. Gambling is another vice connected with the rum shop, which is said to be on the increase.

These are deplorable evils, and are lamented by every true friend of the colony. They are not however, to be regarded as results of emancipation, for they do not exist, at least to the same extent in many of the colonies. The evil first mentioned—vagrancy of habits, arose out of circumstances peculiar to this colony, and the rum shop could be put down, and ought to be put down by legal authority. But should this not be done, there is recourse there as in other communities to moral measures.

But although these evils exist, they are not universal. It is still true that the moral improvement of society, is onward. While there is still much vice, it is becoming disreputable. The patrons of the rum shop are getting to be a class by themselves, and the better portion of the people do not wish to be identified with them. The people are finding that it is important to establish for themselves a character, and to aim at being respectable. Perhaps there is no better proof of the improvement of society in Trinidad than the increase of marriages. These were almost unknown before emancipation. Now they are common, and it is thought disreputable to disregard the marriage relation. It is still, to be sure, fearfully common; but the evil is diminishing, and marriages are multiplying. All the clergymen with whom I have spoken on the subject, speak of the great and constant increase of them, both among whites and blacks. The influence of marriage on morals and order is well known. The want of having society arrayed in regular families is now one of the principal bars in the way of moral improvement, but it is fast being removed.

JOHN SCOTT.

THE DYING MOZART.

Wolfgang Mozart, the great German composer, died at Vienna, 1691. There is something strikingly beautiful and touching in the circumstances of his death. "The sweetest song was the last he sung," the "Requiem." He had been employed upon this exquisite piece for several weeks—his soul filled with inspiration of richest melody, and already claiming kindred with immortality. After giving it its last touch, and breathing into it that undying spirit of song which was to consecrate it through all time, as his "cygnean strain he fell into a gentle and quiet slumber. At length the light footsteps of his daughter Emilie awoke him. "Come hither," said he, "my Emilie—my task is done—the Requiem—my Requiem is finished." "Say not so, dear father," said the gentle girl, interrupting him as tears stood in her eyes. "You must be better—you look better, for even your cheek has a glow upon it—I am sure we will nurse you well again—let me bring you something refreshing." "Do not deceive yourself, my love, said the dying father, "this wasted form can never be restored by human aid. From Heaven's mercy alone do I look for aid, in this my dying hour. You spoke of refreshment, my Emilie—take these my last notes—sit down to my piano here—sing them with the hymn of your sainted mother—let me once more hear those tones which have been so long my solacement and delight." Emilie obeyed; and with a voice enriched with tenderest emotion, sung the following stanzas:—

Spirit! thy labor is e'er!
Thy term of probation is run,
Thy steps are now bound for the untrollen shore,
And the race of immortals begun.

Spirit! look not on the strife
Or the pleasures of earth with regret—
Pause not on the threshold of limitless life,
To mourn for the day that is set.

Spirit! no fetters can bind,
No wicked have power to molest;
There the weary, like thee—the wretched shall find
A haven, a mansion of rest.

Spirit! how bright is the road
For which thou art now on the wing!
Thy home it will be with thy Saviour and God,
Their loud hallelujah to sing.

As she concluded, she dwelt for a moment upon the low melancholy notes of the piece, and then turning from the instrument, looked in silence for the approving smile of her father. It was the still passionless smile which the rapt and joyous spirit had left—with the seal of death upon those features.

ADDRESS.

Beloved Brethren:—Through the Providence
God we are permitted to assemble the fourth ie, as an annual Conference, to transact the busiss of the Church of Christ, with which we have honor and privilege of standing connected.
hen we consider the vast importance of the rk in which we are engaged, as ministers of e Gospel, we cannot but feel the necessity of a n reliance upon Him, whose servants we pros to be. One of the leading qualifications esntial to a minister of Christ, is a deep and abidg conviction of his weakness and unworthiness, such a holy and high vocation; but then he is remember. for his encouragement, that "in the ord Jehovah there is everlasting strength" and mpassion. He it is who has strengthened ny an arm, and many a heart as weak as ours.
u my brethren, have had demonstrative proofs this fact, through the toils and labors of the st year.

"What troubles have we seen,
What conflicts have we pass'd;
Fightings without, and fears within,
Since we assembled last."

Are we not then prepared to appropiate the llowing lines to ourselves? And to say, with e poet:

"But out of all, the Lord
Hath brought us, by his love;
And still he doth his help afford,
And hides our life above."

The Gospel of Christ, through your instrumenlity, has proved to be the power of God in the lightening and conversion of many precious uls. The profession of the Christian ministry by far the most important of any which has er been exercised on the earth. The profess n of the Lawyer is important; for he guards our roperty and our worldly interest. The profess-n of the Physician is more important still; for e guards our health. But it is the work and lling of the minister of Jesus, to guard the in-rests of undying spirits. As far, therefore, as eaven is above the earth, or eternity is beyond me, so far is the Christian ministry above and eyond every other calling or profession.

The political decisions of Senates may affect he happiness of the nations of the earth, by romoting peace and prosperity, or plunging g them into wars, and reducing them to wretchdness; these effects, however important they ay be, cease with time. Where are the Roan armies, that flew to the utmost parts of Asia, endered Gaul tributary—swelled the Rhine with erman blood—subjugated Britain, pursued the attered remains of Pompey's arms into the desrts of Africa, and caused all the rivers that fell nto the Adriatic Sea, to roll along the sound of ictory to Rome? They have all gone down to he shades of death, and are known only on the ages of history. But the consequences of your abors, my colleagues in the Gospel of Christ, erminate not with the fall or rise of States, or of mpires: these effects will remain unextinguished t death, and assume in Eternity a visible and a ermanent form. The man, therefore, who en-ages in this important work, is accountable, to a reat extent, and in a qualified sense, for the alvation of those committed to his care, as well s for his own personal Salvation. The scripures of the Old and New Testament have guard-d this high and holy office, with a variety of the he most encouraging promises,, and likewise vith threatnings the most alarming. We are old that "They that be wise, shall shine as the rightness of the firmament, and he that turns many to righteousness, as the stars, forever and ever." And here allow me to say, that this prom-se is not to be limited to ministers of the Gospel.
The delegation of this conference are equally interested in it, and should be equally animated by it.
It is recorded, for the encouragement of every rivate Christian, every man has his work allotted, his talent given to him, by the faithful improvement of which, he may be an instrument in bringing glory to God.

In the large circle of Chirstian duties, there is abundent room for all to be usefully employed.
"Occupy till I come," is the command given by our Lord to Christians, without any exception.
"Having then gifts differing, according to the proportion of faith, whether ministry, let us wait on our ministering, or he that teacheth, on teaching, or he that exhorteth, on exertation. he that giveth, let him do it with simplicity, he that ruleth, with diligence, he that showeth mercy, with cherful-ness." "And above all "let love be without dissimulation; be kindly affectionate one towards another with brotherly love, in honor preferring one another."

Remember brethren, the charity of which the Apostle speaks, in 13, Ch. 1st. Epistle the Corinthians, "never faileth."

At the General Conference of 1838, some of us had the privilege of hearing the late Nicholas Snethen, whose name we ought to pronounce with veneration, give an analysis of this chapter, and its practical application to that body. "Charity," said he, "suffereth long and is kind, in the General Conference. Charity envieth not, in the General Conference," &c. &c. Could our departed father address this assembly, convened this morning for the purpose of transacting business of the Church, which he labored night and day for many years to establish, he would say,
"Brethren, love one another."

Ministers of the gospel are changed with the highest interests of mankind. We are told that the watchman who sees the sword coming, and neglects to give the people warning, that they shall die in their sins, and their blood shall be required at the hands of the unfaithful watchman.
O how important, therefore, that every minister of Christ possess those literary and evangelical qualifications, which correspond with their high commission and fearful responsibility! They should be "burning and shining lights." They should "burn with zeal, and shine with knowledge." Read much—pray much—study much—write much—"have always some dissertation on the anvil, and be careful to complete whatever you commence." It is a true remark, made by Dr. Clarke, that "begining a number of things, and finishing nothing, creates in the mind a habit of indecision and carelessness."

The election of an order of men, for the purpose of instructing the great mass of mankind, is an arrangement of the Supreme Being; and has its origin in His wisdom and benevolence. The heathen world had no institution comparable with that of the Christian ministry. The kings and priests of heathenism exerted all their power and skill, to keep their subjects in a state of ignorance, in order that their credulity might be the more easily imposed upon. The truth is, there was but little in their systems of mythology worthy of publication. They had no correct notions of the character and perfections of God. There was not a Philosopher of the heathens, who did not adopt the most palpable absurdities, in the religion he professed, and communicate those absurdities to his followers. One philosopher took ever Star for a God, and thought the intellect of man was a vapor, that passed from one body to another atom-ing in one, for the sins that were perpetrated in the other. One attributed the creation of the world to a blind chance; and the determination of all events, moral as well as Physical, to a chain of unalterable decrees; and another asserted, that all was inviolable fate. But the Gospel is beauty without a stain, and it is light without a shade.
Well may the Apostle say, that "after that, in the wisdom of God, the world. by wisdom knew not God, it pleased God, by the foolishness of preaching, to save them that believe." Jesus Christ "came and preached peace to them that were afar off. and to them that were nigh;" and where he ascended up on high, "he gave to some Apostles, and to some evangelists, and some pastors and teachers, for the perfecting of the Saints, for the work of the ministry, and for the edifying of the body of Christ. "He had previously opened their understandings, that they might understand the scriptures, and said unto them, "Thus it is written, and thus it behoved Christ to suffer, and to rise from the dead the third day; and that repentence and remission of sins should be preached in his name, among all nations, beginning at Jerusalem." "And ye" said he to his apostles, and through them to his ministers, in every subsequent age of millenn christianity, "are witnesses of these things."

The commission of these is not of partial but of permanent ability. Here, my brethren in the ministry, is the great bond of your message; not a word of man is to be found in it. The incarnation, in order, preaching, sufferings, death, resurrection, ascension and mediation of Christ are the facts of the gospel. When young men are about to engage in the work of the ministry, it is very common for them to select their favorite models—the tone of one, the eloquence of another, and the gesticulation of a third. And from good originals, alas! how often have we seen most miserable copies. Christ is the great and perfect model for the imitation of every minister of the Gospel. "Be ye followers of me, as I also am of Christ," says Paul. And this eminent minister seems to have copied well nigh every linament of the original. "I delivered unto you," he says to the Corinthians, "first of all, that which I also received, how that Christ died for our sins, according to the Scriptures, and that he was buried, and rose again the third day." And again, "We preach Christ crucified, to the Jews a stumbling block, anp to the Greeks foolishness." This doctrine was too holy for the Jews; their wicked hearts would not embrace it. The proud Greeks from Plato's school looked with contempt upon the cross, and preferred the worship of the meanest reptile.

Ought we then to become discouraged, my brethren on account of the unsuccessfulness of our feeble efforts to promote the cause of Christ? No.

This eminent Apostle continued to labor, through evil report, and good report—led from prison to prison, driven from country to country, persecu-ted for the name of Christ, and rejoicing to be consi'ered worthy to suffer shame, or to be treated with contempt for the cause of his Master, and finally obtained a Martyr's crown. And what was the principle which actuated this man of God, thus to labor and thus to suffer? He tells us in 2d Corinthians, 5th and 14th, that it was love. "The love of Christ constraineth us." This is the principle by which we should be actuated in all our ministrations, and in all our toils,—love to Christ and love for the souls of men. Permit me to introduce a sentiment explanatory of this expression of the Apostle from a sermon of the Rev. James Saurin. "There is," says this author, "an ambiquity in the principal subject of which our Apostle speaks. The love of Christ. This phrase may signify, either the love of Christ to us, or our love to him. The love of Christ constraineth us, ministers of the Gospel, of whom he speaks in the preceding and following verses of the chapter.
This is the true sentiment of a minister of the Gospel. When I speak of a minister of the Gospel, I do not mean a minister by trade and profession merely. I mean a minister by inclination and in heart and soul.

I rejoice that I have the pleasure of addressing many of that description on the present occasion.
You I trust, my brethren, investigate the great truths of the gospel, because they are sent to the human mind the most sublime objects, which a rational being can contemplate. We ought also to speak with great earnestness, in the delivery of their doctrines, when we consider that they are so richly worthy of governing the conduct of intelligent mortals. May the love of Christ constrain us. May we all possess it, and be transported by it. Oh what an honor hath God conferred upon us, by committing to us, such a ministry of reconciliation! What an honor to be called to preach such a Gospel! What love ought the love of Christ to us, to excite in our hearts! The heart of a minister of Jesus, should be a altar, on which divine fire should burn with unquenchable flames.

Many among the pious and faithful ministers of the church, have been removed from their labors to their reward. For the first time, since the organization of this Conference you will be called upon at the proper time, to give an expression of your sense of the moral worth of one of your true youke fellows, who has recently been released from the toils of an itinerant life. Brother John Rowcliffe is no more. He died in Cambridge, O.
on the first day of July last. I had the melancholy pleasure of visiting and conversing with him, but a few days before his death. His confidence was strong in God, and in the gospel promises; and we learn that he triumphed in the love of Christ in his expiring moments. His remains are deposited in the Cemetery in Cambridge, by the side of a beloved brother of your speaker, who also was a minister of the same church, and who committed his spirit into the arms of Jesus in the full assurance of a blessed immortality, on the 3d day of Oct. 1834. Br. Rowcliff is no more to mingle with us in our Conference deliberations.
We all loved him:—he was worthy of our love, and of our highest Christian confidence. Ever true to Church of which he was a minister, and ever faithful to his God. Possessed of good original powers of mind, and indefatigable in his efforts to cultivate and improve his talents, we believed that he was destined to be of great use to the Church of Christ. How mysterious are the ways of God.
"He dwelleth in the secret places of thunder: He holdeth back the face of his throne, and spreadeth a thick cloud over it." Let us be humble and submissive.

My young brethren in the ministry you are called upon to improve this dispensation of Provdence. Go forth then into the vineyard of the Gospel, as did Br. Rowcliffe, and may the bles sing of God go with you. The religion you teach is true: dispense its doctrines, with sincerity,— its ordinances, with seriousness:—display its hopes —urge its precepts,—and exhibit its terrors. "Be sober, be vigilant,—have a good report.—Be instant in season, out of season; reprove, rebuke, exhort, with all long suffering and doctrine." The Church of Christ will require you with its esteem.
The awakened sinner;—the enlightened saint,— the young, whom you have trained up in the principles of virtue and religion, the aged,—whom you have visited with the precious consolations of Christianity,—will follow you with their blessings and their effectual prayers. May you ultimately finish your lives and your ministry together, with consciences void of offence toward God and man, and full of the hope of immortality.

Ministers' Department.

RULES FOR MINISTERIAL CONDUCT.

The following rules for the regulation of a minister's conduct are taken from the semi-centennial sermon of the Rev. Daniel Dow, of Thompson, Conn. They are well worthy the adoption of every minister.

In entering upon the work of the Gospel ministry, I laid down certian rules for the regulation of my own conduct, of which, whether they all be equally suitable for others to adopt or not, they will judge, but they seemed proper for me.

Following the Bible as the word of God, to make it my only guide and comparing the different parts of it together, to let it be its own expositor; paying no regard to commentators any farther than their writings are in accordance with the word.

To preach, universally, all the doctrines and duties contained in the word of God, in due proportion; adapting them to the exigencies of the occasion, whoever may object.

Never to refuse to preach, if in health, when the occasion calls for it; unless there be some other minister present, whose lot it is to perform the service. Never to say, "I cannot preach, because I am not prepared;" but to make the attempt, and if I cannot preach so well as I would, to preach as well as I can.

Always to fulfill my appointments, and go to the place of meeting; unless there be such impediments in the way as are really insuperable.

To be willing to preach to few as well as to many; or, if circumstances dictate, to attend to such other religious exercises as may render the meeting as profitable to such as are present, as though their number were ever so great.

Never to go with reluctance into the pulpit;
never to go merely because I must, but because I wish to be there; and because I have something which I would wish to communicate. If I have not always felt thus, I well understood the difference.

Never, in preaching, to arraign an individual before an audience for any particular sin of which he may have been guilty; but if in discoursing upon the evil of sin, whether of sin in general or of any particular kind of sin, the conscience of any one should take it all to himself, not to regret it in the least, hoping it may do him good.

Never talk to the people about such trials as are peculiar to ministers; for the people cannot understand them, and the time will be worse than lost.

Not to be often complaining of slight indisposition of body, or any of the minor evils of life; for the people will soon grow tired of hearing it, and will pay no more regard to it than they would to the cawing of a raven; even should they not begin to suspect that it is all nothing but sheer laziness.
The only way to dispose of such evils, is either to work them off, or bear them at least with ordinary patience.

Not to notice every thing, however trifling, that may be hastily either said or done, by any of people, in relation to myself; but to hear many things as though I heard them not; and to enter into no controversies that can possibly be avoided consistently with duty.

Never to dun people on the Sabbath, nor preach to them about my own temporal support; but if I have any secular business to transact with them, to do it in some meeting, regularly warned, of those to whom it appertains.

To make it the great object of my ministry, to show unto men the way of salvation; and to bear burdens with the people in their tribulations, as well as to rejoice with them in prosperity.

To remember at all times and in all places, that I am a minister of Jesus Christ, and not by vain conversation out of the pulpit, destroy the good influence of what I have said in it.

Not to be a preacher merely for the learned, or for the gentry, but to consider my mission as extending to all ranks and conditions of people, whether high or low, saints or sinners. To become all things to all men that by all means I may save some.

Never to be idle in the place where I am, because I cannot move in some higher sphere; but to perform that service which God hath assigned me. Always remembering the Gospel commission, "Go and preach; preach the Gospel to every creature." To do any thing for the promotion of the cause of truth and righteousness, is better than to stand idle in the market place.

Never to anticipate a dismission, nor even to talk about it, till God in his providence shall make it manifest that it is something which ought to take place; but on the contrary to endeavor to give satisfactory evidence that the attachment and friendly regards which the people have for me are cordially reciprocated.

From the London Watchman

EVANGELICAL ALLIANCE.

A fourte great public meeting of the friends of the Alliance was held on Mondey evening in Exeter Hall, which was more densely crowded than on any former occasion.

On the motion of Sir Culling Smith, seconded by the Rev. Dr. Alder, Thomas Farmer, Esq., was called upon to preside.

The Rev. A. D. Campbell gave out the hymn,
"Jesus, the name high over all," and read the 72d
Psalm, and the 12th chapter of the Epistle to the Hebrews; after which the Rev. Mr. Russell engaged in prayer.

The Chairman said, we have a two-fold object in assembling together this evening. First, to extend the knowledge of the principles and proceedings of our Evangelical Alliance, and thus to insure a large amount of Christian sympathy, prayer, and effort; and, secondly, to afford to our beloved friends from America and the continent of Europe another opportunity of expressing those sentiments which have so happily assisted us in our deliberate meetings, and which prove us to be one in Christ. In our increased love of our brethren of different Churches, we own the accomplishment of one end contemplated by this Alliance, and if when we retire to our various spheres of Christian labor, that love shall burn more streng within us, and diffuse a steadier, brighter light around us, our meeting together in this metropolis will not have been in vain. The large attendance at this and previous public meetings affords a gratifying proof of the lively and extensive interest which our movements excites.

The Rev. Dr. Alder then read the first topic as follows:

"Topic I—That, as the Christian Union which this Alliance desires to promote can only be obtained through the blessed energy of the Holy Spirit, it be recommended to the members present, and absent brethren, to make this matter the subject of simultaneous weekly petition at the throne of grace, in their closets and families; and the forenoon of Monday is suggested as the time for that purpose. And that it be further recommended that the week beginning with the first Lord's day in January each year, be observed by the members and friends of the Alliance throughout the world as a season for concert in prayer on behalf of the great objects contemplated by the Alliance."

The Rev. Thomas Mortimer, D. D., of the Episcopa Chapel, Gray's Inn Lane, said—He rejoiced in being present at that meeting; and he must say hat the hymn with which they had opened was sufficient to make him speak and sing with joy of heart. It called to mind the feelings which he had experienced, as a little boy, when singing that hymn with parents and friends now in eternal glory hoped that he might become a minister of the cross to teach the love of Christ, and thought how happy he should be, with his "latest breath" to grasp the Savior's name, and cry, "Behold the Lamb."

If the Alliance were not the will of their Savior, he did not understand the seventeenth chapter of St. John. If it were opposed to his will he was at a loss to know the meaning of the words, "Neither pray I for these alone, but for them also which shall believe in me through their word; that they all may be one, as thou, Father, art in me and I in thee; that they also may be one in us."
That was enough for hundreds, and thousands, and tens of housands, who were of the Church of Christ. There would be difficulties in carrying out the Allince; they were prepared to expect them; but God had raised up—and to God give the glory, and not to him—a man peculiarly fitted to bring them together—their dear chairman, Sir Culling Smih. The difficulties arose from the differences of opinion on certain points; but he recollected what Charles Wesley had said to Whitefield; hey had had harsh words together, but Charles said:

"It matters not—if all our conflicts past,
Before the great white throne we meet at last;
Not by a party's narrow banks confined,
Not by the sameness of opinion joined;
But cemented by the Redeemer's blood,
And joined together by the love of God."

That was a sentiment in which he trusted they all shared; and he would say to them, "Go on and conquer,' but let them use no arms but those the Lord Jesus sanctioned—"By pureness, by knowledge, by ong-suffering, by kindness, by the Holy Ghost, by love unfeigned, by the word of truth, by the power of God, by the armor of righteousness on the right hand and on the left." Thus would they win he day, "for the mouth of the Lord had spoken it."

The Rev. W. Pomeroy, of Bangor, United States of America, said. Grant him those two things—cisential union in the view they held respecting the character of the Lord Jesus Christ, and essential union with regard to the relation they held to him—and he would take up his position without hesitation, and assert that the only thing which was requisite to produce true Christian union was only this—to make them acquainted with each other, to make them know each other's hearts. Why, it would have the effect, that when two such hearts, animated by such love, touched each other, like two kindred drops they would be mingled into one, and poured out like water. What was it that filled the meeting in Liverpool with so much delight, and joy, and praise? It was the discovery that, when those persons met together, instead of an explosion, a repellancy—which would throw them apart, which would place them in a hostile attitude—they found that they agreed so well together, they were astonished. So it always was with truth. There were three things which were important to the success of the Alliance. In the first place, they should keep in view the great central object of the Alliance—love and affection; for the nearer they kept to Christ, the nearer they would keep to each other; and just in proportion as they kept apart from Christ would they be kept separate. The second thing was, that they must not exalt matters of secondary and minor importance into essentials. How prone were they to seize upon some little thing, and look upon it until they had magnified it into a great principle; they had all a great deal of that spirit in them; it belonged to them as poor, selfish, dying sinners; but they must be careful and guard against that, and make a distinction between essential truth and points of a secondary or minor character. The third point was, to strive to attain a more enlightened and enlarged charity; they should try to get upon the top of some little pinnacle or tower, and look over the wall, with which they had surrounded themselves, and not think that all the interests of Christ's kingdom were committed to their little community, but that Christ had other sheep in the world not of their fold, but nevertheless of his flock. If the name of his denomination or any other were blotted out, the world would still be filled with trophies of God's redeeming grace, and the marriage feast of the Lamb would be furnished with guests. He wished them to go into their neighbor's garden; and, although the gate might not please them in its architecture, they would find many trees which were planted by the Lord, and which were watered by the same waters, and fanned by the same heavenly breezes, as their own; and they would acknowledge, "Of a truth, God's grace is larger than our hearts."

P. D. Hardy, Esq., of Dublin, said—He wished to call the attention of the meeting particularly to the topic on which he was called upon to address them. They could not expect God's blessing would rest on their work, unless they acted in its spirit. (Here the speaker read the "Topic,")
Some persons present might not know what Christian union meant. It was not a union of Churches, however apostolic they might be, but a union of sincere Christians, connected with the various branches of the Church throughout the entire globe. He bore testimony to the devout manner in which the proceedings of the Alliance had been carried on, and the spirit of love which had been manifested by all its members. There had been present at their conferences seven hundred members, from America, Sweden, Germany, France, and England; but there had been the same language, the same sentiments, used by all—proving that, however dissimilar in mind, they were still one in God. The great object of the Alliance, in his view, was to take up the work of the Reformation at the point it was laid down. If they could unite together, instead of having his country a by-word and a reproach, they would have happiness and peace. What they wanted was a concentration of Protestant effort a concentration of Christian truth in their heart.

The second topic was then read, as follows:

"Topic II.—That, in seeking the correction of what the members of this Alliance believe to be wrong in others, they desire, in humble dependance on the grace of God, themselves to obey, and by their practice and influence to impress upon others, the command of Christ, to consider first the beam that is in their own eye: that they will therefore strive to promote, each in his own communion, a spirit of repentance and humiliation for its peculiar sins; and to exercise a double measure of forbearance in reproving, where reproof is needful, the faults of those Christian brethren who belong to other bodies than their own.

"That, when required by conscience to assert or defend any views or principles wherein they differ from Christian brethren who agree with them in vital truths, the members of this Alliance will him earnestly, by the help of the Holy Spirit, to avoid all rash or groundless insinuations, personal imputations, or irritating allusions, and to maintain the meekness and gentleness of Christ, by speaking the truth only in love."

Rev. E. Kirk, of Boston, United States, said.
He was not sure that the Lord Jesus Christ was altogether pleased with the divisions in the Church —their calling themselves Episcopalians, Presbyterians, Baptists, or Methodists; they ought to unite together, for, in the mind of Christ, they were one; and Christ was before the Church, and the Church was in Christ, and was from Christ.
He might ask the Episcopalian where he began his religion; and he would tell of his penitential tears, and of his going to the foot of the cross and being sprinkled with the blood of Christ, and that he had entered there. He would tell him, so did he; he also entered the Church there, but he had gone down to a particular branch of it, which he liked best, and fixed himself there. Still, in joining that branch, he did not join its sectarianism; and his advice to all who wish to join his Church was, "Join our Church, but do not join any thing which is mean or little in it." Christ never liked any thing that was mean; his sentiments were large, and pure, and noble, and lovely. They were told that thousands of good men had great and strong objections to the Alliance. He knew it; but he also knew, that a thousand Christians had come up from all parts of the world because they desired to form an outward and manifest union. He had been willing to take a part in forming that Evangelical Alliance, and he thanked God that he had been enabled to do so. He felt as if he had been in an outer court of heaven; and he had felt such a glow, and flow, and beating of love in his heart, as he never before experienced; and he could only say to those brethren who had stood aloof, "Brother, you do not know how our Father has been entertaining us; how heavenly was the feast we have sat down to."
How large, how noble, how lovely was the object which the Evangelical Alliance had undertaken to accomplish! If they failed they would pray to God to forgive them, for they had tried to do it; if they were unworthy, God was just, and they would pray that he might raise up a generation who could do it. He thought—let him speak boldly—that this union was near the Savior's heart; it was because he felt such a conviction of doing right, and that in his mercy he expected them to do it, that he dared to speak so boldly before that assembly.

The Rev. Dr. Falck, of Erfurt, the Monastery where Luther was converted, then addressed the meeting in German, the Rev. Dr. Schmucker acting as interpreter. The Rev. speaker said that he was, perhaps, the only one in that assembly who did not understand that language which penetrates to all parts of the earth, and which had found an echo from the most distant lands; but he was not ashamed to acknowledge it, as he wished to speak to them in the language in which God commenced that great work, which, since the last forty years, had been prosecuted so gloriously, particularly in that great metropolis—the great work of the translation of the Bible into all the languages of the world. He wished to address them in the language of Martin Luther's conver sion, he had much to tell them. By the liberality of his King, (the King of Prussia,) whom they all respected, the old monastery had been restored, and an institution founded, called the "Lutheran Institution;" which was consecrated on the 10th of November, 1821, the anniversary of Luther's birth-day. The institution had been the cradle of three thousand children, and there were at present among them five bodily descendants of Martin Luther, two sons and three daughters.
Three hundred years after the death of Luther, his prayer had been heard, that the union of all the Churches might be accomplished. Luther's last prayer was as follows:—"Lord God our heavenly Father, I call upon thee in the name of thy dear Son, our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ, whom by thy grace I have acknowledged and preached. Graciously hear me in accordance with thy favor in this petition. According as thou hast revealed to me, in thy great mercy, the great declension, the blindness and the darkness of Popery, graciously preserve the Church of my beloved fatherland until the end, without apostasy from the true faith, and from the true profession of thy truth, in order that the world may be convinced that for this purpose thou didst send me.
Beloved God, Amen, Amen." That prayer was now about to be answered and accomplished, and the Lord was fulfilling the promises made to them through the Prophet Ezekiel, namely; "I will give you a united heart, and give you my Spirit, and they shall be my people, and I will be their God."

The Rev. Dr. Emory, President of Dickinson College, Pennsylvania, said. I espouse the cause of this Alliance, because I believe that the principle upon which it is founded is in accordance with the will of God. That principle, as I understand it, is that it seeks the unity of Christians, without requiring uniformity, and this I believe to be the law of God—a law exhibited in his works and declared in his word. The works of God exhibit no uniformity. Our earth is not a dead level, but its surface is beautifully diversified with mountain and valley, hill or dale, and separated by rivers, lakes, and oceans. It is not one monotonous sound that fills the ear; but every variety, from the sweet carol of the thunder. It is not one sober gray, or glaring red, with which nature is clothed; but all the diversified colors of the rainbow. And if we may be permitted to ascend from earthly things to heavenly, the God whom we worship is a Trinity. Mysterious as the doctrine is, still we hold to the personality of the Father, of the Son, and the Holy Spirit, three persons in one Godhead. And yet, though uniformity is not the law of nature, unity is. All these colors go to make the beauteous and cheering ray of light;
these varied sounds constitute the sweetest concord; and this unity is found not only in the physical external world, but it is sought in the content until he has found one formula on which to imbody his conclusions. The truth is one, the faith is one, and the Church is one. But this principle is not only the law of God's works: it is also the law of his word. There is the grand reason of all why Christians should be united, because it has been commanded. I will not begin to cite individual passages of Scripture. While, therefore, I am prepared to sympathize with those who look to the union of Christians as an instrument for doing away with many of the evils by which the earth is cursed, I am loth to rest there as the great principle of this Alliance; because I fear, that when these evils shall come to an end, as all evil must come to an end, if that were the only principle of our combination, the Alliance itself would come to an end. Therefore I love and support the cause, not because it may contribute to the removal of any evil, either social, moral, or political; but I love it because it is right, because God has commanded it through all his works and in all his word. I would not have us bound together by the pressure from without, fearful lest, when that pressure was withdrawn, we should fall to pieces. I would have the entire mass held together by one all-pervading principle of attraction;
the attraction not of cohesion merely, but the attraction of aggregation; and then, the principle being inherent in the mass itself, the union must be as perpetual as the existence of human kind.

The Rev. Dr. Baird, Corresponding Secretary, of the Evangelical Society, of New York, said.
He had had a great deal of experience in Evangelical Alliances, and he had learnt to appreciate the excellences of other denominations; he had lost much of that narrow spirit which he held in his early life, and the more he had known the brethren the more he had loved them. He had, in fact, had so much to do with other denominations, that he had almost lost his ecclesiastical identity; but he blessed God, that that feeling was diffusing itself, and they saw a proof of it in the formation of the Evangelical Alliance. He must say, that what had been accomplished was truly wonderful, when he saw the great doctrinal basis which had been approved by so many men of so many different denominations, and the principles of which had been dwelt upon in the preceding resolutions. They had not been able to get through all the details of their organization; but what had been effected was infinitely more important than that which remained to be done.
He thought the time was fully come for such a movement, and he trusted that every one of them, when he returned to his home, would, by his conversation, by his precepts, and by his example, do every thing in his power to diffuse the spirit of evangelical love, and thus prove that their coming together had not been in vain. His son, a few days before his leaving home, had come to him and said he had found, in reading his Greek Testament, a motto, which, as he was coming to England to the Evangelical Alliance, he wished should be inscribed on his seal, and that was in English, "One sheep-fold and one Shepherd."

The Rev. R. Masaroon, of Dublin, then gave out the hymn, "Behold the sure foundation stone;"
and

The Rev. Norman Macleod engaged in prayer.

The Rev. William Bevan read the third topic as follows:—

"Topic III.—That, while they believe it highly desirable that Christians of different bodies, holding the Head, should own each other as brethren by some such means as the Evangelical Alliance affords, the members of the Alliance disclaim the thought that those only who openly join this society are sincere friends to the cause of Christian Union: that, on the contrary, they regard all those as its true friends who solemnly purpose in their hearts, and fulfill that purpose in their practice, to be more watchful in future against occasions of strife, more tender and charitable toward Christians from whom they differ, and more constant in prayer for the union of all the true disciples of Christ. * * * That the members of this Alliance, therefore, would invite, humbly and earnestly, all ministers of the Gospel, all conductors of religious publications, and others who have influence in various bodies of Christians, to watch more than ever against the sins of the heart, or the tongue, or the pen, toward Christians of other denominations; and to promote more zealously than hitherto a spirit of peace, unity and godly love, among all true believers in the Lord Jesus Christ."

The Rev. James Shore, of Totness, said he had enjoyed much sweet comfort and sympathy with the members of the Alliance at their meetings, and really at the departure of his foreign friends, he might truly say with David—"My soul is grieved for thee, my brother Jonathan." He prayed to God that they might be taken in safety to their respective homes, and if they could not meet again outwardly, he trusted they might meet inwardly in soul—and if they should not meet again on earth, that they might meet with joy around the throne of thrones. If any person had cause for thankfulness for the formation of that Alliance, it was himself; no one could tell the sweet enjoyment he had felt at its meetings. He had nothing to advance in its support, but if he should be as long in confinement for preaching the word of God as the excellent Bunyan was, he might then be enabled to bring forward something worthy of being heard. It had been asked—what had been done by the Evangelical Alliance? It had brought into union a large number of the Christian brotherhood, and he trusted it would go on increasing until all who confessed the name of Jesus, and agreed in the truth of his holy word, should "live in unity and godly love." He prayed that they might be brought nearer and nearer to the Lord

Jesus, as the grand centre; and that He might guide them by His counsels, and afterward receive them into his rest.

The Rev. WM. CHALMERS, minister of the Marylebone Presbyterian Church, said—He considered it a high privilege to be allowed to take part in the proceedings of that meeting. The Alliance had resolved to regard all friends of Christian truth as friends of the Alliance, and to treat them virtually as members of the Alliance, so long as they acted in that spirit which it was intended to promote. That Alliance might weaken their attachment to their own peculiar characteristics, so far as they might be called peculiar to their own Church or sect, but it could not lessen their attachment to the grand truths which were drawn from the "sempiternal source of truth divine," in which they considered more of Christ than of themselves. Who cared for the eclipse of the moon, when they knew that it was only a shadow cast by the greater upon the lesser light of heaven; and who was afraid of a denominational peculiarity, which would disappear when the full blaze of Gospel light and liberty was brought to bear upon it! While it weakened their affection for denominational peculiarities, it would exemplify the truth. Let them walk together by the same rule and the same grand principle with all their hearts. Who could tell what would be the result on the destinies of the Church of Christ? for they had seen the dawn of a glorious day for the Church. They had all heard of the statue of Memnon, which was silent so long as the light, however clear, which shone upon it, was the cold light of the moon, but no sooner did the first warm rays of the morning sun touch that statue, than the sleeping chords of its lyre awoke, and it breathed forth the strains of most exquisite music. He thought that the light which had so long shone upon the Church was too cold; but when the sun of love should light that Church and warm it, he hoped to hear again raised the song of the angels—"Glory to God in the highest; peace on earth, and good will toward men."

The Rev. Mr. BEVAN, then read the fourth topic:—

"TOPIC IV.—That, since all the disciples of Christ are commanded by the Holy Spirit to add to brotherly kindness, love, and are bound to pray that all who professand call themselves Christians, should be led into the way of truth, it is earnestly recommended to the members of the Evangelical Alliance to offer a special prayer for all merely nominal Christians, as well as for Jews and Gentiles throughout the world. * * * That this conference, earnestly longing for the universal spread of Christ's kingdom, devoutly praises God, for the grace whereby, in late years, Evangelical Christians have been moved to manifold efforts to make the Savior known to both Jew and Gentile, and faithful men have been raised up to undertake the toil: they would offer to all Evangelical Missionaries their most fraternal congratulations and sympathy, would hail the flocks they have been honored to gather as welcome and beloved members of the household of God; and, above all, would implore the Head of the Church to shield his servants, to edify his rising Churches, and, by outpourings of his Holy Spirit, to enlighten Israel with the knowledge of the true Messiah, and to bring the heathen out of darkness into light. They would also record their confident hope, that their beloved Missionary brethren will strive more and more to manifest before the Israelite and other classes who know not the Redeemer, that union in their blessed Lord, the spirit of which this conference would gratefully acknowledge they have generally cherished."

The Rev. Dr. Craig, of Glasgow, said, The Alliance had met with the warm and cordial greeting of all warm-hearted Christians, and if it did no more than change the bitter waters of controversy, suppressing all rancor of feeling, making them shrink from rising rough words, and all ungenerous allusions; if it did no more than that, Christian union would have manifested the strongest evidence of the truth of that great principle which they, by the blessing of God, were permitted to promote. That institution stood superior to most of the institutions of the world, for they were formed for temporal objects, that for eternal; and it was a cause which they ought to use all their energies to advance. There was one other point which he thought important, and that was, that they should cultivate a true spirit of humility—thinking every one better than themselves, forbearing one another, and loving one another. They were forbidden to recompense any man evil for evil, but were to bear contumely with patience, and to exhibit a spirit of humility and tender love. If they did that, the Alliance must prosper, and God himself, when he looked down upon it, would declare that it should be "for a name, and for an everlasting sign that should not be cut off."

"The Rev. T. BRAINERD, of America, said.—The principles of the Alliance would destroy controversy, and increase that love which was in Him who came to seek and to save the souls of men. A poor mechanic in Philadelphia took an interest in the spiritual welfare of the poor sailors, and he hired a large room, and put out a sign like that put out in America when sailors were engaged. A sailor passing saw the sign, and called out, "Ship ahoy, whither bound?"—The old mechanic replied that "he was fitting out a fleet for the New Jerusalem, and that the inquirer might go by the Presbyterian ship, the Episcopalian ship, the Methodist ship, or the Baptist ship, if he would only agree to serve under the great admiral, the Lord Jesus Christ."—They might also be sharers of a common triumph and responsibility, but they must all go heart and hand under the great admiral, Jesus Christ. He should do an injustice, as he was closing the services of the day, if he did not, in the name of the delegatian for America, express their gratitude for the kindness which had been shown them: they came strangers but departed friends; they came with nothing to recommend them except the interest and association of love; and in future, they should love the father land more, not because it was the father land, but because it had recognized a project for uniting the world. The Romans, in the age of the republic, never gave triumphs to a general who was successful in civil war, because they considered that it was a loss of their own people; but reserved their triumphs for those who conquered the foreign foes of the country; and thus spirits mighty in controversy, now that controversy would be ended, would find ample field for effort in the Pagan mind, and would obtain their final triumph and reward in heaven. He prayed that God might bless them and their noble enterprise; he and his brethren thus left their hearts and their prayers with them, and were going toward the setting sun to represent their spirit and language, and give a lesson of Christian love to those under their influence there.

The proceedings terminated by singing the fifty-first hymn of Watts' collection, the benediction being pronounced by Rev. W. WALKER, of Gallow, Meath.

An exchange says:—A few days ago a gentleman(?) came into our sanctum and took off his hat, and picking up a piece of manuscript commenced reading it very closely. We reached over and took a letter out of his hat, unfolded and commenced reading it. He was so busy that he did not discover how we were paying him in his own coin, until we asked him what it was his correspondent was writing to him about a woman? "Why, look here' Squire," says he, "you surely are not reading my private letters?" Certainly, sir," said we, "you are reading our private manuscripts." He was plagued, begged us not to mention his name, promised to do so no more, and we quit even.

DEAR BR. BASSETT: I entered upon my labors in this, (Belmont) circuit, on the first Sabbath after the rise of Conference. So soon as possible, I called together the officiary, and proceeded to appoint the first Quarterly Conference, which took place accordingly, at the Lutheran Meeting House, 3 miles west of Fairview, on the 7th inst. Here we had no class, and not even a member. Our meeting continued till the 13th, and during its progress, several professed to have obtained the pardon of their sins, through Christ. On the 11th, several persons requested me to organize a class. I appointed another day for this purpose, when sixteen came forward to be organized into the new class. Before the close, 5 more gave in their names, making 21. With these, we have received within the circuit, twenty-seven, making an aggregate of membership in the Circuit, of 117. And among us flows unruffled the stream of peace. May the Lord continue his goodness toward us. We ask the prayers of all who love our Lord Jesus Christ.

BR. BASSETT: I would say to our President, Br. Clancy, that we have held our first Quarterly Meeting, and one Protracted Meeting, both of which were seasons of refreshing from the presence of the Lord. Eleven have united with us since Conference. We are hoping and praying that others still will be added, who shall adorn the doctrine of God our Savior, and be eternally saved. At present, we have peace throughout our borders.

MY DEAR OLD FRIEND AND BROTHER B.—Through the mercy of God, my health is still tolerably good, though my family has been considerably afflicted. I am still enabled to attend to my appointments. I held my Quarterly Meeting on the seventh and eighth of this month, at Fairview Meeting House. We had a good time. Several united with the Church. Upon the whole, the circuit is I trust, on the advance.

Mad River Mission, Nov. 17, 1846.

DEAR BROTHER: I reached my field of labor, on the second day of October, and commenced my labors on the Sabbath following. We have just closed our first Quarterly meeting. We commenced under very unfavorable circumstances, the weather being very rainy, and our house very small. Yet notwithstanding the rain, the house would not hold the people. On Sabbath night, we were visited with the gracious power of God. During the sermon, one soul that had been seeking the Lord for some time, was enabled to rejoice in his salvation, and many others also were made to rejoice in God. I had to relinquish my subject of discourse, and call for mourners. Six came forward, two of whom received pardon. Six united with the church. We have had one other protracted meeting, which lasted five days. The Lord blessed our labor, and many were made happy in him. We organized a society of twelve. We hope that we shall be enabled to form a good circuit out of our Mission. Give us your prayers, that God may still bless us. The brethren here have given evidence that their religion is of the right sort, for it influences them to open their purse strings, and support their minister.

Yours in the bonds of peace,

L. ENSMINGER.

Darby Mission, Nov. 17, 1846.

DEAR BR. BASSETT: Our first Quarterly Meeting for the Conference year is over. It was held in the Converse neighborhood, 3 miles from Pleasant Valley. We had a good time: On Sunday morning especially, at our lovefeast, we had a pleasant gale. The people of God, though belonging to different denominations, were enabled to rejoice together in hope of a final and happy meeting in heaven. We have reason to believe also, that good impressions were left upon the minds of some non-professing members of community. May the blessed Redeemer carry on his gracious work, to the glory of his excellent name. We have some few noble souls on this Mission, who, we believe are willing to do what they can for the interests of our Redeemer's cause, though at some pecuniary sacrifice. And it is with a view of a union of effort on the part of those faithful few, whilst they trust in their great Captain, that we hope for success.

R. K. DAVIS.

Greenville Mission, Nov. 1846.

BR. BASSETT: This will inform you that I am at my post surrounded by some noble hearted souls. Our prayer is, that God may prosper the means and give us refreshing seasons. Many of our friends have been much afflicted, but are now better. The Lord sanctify their afflictions to the good of their souls. Our first Quarterly meeting took place the 14th & 15th of this month. We had very pleasant times, though no great excitement. We were favored with the labors of Br. Young, our President, who had just got up from the ague, a day or two before. Likewise father Flood was with us and labored with zeal. His health is good. We have peace within our borders notwithstanding the operations of conflicting elements. But under the glorious banner of the King of truth, we expect to rally our little forces, and make a bold stand against infidelity, in its various forms.

We expect to hold a Chrismas meeting at Br. Richard Ogans, to continue over Sabbath. We invite the brethren of adjoining circuits to attend. Brs. Hunt and Thornbury will be expected—likewise Br. Flood. We also expect to hold a New Yedr meeting at Palestine, to continue over Sabbath. We request all brethren who can leave their circuits, to come and help us. The place is 7 miles south west of Greenville.

Yours in Christ;

J. P. Kezerta.

BR. BASSETT: I entered on my charge the first of October, have been twice around the Circuit, and am much better pleased with my appointment than I anticipated. The people are very friendly, and many of them, I believe, are striving to gain immortality and eternal life. We have just closed our first Quarterly Meeting. We had a comfortable time, and some souls were refreshed from the presence of the Lord. Bless his holy name. Br. Swaney was with us, and labored in his usual fervent and pathetic manner. We trust there was seed sown, the fruit of which will be seen in heaven. Yours, &c.

MR. EDITOR: Last Wednesday evening wound up the exercises of our first quarterly meeting at this place. The meeting was one of much interest to the church; and well attended by people of the world; and altho' we had not the pleasure of witnessing any conversions, believers were favored with frequent "times of refreshing from the presence of the Lord." During our meeting 7 persons united with us in church fellowship, and one since. As yet we have had nothing to discourage us. In hope that you will not forget us in your prayers, I subscribe myself yours &c.

BR BASSET: I was appointed by conference to labor on Mississinaway circuit. And as Union circuit was left unsupplied, the President requested me also to take charge of that. I have been around both circuits, and find the bretheren much discouraged, especially on the last named circuit, for being much neglected the past year.—But we are hoping and praying for better times. The first Quarterly meeting for Mississinaway circuit is to be held at Johnsons S. H. 10 miles from Marion on the road to Muncytown, first Saturday and Sabbath in December. The Quarterly meeting for Union circuit is appointed at Br Fosters, on White Lick, a mile or two east of Pittsborough, on the 3d Saturday and Sabbath of December.—As we are nearly destitute of ministerial help on both circuits, we earnestly solicit our brethren, from neighboring circuits, to come to our aid.

TO TEMPERANCE MEN

COLUMBUS, Nov. 18th, 1846.

The undesigned were appointed, at the late Temperance Convention held in this city, a committee to prepare and distribute throughout the State, blank petitions in accordance with a form decided upon by that Convention. In discharge of their duty they have already sent out a large number of these petitions, and have yet a great number on hand; but they find it absolutly impossible to circulate them in every County in the State, as they are in possession of no address or name, to which they should be sent, in very many counties. They have therefore thought it best to call upon Temperance men, who have not received any of these petitions, to prepare them, themselves and distribute them in their own neighborhoods. The following is the brm of the petition prepared.

FORM OF PETITION.

Please Circulate, and return on or before the 16th of December.

To the Honorable, The General Assemby of the State of Ohio.—We, the undesigned, lega voters, of the State of Ohio, of the County of———, and Town of———, respectfully petition your honorable body, to set apart the third Monday of April next, on which the legal voters of our township, city, and precinct, may assemble at their usual places of holding elections, and there decide by ballot, whether license to sell intoxicating drinks, shall or shall not be granted within their respective boundaries.

It is designed that there should be three separate classes of petitions—one for the legal voters, one for the ladies, and one for minors; and the words "Ladies" or "Minors" should be inserted in place of the "Legal voters," in the petition designed for them.

The committee would most earnestly exhort all Temperance men, where facilities exist, to have these petitions printed and widely circulated in their respective neighborhoods. A momentous issue is before you, and demands your prompt, efficient action. Vascillating and timid Legislatures, have heretofore declined taking any decided measure of temperance reform for fear of PUBLIC OPINION. Let them now hear coming up from every section of the State, the loud voice of a hundred thousand petitioners demanding at their hands, this measure of relief, and proclaiming what is the sentiment of an enlightned public opinion. Circulate these petitions immediately in every township and school district in the county. Up and work on, boldly and bavely, and the thanksgiving voice of a people redeemed from the thraldom of intemperance, will rot reward your labors.

OBITUARY.

[The following sketch of sister Conclin, of Cincinnati, whose death we noticed a week or two ago, is furnished us by an intimate friend of the deceased. ED.]

Written for the Western Recorder.

A TRIBUTE TO DEPARTED WORTH.

Died, Sept. 21st, 1846, of pulmonary consumption, Mrs. Sarah Ann Conclin, wife of Mr. Geo. Conclin, and daughter of Mr. Wm. and Mary Cones, in the 37th year of her age. She was born in Campbell Co. Kentucky, Feb. 9, 1817, but whilst she was yet an infant her parents removed to this city. Her husband was the first that offered himself to the Methodest Protestant Church as a member on probation, after the secession of 1828, in this city. Shortly after this, he was united in marriage with the deceased though she was not at that time a member of the Church. She was early engaged as a Sabath School Teacher, at the old Stone Meeting House previous to the division in the Church. She soon felt it her duty to unite with the Church of which she remained a worthy member till the time of her death. She was well known as a pattern of unassuming piety Her attachment to the Church was rather more than ordinary. She was very partial to class meeting. I have heard her say that she did not like to be invited out to tea on the same afternoon of her class. She was uniform in all her religious duties. At the regular prayer meetings of the week, she would soon miss any person (if absent) who was in the habit of attending. She would soon find it convenient to call upon them and inquire if they or their family were sick. Truly sister Conclin was an ornament to society. She was an humble Christian—a faithful member of the Church—a good woman—an affectionate wife and mother. She has left a husband and six children with numerous other near relatives, to mourn their loss, which is her eternal gain.—May they so live, as to join this sainted sister, in heaven above. Her funeral was attended by a large concourse of mourning relatives and friends at the Sixth Street Metho dist Protestant Church. Discourse delivered by Rev. Joel Dalbey, from these words; "Blessed are the dead, that die in the Lord.

WESTERN RECORDER.

PUTNAM, OHIO.

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 28, 1846.

Letter from Rev. Geo. Richey.

It will be recollected that in August last, we published an article for this brother, in answer to a communicaton from "One who thinks much." We did so, as an act of justice to the "Wesleyan" branch of the church of which he is a minister forasmuch as the writer last referred to, had taken the liberty to have reference to that organization, and we were anxious to have justice done to all parties. Instead however of improving the opportunity to vindicate his own church, the object professedly had in view, he occupied most of his paper in raising objections against the M. P. Church. Neither 'one who thinks much,' nor any other writer, has replied to the article of Br. Richey. Yet he sometime since favored us with another communication, which coming to hand, whilst we were absent at Conference, was laid by, and with a mass of other documents, did not receive attention for several weeks. When we first came to examine the article, finding it to contain some things injustifiably reproachful of the M. P. Church, (to use mild terms,) we did not deem it our duty to publish the paper, and so laid it aside. And indeed, should any Methodist P. writer, indulge in terms abusive of the Wesleyan Methodist Church, he certainly could not think of occupying place in the columns of the "True Wesleyan," the organ of that Church. And we should certainly deem it just and fair for the "Wesleyan" to decline any such communications. Learning, recently however that considerable enquiry is made upon the part of the friends of Br. Richey, respecting his correspondence with us, we have concluded to publish the commication, taking the liberty of appending a few notes.

Writen for the Western Recorder.

MR. EDITOR: I ask you to publish one more communication from my pen I have two reasons for so doing. 1st. You refer me to Timothy's article, which was published in the Recorder of Aug. 14th, as an answer to my reply to Mr. Thinkmuch. Second, Timothy challenges any man from Maine to Georgia, to answer his argument. Now, I propose, for the above reasons, to reply. Timothy, in his article, takes the broad ground, that it would be wrong for any man or set of men, to secede from a church, although that church tolerates crime. Farther, he declares that there is not a passage in the Bible that justifies such a step. If I understand him properly, he admits two facts. First the M. P. Church tolerates slavery, secondly that slaveholders are sinners. The first passage that I will quote to prove that Christians are bound to withdraw from churches that tolerate crime, (1.) as found in 2d Thessolonians 3d Chapter and 6th verse. Now we command you brethren in the name of our Lord Jesus Christ, to withdraw yourselves from every brother that walketh disorderly, (2.) and not according to the tradition which ye received from us" Here we have a plain and positive command given by the inspiration of the Holy Ghost, to do what!! to withdraw from the world as Timothy declares, or to stay in a corrupt church, (3.) and fellowship the wicked!! no, but to withdraw from every brother (that is every professing Christian,) that walks disorderly. Now if slaveholders are sinners, and Timothy, virtually admits the fact, do they not walk disorderly? they certainly do, or if not, a man may be a murderer, and at the same time be an orderly walking Christian. Now how does the case stand with the M. P. Church? She tolerates slavery, that is she has slaveholders in her communion, both ministers and members. Timothy in the same church, is bound to call them his brethren, he has no power, nor the church has no power, according to her present Constitution, to to expel them. (4.) They are sinners. Now does the text command us to withdraw from them? if it does not it is a text void of meaning. According to the text, if the church to which I belong makes provisions, to receive impenitent sinners into her communion, (5.) and the church will not put away that wicked person or persons, I am bound not to fellowship them as Christians, but I am positively commanded to withdraw from them. By refusing to do so I violate the command of God, and partake of other men's sins. (6.) But according to Timothy's argument I am bound to remain and fellowship them as Christians. (7.) Now I argue, if I am bound to stay in a church and fellowship one class of sinners, for the same reason I am bound to fellowship every other class of sinners this side of perdition, if they are only members of the church, and have on a cloak of christianity, under which they perpetrate crime as black as the pit. Then let the church open her doors as wide as the gate of hell, and receive the adulterer, the murderer, and in a word every other abominable and filthy character, that is a pest to good society; and yet I am bound to call them brethren in Christ. I cannot see any propriety in the church taking into her communion men-stealers, (and such are all slaveholders; see Clark on 1st Timothy, 1st chapter and 10th verse,) and keeping out other sinners who are not guilty of any greater crimes. (8.) I do think that if they can take the man-thief into the church, and call him a brother, they should take the sheep-thief also. But how true are the lines of the poet which say,

They'll church you if you sip a dram,
And damn you if you steal a lamb;
Yet rob old Tommy, Dol and Sam
Of human rights and bread and ham,
And this goes down for union.

But again I refer Timothy to Matthew 18th chap. 15—17 verses. Here is a direction given for the treatment of an impenitent brother, now are we to regard him, as a christian, no; but let him be unto thee as a heathen man, and a publican. Now I ask how were christians, to regard heathens and worshippers of idols, let Paul (and not modern Timothy) answer the question, "What concord hath Christ with Belial, or what part hath he that believeth with an infidel." Christ here commands, that we treat an impenitent brother as a heathen and an infidel. (9.)

But Timothy says "stay in the church with him! I will now refer to 1st Corinthians 5th Chap. 11 Verse "But now I have written unto you not to keep company if any man that is called a brother be a fornicator or covetous, or an idolator or a railer or a drunkard or an extortioner, with such an one no not to eat." Here is a plain command, to have no fellowship with the wicked, no not to eat the Lord's supper with them. But Timothy finds no difficulty in staying in the same church with them, and communing in the same church with them, and if he were a member of the last General Conference, (as, I think he was,) (10.) he could stand up by their side, make laws in conjunction with them, to govern himself, and the Church of which he is a member. Well, that, only proves that, Timothy, can do what Paul, and Christ would not do. But, once more, "have no fellowship with the unfruitful works of darkness," Ephesians, 11th verse. Now I ask Timothy whether this does not refer to church, or Christian fellowship? it certainly does. But again, "be not partakers of other men's sins." I ask how we can more effectually do this than by fellowshiping those with whom God says "have no fellowship." But Timothy seems to be alarmed at the consequences that this doctrine involves, and he argues that "God punishes every man for his own sins, and will not transfer the guilt of the slaveholder to him," true, but we think we can help him out of this dilemma. The slaveholder is punished for his own sins, and Timothy, for fellowshiping him with whom God says "have no fellowship," violates the command of God, and as sin is the transgression of the law of God, Timothy is punished for his own sin, and not for the sin of the slaveholder. But Timothy takes the ground that the doctrine under consideration "would damn all the Apostles and primature christians," for he says, that "the church has always tolerated crime." We remark that this is an assumption without proof, and before we can believe that the church in all ages in her legislative capacity, made provision for receiving men, who continue in the practice of crime, (11.) we want some proof, something more than the mere assertion of Timothy. Again Timothy declares that there is not a passage in the Word of God "that justifies division or secession." Certainly that is a late discovery on the part of the ministers of the M. P. Church. They did not preach so but a very few eyars ago. Did they act in good faith when they cried out "division and secession" (12.) a short time ago? or did they act without faith? now we are told that "whatever is not of faith is sin." Now if Timothy's declaration is true the foundation of the M. P. Church rests on hay, wood, and stubble. (13.) But how true it is, the case being altered, it alters the case, but let me ask what great moral principle did the organizers of the M. P. Church contend for when they raised the cry of "secession" from the M. E. Church? (14.) Was it a cry against slavery or against any other great moral evil! No it was merely a contention about the form of church government. Now Timothy I do think that if the form of church government was so important as to require (if not you) the founders of your church to cry out "secession," and disturb the peace of not only societies and circuits, but of whole conferences, nay more, the whole M. E. Church. I do think that the question of slavery, to say the least, equally important, though it should disturb your peace. Now I dont say that there was no cause for this disturbance, nor do I say that no good was effected by it. I refer to it to show you and all others who take the same ground their inconsistency. I do think that in all conscience if all other churches should cry out against secession the M. P's. should hold their peace. For this saying they reproach themselves.

GEORGE RICHEY.

Senecaville, O. September 3, 1846.

(1.) Be careful, Br. R. Are you right sure that no crime is tolerated in the W. M. Church? We are sorry to intimate such a thing, but merely suggest, that you are liable to make out that it is your own duty to "withdraw" as you say, from one of the "churches that tolerate crime." We say, this might even be the case.

(2.) We are not sure that our friend makes a legitimate application of this passage from St. Paul. Does not the apostle point out the duty of the church ("brethren") towards "a brother," rather than the duty of a brother towards a church? When Br. R. attempts to prove from this scripture that the brethren (church) should withdraw from a slaveholding brother, we have no controversy with him on the correctness of his position.

(3.) "A corrupt church." Here is a small specimen of that denunciation and abuse with which some folks are striving to purify the churches, convert the world, and put an end to slavery. We opine however, that those good objects will be quite as soon brought to pass without the aid of such. We have our objections to different churches, doctrine sometimes, government in some instances, practice in others. We are not without our objections withal to the W. M. denomination. But if we should break forth into an unqualified denunciation of it as "a corrupt church," we should be deemed guilty of a gross breach of politeness, if not also of bringing forward "railing accusations." We have too much respect for the worthy and honest portion of that community, (the greater part of course,) to make them responsible for what is wrong in others, whilst we know they would neither approve nor justify it. And is the M. P. Church to be denounced as a "corrupt Church" because a minor portion of its members are not yet convinced of the sinfulness of slaveholding, or at least, are not yet persuaded to relinquish the practice of it, whilst we are well persuaded that an immensely larger portion of our community deprecate its existance any where within the connextion, and are ever praying and striving to procure its extirpation from the church?

(4.) A more gross misrepresentation than this, was never uttered against the M. P. Church, or against any church. "All offences condemned by the word of God,—shall subject ministers preachers and members to expulsion from the church." Const. Art. 13. More than two thirds of the M. P. Church have declared slaveholding "an offence condemned by the word of God." If therefore some who live in the voluntary practice of slaveholding, are retained in the church, it is not for want of "power according to the present constitution to expel them."

(5.) Yours may have—we profess not to know. Ours, however has no such provision.

(6.) Such is your construction.

(7.) You, bound? No Sir. You are free to withdraw from as many churches as you please, but pray, do not be so clamorous that every body should have the same convictions of duty, and follow your worthy example in all things. For we really think there are some few other men besides Geo. Richey, who have some degree of understanding, and judgment, and conscience.

(8.) Nor do we. Does our friend suppose that we would for one moment attempt to withstand this his eloquent appeal? We are neither an advocate, nor an apologist for crime, either in or out of the church.

(9.) Here again instead of pointing out the duty of the church towards the holder of slaves, you recur to your favorite dogma of secession from the church.

(10.) Our friend is here under a mistake, but it is by no means his first one. 'Timothy' was not a member, nor a visitor at the Gen. Conference.

(11.) And where did Timothy ever say any such thing.

(12.) Br. Richey has a wrong impression in regard to the course of M. P. Ministers. We were one of the first to withdraw from the M. E. Church, in the secession of 1828, though not then a minister, and afterward served many years as an itinerant pioneer in the cause of the M. P. C., and we never yet cried out "division or secession." Nor do we believe it has been the course of more than a very few of our brethren (M. P. ministers) to recommend secession from another church. And we unhesitatingly say that we recollect no instance in which an M. P. minister urged a church division. It has been left for our worthy Wesleyan brethren, to preach sermons, and write treatises (Br. R. for instance) on the necessity of secession &c. They are to have the honor, of raising this cry, "Division and secession," of which he speaks. We were just reading in the "True Wesleyan," a letter from a minister out west, in which he gives account at some length of his visiting Pleasant Valley, in this State, and holding a meeting which he commenced on Saturday evening and continued over Sunday. He concludes the account of this important meeting in the following words:

"We continued our meeting until Monday evening, when I gave them a discourse on secession, and the result of this effort was, I organized a small society in that place of five members, of the right kind, all from the M. E. Church, with a prospect of more soon."

This glorious news of the results of preaching "secession" must be sent to New York and published abroad, as a delightful piece of information whilst not one word is said about a sinner's being converted, or even convicted for sin. We trust that our "M. P. ministers" will ever find better employ than preaching "secession."

(13.) Quite a compliment towards your neighbors, Br. R.

(14.) Here again we are reminded of what is said in a good book of some who "understand neither what they say, nor whereof they affirm." All that follows is but beating the man of straw.

Finally, Br. Richey, when you get your soul filled with the love of God, if you will write us again, and give us something calculated to benefit the Church or the world, especially the slaves or the slaveholders, we will try and give place to your productions.

THE SESSION PAPERS.

We are favored to receive regularly from Columbus, the two great officials of the two leading political parties, viz., the Ohio State Journal (Whig.) and the Ohio Statesman, (Democratic.) In conducting a religious journal, we of course occupy neutral ground in politics. Yet it is desirable with us to have one or more good newspapers from the capital of our State, and especially to have regular journals of the legislative proceedings, from which we may prepare abstracts for the benefit of those of our readers who are able to take but one newspaper. And as ours is not a party paper, and as we have to serve men of both parties, we esteem it a privilege to hear from both sides. Hitherto, the Editors of both political journals referred to, have treated us with uniform politeness. And it would be a pleasure to us to reciprocate their favors in any way consistent with our calling. The day is near at hand when the General Assembly is to convene. The business of our Legislature is of increasing interest from session to session. Reports of the proceedings during the session., are given in extenso by each of the above named journals. They have each just announced their terms by the year, and for the session, which we take pleasure in transferring to our columns for the information of our political friends.

A Chapter of Proverbs.

1. Never inquire thou of the editor for the news for behold it is his duty at the appointed time to give it to thee without asking.

2. When thou dost write for his paper, never say unto him 'what thinkest thou of my piece?' for it may be the truth will offend thee.

3. It is not fit that thou should'st ask of him who is the author of any article, for his duty requireth him to keep it to himself.

4. When thou dost enter printing office have a care to thyself that thou dost not touch a type, for thou mayest cause the printer much trouble.

5. Look thou not at the copy which is in the hands of the compositors; for tis not meet in the eyes of the printer.

6. Neither examine thou the proof sheet, for it is not ready to meet thine eye, and thou mayest not understand it.

7. When thou sendest a communication to a periodical, do not always expect it to appear in the next number because it may be that the editor has some other correspondents.

8. When thou sendest long communications, do not demand their thorough examination and an answer, by the next mail; for how canst thou know but the editor may have something else to do?

9. If the editor should make some small alterations in thy manuscript, do not let thy temper rise; for it is a very bad sign; and to publish it just as received, might be much against thy literary credit.

10. Do not suppose that all the productions of thy gifted pen must be published, because thou likest them; for people have different tastes, and many people who consider themselves handsome, have no idea of the number of freckles on their own faces.

11. When thou readest the production of the printer's hard toil, let it be with the sweet satisfaction of having paid him for his labor.

Thus endeth the first lesson.—Boston Olive Branch.

Br. R. M. Dalbey, we have done the best we could for your new subscribers, in making up the back numbers. To only two of them could we send all the numbers. The rest commence with No. 4.

Accident at Cincinnati.—We regret to learn by the Cincinnati papers that Rev. C. W. Maley, as he was about entering Soule Chapel in that city, lost his footing, and was precipitated into the outer inclosure of the basement breaking his colar bone, and seriously injuring his shoulder.

☞ Letters from Brothers J. I. Stillians, & A. R. Brown; next week.

Columbian Magazine.—We have just received the December No. of this elegant work, completing the sixth volume. Its embellishments are three fine engravings, and a piece of music. The Tiger Hunt is the most interesting picture. Nearly all the reading matter is furnished by female writers in popular standing. The publisher professes to be largely encouraged in his prospects for a new volume. Terms $3 per year, in advance. Two copies for $5. Isreal Post Publisher N. York.

Bible Cause.—We direct attention to the notice in another column of a meeting of the Muskingum County Bible Society.

An Anti-Slavery Paper at Washington City. We see by a late number of the Cincinnati Herald, that arrangements have been made for establishing an Anti-Slavery paper at Washington City. It is to be called "The National Era," and is to commence its issue on the first of Jan. next that will be a new Era indeed in American History. It is a great enterprise and fraught with important consequences. It is carrying the war into Africa. Dr. G. Baily, jr. is to remove to Washington, and take editorial charge of the new paper, assisted by G. G. Whittier, and A. A. Phelps, as Corresponding Editors. The paper is to be the property of a committee. We do not learn that it is to be a Liberty (political) paper, but simply an Anti-Slavery paper. As such we wish it success.

"Horsejoly," again.—A report from the Committee is received, but not in time for this number. We regret that the Financial Report is not yet given. We suppose that the modesty of the committee forbids them to announce their own liberality. The President, however is generally very prompt to acknowledge favors. We shall doubtless hear from him, someday. Meanwhile the 'Report,' is an interesting paper, and shall be given to our readers next week.

The weather.—After a remarkably mild, and long continued autumnal season, we have just now a spell of really wintry weather. The ground is frozen, and covered with snow, and there is a prospect of our canals being at once obstructed by ice. We have some apprehensions for the steam boat which is to bring our winter supply of paper, and which we are informed is on the way.

☞ Br. Springer will please receive our apology that we did not publish his resolutions, read before the General Conference, as requested last week. We forgot to state in our last paper, that we had not the resolution at hand, that we had not preserved either the Cincinnati Commercial, or the Herald, and that in our own paper at the time, there was but a condensed statement given respecting the resolutions.

Postage on the Register.—The postage on this pamphlet any distance, is 2½ cents. Individuals at remote points having no other means of obtaining parcels but by mail, may be deterred from ordering them, on account of this expence. We have therefore concluded to divide this expense with those who have postage to pay upon pamphlets, and who will send us the pay with the order. For example, Br. B. C. Johnson, of Illinois, has sent us $2 which pays for four dozen copies. But we have sent him five dozen for this amount. Br. Wm. Tipton, of Maumee Mission, has paid us $1, for two dozen copies, but we have sent him 30 copies for this sum. We will deal with any other brethren who may see proper to order copies, at the same rate.

Dear Sir.—When an Editor lays the blame of Typographical errors to unintelligible Manuscript would it not be doing the writer Justice to acknowledge that the word selected by the Editor, destroyed the sense of the sentence?

Yours M. Jewett.

[Certainly so, sometimes. We acknowledge the corn. Beg pardon. Ed.]

The Senate Chamber.—Our friend of the Western Recorder, Putnam, speaks of Stacy's Saloon as being what is called in Zanesville, the "Senate Chamber." If he has read the history of Ohio carefully, he must know that Zanesville was for two years the state capital; and the building now occupied as a court house was erected as a state house, the large upper room being used by the Senate, and the small ones for committe rooms; the lower room was occupied by the Representatives.—When therefore the Senate chamber is alluded to, the room formerly occupied by the State Senate is meant. He was probably led astray by Mr. Keely's first lecture being at the Senate Chamber and his subsequent ones at Stacy's Saloon, the Supreme Court being in session during the week.—Zanes. Gaz.

Much obliged to our respected neighbor for the above historical information in reference to the old Senate Chamber. But we beg leave to say, if we were "led astray,' it was through the statement of the Gazette the week before, in reference to the lecture of Professor Keely, in the 'Senate Chamber, and our misapprehenson that the subsequent lectures were at the same place. On being favored with a ticket by Mr. K. on a subsequent evening, we sought and found his lecture room, supposing from the statement of the Gazette, that it was known as the 'Senate Chamber.' So much, for our having resided so short a time in our present locality. 'Stacy's Saloon'—then we stand corrected. We knew indeed, that Zanesville was a former capital of the State, but were not aware that the very Senate Chamber and Representatives Hall, once occupied by the Legislature were yet in existence, until so informed by our neighbor. We are such an antiquarian, we shall not be satisfied now with the 'Saloon,' but must have the pleasure soon as may be, to visit the real Senate 'Chamber.'

NARRATIVE.

TRUTH STRANGER THAN FICTION.

At Gibiralter, not many years ago, there occurred one of those extraordinary cases which show us how ineffectually the romancist, even when his immagination is strained to the uttermost, can portray the extremes of passion of which human nature is susceptible. A communication, bearing date Febrary the 20th, from the rock-built fortresses which England keeps as a key to the Mediterranean, relates the following particulars.

A respectable merchant, named James Baxwell born at London, had removed in early life to Gibiralter, induced partly by the circumstance of his being of the same religious persuasion to which the people of his adopted country belonged. For many years he occupied a small dwelling near the base of Mount St. Michael, so renowned for its caves and chrystalizations. He carried on a successful traffic in all the articles of British manufacture introduced into Spain. He acquired, in truth, a very considerable fortune in this way. All the country knew that he had a large amount of treasure lying by him not to speak of the capital belonging to him, which was embarked in commerce. His name was one of credit in the principal houses of exchange in Europe.

James Baxwell had a daughter, an only daughter, aged seventeen, and of remarkable beauty. Her countenance and figure combined in a most agreeable manner the peculiar charms of the English woman with the soft and languishing characteristics of the Spaniard. Young as she was, she had been for some two or three years an object of devoted admiration to all the youths around Gibiralter.—At church they devoured her with their eyes; and many, many a one thought to himself that, happy above all men would be he who could win the smiles of Elezia Baxwell. But Elezia bestowed her smiles upon no one. She seemed to those whose involuntary sighs she excited, to carry maidenly modesty to freezing coldness. At mass, her eyes were ever bent upon her book, regardless of all the glances cast upon her by others.

Such was the case till shortly before the events to be narrated. At length, however, Elezia, did see one who awakened in herself some of the emotions which she had caused in others.—At mass, one day, she observed the eyes of a young stranger fixed upon her with an expression of admiration and respect. To her he seemed a being superior to all the young men she had ever yet beheld. From that moment, her calm and self-possessed demeanor left her forever.—Abroad and at home, she was restless and uneasy. But, ere long, the stranger found an opportunity of being introduced to her, and mutual avowals of love followed at no great distance of time.

Assured of the affections of Elezia, the young stranger then presented himself to Mr. Baxwell. "I am named William Katt," said he to the merchant; "I am, like yourself, an Englishman; I am of respectable family and character, young, and wealthy. Give me your daughter—we love one another."

"Never!" said James Baxwell, to whom the position and circumstances of the young man were not unknown: such a union could not be happy, nor will I ever give my consent to it. Elezia shall never be yours!" The daughter, informed of this declaration, threw herself at the feet of her father, and endeavored to move him from his purpose. Her lover did the same. But the father remained obstinate, and a violent scene took place between Elezia and her parent. The blood of the fiery south coursed in the daughters veins, and she declared that she would marry the object of her choice, despite of all opposition. James Baxwell, on the other hand, declared that he would sooner kill her with his own hands, than see her carry such a resolution into effect. As to William Katt, who stood by at this scene, he kept silence. What thoughts were revolving in his mind, it would be difficult to say.

Two days afterwards an alarming noise was heard by the neighbors to issue from a cave immediately adjoining the merchant's house, and used by him for some domestic purposes. The noise consisted at first of loud cries, which gradually became fainter, and at length died altogether away. The auditors looked at each other with amazement, and many were the conjectures as to the cause of the sounds heard. A solution was not long in suggesting itself. Elezia had disappeared; she was no longer to be seen about her father's house. After many low murmurs had circulated, the father was interrogated respecting his daughter. He said that she was missing; certainly; but whither she had gone, he knew not. He had nothing whatever to do, he said, with her disappearance.

This explanation was not satisfactory. The whisper went abroad that James Baxwell had assassinated his daughter, to prevent her marriage with William Katt, and ultimately this conjecture, was so forcibly pressed on the attention of the pubic authorities, that they were compelled to arrest James Baxwell, and inquire into the matter. The dwelling of the merchant was examined, but nothing criminatory was found. "The cave! the cave is the place!" cried some of the crowd. The magistrates then descended into the cave, and there, on lifting some loose stones, they found a portion of Elezia's dress, sprinkled all over with blood. They also discovered a small quantity of hair, clotted with gore, and that hair was recognized by many as having been taken from the head of Elezia.

Baxwell protested his innocence. But the proof seemed strong against him, and he was regularly brought to trial. The result was, his conviction for the murder of his daughter, and his condemnation to death.

On receiving sentence, the unhappy merchant trembled to excess, and afterwards seemed utterly overpowered by the dreadful nature of his situation. He continued in a state almost of total insensibility during the interval between his trial and the day appointed for his execution. On the morning of the latter day, the jailer came to announce to him, for the final time, that the moment of fate was at hand. The merchant was seized again with a fearful trembling, and he cried, what he had reiterated to all who saw him in his confinement. "Before my Maker, I swear that I am guiltless of my child's death!"

They led him out to the scaffold. There he found, among others, William Katt, who, it should have been said, was the most important witness against him at his trial, having repeated to the court the threat of assassination which had been uttered by James Baxwell in his presence against Elezia. No sooner did the doomed merchant behold Katt, than he exclaimed, at the very foot of the scaffold, "My fond, in one minute I shall be in eternity. I wish to die in peace with all men. Give me your hand—I pardon you freely for the injury your evidence has done to me." Baxwell said this with some composure, but the effect of his words upon Katt were very striking. He became pale as death, and could not conceal the depth of his agitation.

Baxwell mounted the steps of the gallows slowly and gave himself up to the hands of the executioner, to undergo death by the rope. According to the ancient custom of Gibiralter, the executioner commenced his last duties by crying in a loud voice, "Justice is doing! Justice is done!" He then placed the black bonnet on the head of the condemned merchant, and pulled it down in front so as to cover the eyes. He had just done this, when he was stopped in his proceedings by a loud cry from the side of the scaffold—"It is I who am guilty!—I alone!"

This cry came from William Katt. The magistrates in attendance instantly called him forward and demanded an explanation. The young man avowed that he had carried off Elezia, with her consent, to be his wife, and that she was now residing not far off in concealement. But to her he did not communicate other measures which he had taken, chiefly to revenge himself for the scorn of her father. He had contrived to cut off a portion of her hair while she slept. He had clotted it with the blood of a lamb, and had also sprinkled in the same way a part of Elezia's dress which she had purloined.—These articles he had placed in the cave, and there, also, had he omitted personally those cries, which had borne so heavily against the merchant. The generous pardon which the merchant had bestowed on him at the scaffold, had awakened (the young man said) instantaneous remorse in his breast, and compelled him to avow the truth.

This confession was partly made at the scaffold, and partly afterwards. As soon as Katt had spoken out decisively, the executitioner had turned to James Baxwell to take from him the insignia of death. The merchant, almost unobserved, had sunk down into a sitting posture. The black bonnet was drawn by the executioner from off his eyes and head. It was found that he was a corpse! No exertions had the slightest effect in awakening in him the spark of life. The physicians, saying all they could on such a subject, declared that he had died from the effects of strong imagination.

William Katt was conducted to prison and the clamors of the populace, there to await judgment for his misdeeds.

Reading too Fast—Anecdote of an African Preacher.

There lived in the immediate vicinity a respectable man who had become interested on the subject of religion, and who had begun with some earnestness to search the Scriptures. He had read a few chapters, when he became greatly perplexed with some of those passages which an inspired apostle has "declare had to be understood." In this state of mind he repaired to our minister for instruction and help, and found him at noon, on a sultry day in summer, laboriously engaged in hoeing corn. As the man approached, the preacher, with patriarchal simplicity, leaned upon the handle of his hoe, and listened to his story. "Uncle Jack," said he, "I have discovered lately that I am a great sinner and I commenced reading the Bible that I might learn what I must do to be saved. But I have met with a passage here," holding up his Bible, "which I know not what to do with. It is this: 'God will have mercy on whom he will have mercy, and on whom he will, he hardeneth.' What does this mean.?"

A short pause intervened and the old African replied as follows:

"Master; if I have been correctly informed; it has not been more than a day or two since you commenced reading the Bible, and if I remember rightly, that passage you have mentioned is away yonder in Romans. Long before you get to that—at the very beginning of the Gospel, it is said, 'Repent, for the kingdom of heaven is at hand.' Now, have you done with that? The truth is, you read entirely too fast. You must begin again and take things as God has been pleased to make them. When you have done all you are told to do in Mathew, come, and we will talk about Romans."

Having thus answered, the preacher resumed his work, and left the man to his own reflections. Who does not admire the simplicity and good sense characterized in this reply? Could the most learned polemic more effectually have met and disposed of a difficulty. The gentleman particularly interested in this incident, gave me an account of it with his own lips. He still lives and will in all probability see this statement of it

Most readily will he testify to its strict accuracy; and most joyfully will he now say, as he said to me then, 'I convinced me most fully of the mistake into which I had fallen. I took the old man's advice! I saw its propriety and wisdom, and hope to bless God forever for sending me to him.—Gospel Herald.

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

From the Pittsburgh Gazette.

"COTTON POWDER," OR "GUN COTTON."

THE SECRET DISCLOSED.

A few days since we published an account of a wonderful discovery in Europe, by which Cotton could be readily and easily rendered more explosive than Gunpowder. The late arrival discloses the manner of its preparation, which is exceedingly simple, and can be tested by any one. Should the properties ascribed to it be verified on experiment, we may expect "Gun Cotton" to take the place at once of Gunpowder. The London correspondent of the New York Courier, makes the following revelations.

I enclose some newspaper paragraphs relative to the discovery made in Germany, of the power of converting cotton-wool into Gunpowder.—Should it be found, practically, to effect the results which its advocates assure us it will achieve, a new demand will spring up for our great Southern staple; and as every inhabitant of the United States is more or less directly or indirectly interested in this matter, I venture to offer a few remarks on the subject.

There are claimants for the honor of having invented this "Gun-cotten," but it was introduced here, at the late meeting of the British Association, by Prof. Schoneberg.

An article which can be used instead of Gunpowder in fire-arms, and which is believed to possess even greater explosive or expansive power, is prepared by dipping clean raw cotton for half a minute into concentrated nitric acid, and the instantly rinsing it thoroughly in clean water.

Messrs. Morel, Chodsko and Otto, as shown is the extracts which I enclose, each claim to be the inventor of this wonder that wetting the cotton does not interfere with its ignition; a most important point, the value of which is fully appreciated by the other "Doctors."

The first impression on the mind is, that this new discovery is truly wonderful; but as soon as the light of science is brought to bear on the matter, the only surprise is, that we have not made the discovery long ago. Common gunpowder, for which this is intended to be a substitute, is composed of 75 parts of nitre, 15 of charcoal and 10 of sulphur readily ignites and fires the charcoal, generating sofficient heat to convert the solid nitre into a gas of many thousand times its bulk—thus creating the explosive force, which drives the bullet from the gun. The only use of the sulphur is to convey the flame with greater rapidity through the mass. It does not possess the slightest explosive power. I have made these preliminary observations, that the simplicitity of the new process may be more apparent.

"Common well cleaned cotton," in a chemical point of view, is neither more nor less then woody fibre, in an extremely minute state of subdivision; and this substance when dipped "for about half a minute in nitric acid." would be immediately converted into a species of charcoal. It is then to be "often immersed in water," this would withdraw the acid, leaving the charcoal strongly impregnated with the nitre. Here then is a genuine Gunpowder, possessing the first great requisite in the highest degree, namely, extreme comminution of the ingredients; the charcoal and the nitre being in much closer contact than they can ever be brought into by mechanical action, how ever excellent that power may be. The sulphur does not appear to be requisite, because the gunpowder cotton being very light and open in its texture, allows the flame to pass easily through it:—a desideratum which all gunpowder manufacturers have been attentive to, and to gain which the best English sporing powder is triturated in wooded barrels, to produce the convexity of shape which is known to facilitate the passage of the flames between the grains.

HOW TO MAKE THE GUN-COTTON.

Dr. Otto, Professor of Chemistry in Brunswick, has published the following statement in the Hanoverian Gazette:

Entirely independent of Schoenbein and Bœttger, but relying on an observation of Pelouze, contained in the one hundred and thirty-sixth page of the first volume of my Manual of Chemistry, I have succeeded in producing and exploding cotton, which after a series of experiments, seems quite suited to supply the place of gunpowder. In order to bring the results of important discoveries as speedily as possible to the highest stage of perfection, it seems to me necessary to lay them immediately before the public, in order that many persons may turn their attention to the subject. I scorn, therefore, to sell or take out a patent for my very interesting discovery, the consequences of which are not easy to be foreseen, and I now publish it for the general good of the public. In the preparation of the exploding cotton, common well cleaned cotton is dipped for about half a minute in highly concentrated nitric acid, (the acid which I use being made with the distillation of ten parts of dried saltpeter and six of oil of vitriol,) and then instantly placed in water, which must be often renewed, in order to free the cotton from the acid with which is impregnated. Care must then be taken that all the knotty particles of the cotton are properly disentangled, and it is thoroughly dried. After this the explosive preparation is ready for use. Its effects create astonishment in all who witness them, and the smallest portion explodes when struck on an anvil with a hammer, like fulminating powder. When kindled with a glowing body it takes fire just like gunpowdew, and when used in a gun its operation, though in a far greater proportion to its weight, is precisely the same as that of gunpowder. This gun-cotton is employed exacily in the same way as gunpowder. A piece of it is rammed down the barrel, then a bit of wadding, and, after that a ball; a copper cap ignites and explodes the cotton. Without a single exception, all who have witnessed my experiments have been most completely satisfied."

THE EXPLOSIVE COTTON.

We have heretofore noticed that Professer Otto, of Brunswick, Germany, has discovered a means of making raw cotton as explosive as gunpowder. Some of the prepared cotton has been received in Washington, and the Union thus states the result of some experiments with it:

We saw experiments made upon the gun-coton, to-day, at the War Office. The President was present, with three of the members of his cabinet. He produced the packet, which Prof. Shonein had sent by Mr. Roberston, the American consul at Bremen, to be opened only in the presence of the President. The envelope being unsealed, a mass of cotton, of a deeper yellow tinge than common, presented itself,—and weighing about 60 or 70 grains. Col. Talcott, the head of the Ordinance Bureau, and Mr. Roberston proceeded to make some experiments. A small quanty of the prepared cotton was laid upon a white sheet of paper, When touched with another piece of paper, on fire, the cotton instantaneously exploded, producing a small volume of smoke, and leaving slight stains with very small particles on the paper. The best gunpowder was then exploded. It produced more smoke and left larger stains—thus showing that the combustion was more complete in the former than in the letter case. A small quantity of cotton was then thrown over some grains of gunpowder, but both exploded together. In this respect, as well as in the stains upon the paper, the tests failed. On applying the tongue these particles, which were left upon paper by the combustion of cotton alone, it presented the alkaline taste—showing that the fluid in which the cotton had been immersed not completely prepared—a portion of the potash from the nitre had been deposited in the vessel, and in dipping the cotton into it, it had imbibed some of the alkili, or some of the nitre itself.

Upon Col. Talcott's putting some of the cotton into a gun, with a cap on, an explosion took place with comparatively little noise. On loading the gun a second time with about ten grains of the cotton, a wad paper upon it, and a ball and another wad upon them, the gun was fired with a smart noise. It was discharged from the upper window of the War Office, about forty yards distant. The ball was found about eight yards from the basement of the Navy Office, from which it had recoiled, after making a smart indentation in the stone wall; and so great was the force with which it had gone and rebounded, that when it was picked up it was found considerably flattened and smashed.

It is evident, however, that the cotton was not prepared in the best manner. Mr. Robertson is about to have a certain quantity of the raw material (say twenty-five pounds) manufactured in the most scientific manner, and further experments are to be made at the arsenal with the delicate machinary which tests the force of gunpowder. We shall take care that these experiments shall be duly reported.

Dear Br. Bassett: It is now a little better than four weeks since I left home, for the labors of the District. My health improves, in the midst of my toils, and I hope to be able, still to travel on, and perform a reasonable share of work among my brethren. THE AUTUMN BLAST.

BY MARY A. HAYNES.

O'er the distant hills I hear a sigh;
A wild and hollow moan:
'Tis the Autumn blast loud pealing by,
With a sad and mournful tone;
And all around, o'er the barren ground,
The forest leaves are strown.

I see alas! in the once green vale,
O'er the rich and verdent lawn,
The waving grass is scar and pale!
And the bowers are sad and lone!
For the flow'rets sweet, that we loved to greet,
With the Oak's green garb, are gone.

He has doffed his mantle of lovely green,
For the rusty Autumn mail!
And the tattered rags of his robe are seen,
Strewn sadly over the vale!
While the hills prolong his requiem song,
With a wild and distant wail!

I feel his touch! 'tis a chilly one;
And his breath is cold and chill!
For the gentle breeze of the summer's gone;
And he doeth whate'er he will:
And he dealeth death, with his frosty breath,
As he stealeth o'er vale and hill.

The lady sighs! for the summer bright,
And her lovely hours have flown,
As she layeth aside her robe of white,
And putteth her mourning on!
And the songsters sweet, with pinions fleet,
To far distant lands have gone!

But yet 'tis a lovely season too!
Though the blast pealeth loudly by;
For nature is clad with a pensive hue,
With a deep and thoughtful dye;
Calling in the mind with accents kind,
To beauties that ne'er shall die!

Yet there cometh a tyrant surer still!
And his breath is chiller far!
I hear him, methinks, o'er the distant hill,
And see his rude form afar:
As o'er mountain and plain, with his frozen train,
He speedeth his icy car.

A cruel heart has that tyrant bold,
And a ruthless hand has he!
He cometh to bind, as he has of old,
What his piercing eye can see;
For they strive in vain, to elude his chain,
And he heedeth not their plea.

But alas! he's here with his haughty sway,
That rude, resistless one!
My muse affrighted far away,
From his cruel gaze hath flown;
And my beauteous theme! like a lovely dream!
Far! far! away has gone.

THE MORAL WARFARE.

BY J. G. WHITTIER.

When Freedom, on her natal day,
Within her war rock'd cradle lay,
An iron race around her stood,
Baptized her infant brow in blood,
And through the storm which round her swept,
Their constant ward and watching kept.

Then, where our quiet herds repose,
The roar of baleful battle rose,
And brethren of a common tongue
To moral strife as tigers sprung,
And every gift on freedom's shrine
Was man for beast, and blood for wine!

Our fathers to their graves have gone
Their strife is past—their triumph won;
But sterner trials wait the race
Which rises in their honor'd place—
A MORAL WARFARE with the crime
And folly of an evil time.

So let it be. In God's own might
We gird us for the coming fight,
And, strong in Him whose cause is ours
In conflict with unholy powers,
We grasp the weapons He has given,—
The Light and Truth, and Love of Heaven!

Humanity and Divinity of Jesus Christ.

NO IV.

MR EDITOR: Since the Lord Jesus is truly Divine, as well as human, there can be no doubt of his qualifications to accomplish the grand object for which he came into this, our world, viz: "To seek and to save that which was lost." Not to condemn the world, but that the world through him might be saved. "And as Moses lifted up the serpent in the wilderness, even so must the Son of man be lifted up: that whosoever believeth in him should not perish, but have eternal life." "That he by the grace of God should taste death for every man." The grand object of the mission of the Lord Jesus, was to atone for our transgressions, and make it possible for God to remain just and the justifier of him that believeth in Jesus. To accomplish this, he offered himself, "an offering and a sacrifice to God for a sweet-smelling savor," Eph. 5, 2. Again. "How much more shall the blood of Christ, who through the eternal spirit offered himself without spot to God, purge your consciences from dead works to serve the living God?" Heb, 9, 14. "Who gave himself for our sins." Gal. 1, 4. "And the life which I now live in the flesh, I live by the faith of the Son of God, who loved me, and gave himself for me." Gal. 2, 20. Who gave himself for us, that he might redeem us from all iniquity. Tit. 2, 14. "Who needeth not daily, as those high priests, to offer up sacrifice, first for his own sins, and then for the people's: for this he did once, when he offered up himself." Heb. 7, 27. "For when we were without strength in due time Christ died for the ungodly." Rom. 5, 6. "Being justified freely by his grace, through the redemption that is in Christ Jesus, whom God hath set forth to be a propitiation through faith in his blood, to declare his righteousness for the remission of sins that are past, through the forbearance of God: To declare, I say, at this time his righteousness; that he might be just, and the justifier of him that believeth in Jesus." Rom. 3, 24, 25, 26. And, "ye are not your own, for ye are bought with a price." Cor. 6, 19, 20. Christ has redeemed us from the curse of the law, being made a curse for us, for it is written cursed is every one that hangeth on a tree." Gal. 3, 13. Nothing, connected with the system of the salvation of man, is more clear to my mind, than that Jesus Christ offered himself to God, as a sacrifice for our sins; and that his sufferings and death are really, vicarious. A certain gentleman in one of his letters to his friend, after admitting the force of bible truth, that the sufferings and death of the Lord Jesus, were a ransom, or price paid; asks the important question, "who got the price?" He answers, "the Devil." This, I do not believe; for the scriptures unequivocally assert, that he, "through the eternal spirit, offered himself without spot to God," and, "an offering and a sacrifice to God." The devil never had any legal claims upon men, or right of property in them—he is now, and ever has been, a usurper. All that he obtained of the offering up of Christ was, it bruised his head—destroyed, to a great extent, his power over his captives But did the Divine nature of the Lord Jesus, suffer and die in accomplishing the redemption of sinners? I answer not at all. I am aware that our opponents have supposed that we would have to admit this, from the declarations in our second "Article of religion," as contained in our book of discipline; to wit: "So that two whole, perfect natures, that is to say, the Godhead and manhood, were joined together in one person, never to be divided, whereof is one Christ, very God and very man, who truly suffered, was crucified, dead and buried to reconcile his father to us, and to be a sacrifice, not only for original guilt, but also for actual sins of men." Though the phraseology of the foregoing might at first view, seem to favor the opinion of our opponents yet, we here only intend to be understood, that the humanity suffered, died, &c, the same as the apostle Paul meant, when he said to the elders of the church at Ephesus: "Take heed to yourselves, and to all the flock over which the Holy Ghost hath made you overseers to feed the church of God, which he hath purchased with his own blood," Acts, 20, 28. No man of common understanding, believes that God, who is a spirit, has flesh and blood—there can be no blood to shed where there is no flesh. Jesus says, "a spirit has not flesh and bones as ye see me have." Luke 24, 39. If God is a spirit, and a spirit has not flesh, and there can be no blood to shed where there is no flesh, then it will follow, that God has no blood to shed; consequently, the apostle only intended to be understood to mean, the blood of the man Christ Jesus; and which, is here called the blood of God, in consequence of the Deity; dwelling in the manhood of Christ. So with our said article; though we may appear to say that the whole of the Lord Jesus "suffered—was crucified, dead and buried." We only mean that the manhood of Christ suffered—that only his body died and was buried, &c. Still, it might be urged, we are in difficulty, because we have said, "the Godhead and manhood were joined together in one person, never to be divided." But, I think not, if it has been shown that the Saviour had a human soul, and I think it has been; and if so, there will be no difficulty in the matter; for the soul of the Lord Jesus, and his Divine nature were not, from necessity, separated by the death of his body. The Saviour's language to the penitent thief on the cross, very much favors this view of the subject. "To day shalt thou be with me in paradise." Luke 23, 43. And, also, the following, bears testimony to the same. "For thou wilt not leave my soul in Hades, neither wilt thou suffer thy Holy One to see corruption." Wes. Trans. Acts, 2, 27. Mr. Wesley says in his notes,—"Hades. The invisible world." We are not, then, involved in any difficulty by the expression, "never to be divided." We believe the soul of Jesus Christ and his Divinity, were not separated when his body expired on the cross. And further, in answer to the question, "did the Divine nature of the Lord Jesus, suffer and die." I say, this is impossible; for even the bodies of glorified saints are by no means, subject to dissolution any more after the resurrection. Jesus said to the Sadducees, "But they which shall be accounted worthy to obtain that world, and the resurrection from the dead, neither marry nor are given in marriage: Neither can they die any more; for they are equal to the angels:" Suffering and death necessarily imply imperfection in some degree; though it does not always include the idea of guilt. An absolutely perfect being, of course, is not subject to any derangement; therefore if pain is a consequence of a derangement of parts, or a removal from their proper or original position, and God is absolutely, and infinitely perfect, he cannot be a subject of pain or death. Hence the Divinity of the Lord Jesus, neither suffered nor died. It may be enquired, of what real utility then, was it, that the Divine nature was associated with the man Christ Jesus? I answer much, every way; for all created beings owe, for themselves, uninterrupted obedience to the laws of their creator, no difference of how high an order of intellect they may be; and the divine law must, of necessity, require the full employment of all their powers, let them be as extensive as they may; and since no creature can perform more than is required by the law, no created being can perform duty for another, or do any act which is meritorious before God, so as to purchase favor for a delinquent then, if Jesus Christ were only a man, he could not, by any acts or sufferings, "obtain eternal redemption for us." Again. Though we have no express declaration of the scriptures upon the subject, yet, reason dictates, that no mere man, unsustained by the indwelling Deity, could have possibly endured the anguish which the Lord Jesus underwent. The original, and all the actual sins of the whole human family, were, by him, borne upon the rugged cross. I do not say, to the same amount that all the race of man would, to all eternity, have endured in the torments of the damned; a sufficient amount however, to atone for all men, was by our Redeemer endured. I entertain no doubts, that the dignity of the Savior in consequence of the union of the Divine, with the human nature, had much to do, in accomplishing the grand atonement; which dignity, gave an unspeakable efficacy to his sorrows and death. I then say, again, reason dictates, that no mere man, unsustained by the indwelling Deity, would have possibly endured the anguish which the Lord Jesus underwent; hence, it became necessary, that the work of man's redemption might be effected, that the Deity should dwell in, and effectually sustain the man Christ Jesus. For though the Divine nature of the Lord Jesus could not suffer, it could, and no doubt did, afford strength to the manhood of our Redeemer; for it will be recollected, that when the Divine nature, to some extent, withdrew its energy and complacency, from the manhood of the Lord Jesus, the manhood immediately became deeply sensible of the withdrawal, and cried with a loud voice, saying, "My God, my God; why hast thou forsaken me!" I do not say, neither do I believe that the Divinity entirely forsook the humanity, for since it was the Divinity which imparted dignity and virtue to the blood of the cross, if it had, at any period, forsaken the manhood entirely, during that period, the sufferings of Christ must have been inefficacious, consequently, unnecessary. The Progress of the arts and Sciences.

MR. EDITOR: I noticed an article in your last paper, by Dr. A. W. Knight under the caption of "THE RULING PASSION," in which the writer offered a few thoughts on the advancement of the Arts and Sciences; the special progress of Medical Science—its importance and merits; and the propriety of its legal protection. In some of his views I think Dr. is mistaken, if not entirely behind the times, although he seems to be aware of the present rapid advancement of the arts and sciences on which he, in his way, so warmly expatiates.

That the sciences are progressive, and with the arts, are calculated to add much to the physical and moral enjoyments of mankind is perhaps most clearly evinced in this our age of improvement; although it is evident that the ancients in some departments were before us. It is with pleasing contemplation, that we now view the remaining traces and evidences of their literature and art. The poems of the Iliad, Odyssey and Ænied even now challenge comparison, nor can the imagination now even present a picture of the long regretted Epic Cycle of Greece. We have astonishing accounts of the Libraries, Museums, and other evidences of learning, embracing, collections of valuable curiosities brought to Rome from Greece, Africa and Sicila; from Syracuse by Marcellus; from Epirus by L. Æmilus Paulus; from Macedon and Lacedamon by Flaminius; from Carthage by Scipio Africanus; and in the same year from Corinth by Mummius. The admirable remains of architecture, sculpture, and painting, are still the wonders of the world. The ruins of Alexandria, Palmyra, Athens, and Rome evince astonishing skill in architecture; and the Venus de Medicis at Florence, executed by Cleomenes; the Niobe of Praxiteteles, at Rome; the Hercules, Strangling Anteus, by Polycletus; the stature of Laocoon; the Apollo of the Belvidere, and the dying gladiator, as well as the paintings—those found in the ruins of Herculaneum for instance, embracing the pictures of Chiron and Achilles; that of Theseus vanquishing the Minstaur; those of the Deities, Pan, and Olympe, (which must have been executed in the decline of the arts) all manifestly prove that the arts as well as the sciences were brought to great perfection among the ancients. The very names of Lycius, Isæus, Isocrates, Æochynes, Demosthenes, Cicero, Lucretius, Brutus, Cassius, and Cato, among the orators; Homer, Virgil, Euripedes, Sophocles, Aristophanes and Eschylus, among the poets; Socrates, Timœus, Ocellus, Aristippius, Diogenes, Plato, Aristotle and Epicurus, among the philosophers, Thucydides, Xenophen, Facitus, and Marsyas, among the historians; Apelles, and Zeuxes, among the painters; and Praxiteles, Phidias, and Polycletes among the sculptors; all excite veneration and command the most profound respect.

Now it is known that there were not a happier people in their age than were the enlightened Grecians, and Romans, which their frequent and remarkable feasts, lycoums, gymnasiums and theatres well evince, and their society was perhaps as well refined, and their morals as well cultivated, as it was possible for any nation or people to effect without the advantages of christian revelation.

But we no sooner see the sciences decline in the invasion of the country by the barbarous nations from the "Northern hive," than the most beastly degradation and horrible cruelty enveloped every nation of Europe in the vortex of war. Nor could Christianity, which had already been introduced for more than four hundred years divert the impending fate of the literary world.

At length after a dreary night of a thousand years the sciences again began to revive, and with them our holy religion in the ever memorable Reformation in Germany. The mind of man rebounded from the gloomy prison in which it was so long confined, and was soon carried by science the twin-sister of true religion to contemplate once more the magnificent works of Jehovah, and to enjoy the bliss of christian society. But did the sciences all advance with the same rapidity? Alas they did not! Here then Mr. Editor, I must differ with my friend Dr. Knight, for he intimates that medicine has at least kept pace with the other sciences, and he seems to add, that our physical enjoyments have been much advanced by its perfection. Would to Heaven this were the case! But the Doctor well knows, if he is acquainted with the history of medicine, that the knowledge of the BOTANIC or philosopical system, which was instituted by the immortal HIPPOCRATES, (afterwards known for many centuries as the Galenic system,) was so far lost in the dark ages that its advocates, from the want of a knowledge of its principles, were overcome by the disciples of the haughty Paracelsus who gave origin to a new system of medicines in the latter part of the fifteenth century, which was called the chemical system, and which was established by the authority of the alchemists, and defended by all the obstinancy and fire of ambition, and interested policy. This new system of medicine comprised the use of Mercury, Antimony, Arsenic, and many other most deadly poisons, which soon became the articles that were most depended on by the practitioners in the cure of disease. This dangerous system, strange as it may seem, continued to advance in popularity until it became the ally system of practice, and it has been but little changed in character until the present day. It is now called the allopathic system of medicine.

Some may wonder whether the medical profession is not aware of the dangerous character of their remedies and the falacy of their system. To this I am bound to answer frankly that they are; and that in this enlightened age it could not be otherwise. The inquiry will then arise; why then do they sustain it—are not some of them honest men? In answer, here I am happy to state that they do not all sustain it. That thousands have abandoned it, and are now engaged in the glorious cause of Medical Reform. To show the correctness of this, I will here insert a few of the many concessions and declarations that their teachers, authors, and practitioners have made on the subject:—

"Physic has ever been pestered with hypothesis, the multitude and precariousness whereof have only served to render the art uncertain, fluctuating, fallacious, mysterious, and in a manner unintelligible.  Our misfortune proceeds from our having long since forsook our skilful guide, Hippocrates, and the ancient method of cure founded upon the knowledge of conjunct causes that plainly appear, insomuch that the art which is this day practiced, being invented by superficial reasoners, is rather the art of talking than of healing."—Sydenham.

"The uncertainty of Medicine, which is thus a theme for the philosopher and the humorist, is deeply felt by the practical physician in the daily exercise of his art."—D'Alambert.

"Dissections daily convince us of our ignorance of the seats of disease and cause us to blush at our prescriptions. "What mischiefs have we done under the belief of false facts, and false theories. We have assisted in multiplying diseases, we have done more—we have increased their mortality. "I will not pause to beg pardon of the faculty, for acknowledging in this public manner, the weakness of our profession. "I am pursuing truth, and am indifferent where I am led, if she is only my leader."—Rush.

"The whole nation is groaning under the present practice of the medical profession, which fosters disease more than cures it, and debases, or ruins our constitutions."—Morrison.

"Minerals exert a pernicious or baneful influence on the system; they seldom or never cure, but often destroy the patient. Their operation is altogether uncertain, depending entirely on the state of the stomach whether they will act at all, or prove injurious."—Hamilton.

Mercury, the lancet, and the knife, are now almost the only means made use of to cure disease, notwithstanding their dileterious effects are evidently fatal to multitudes."

"Not only a reformation in medicine is necessary, but a revolution."

"Oh that men would, stoop to learn, or at least cease to destroy."—Stokes.

"Both surgery and medicine can and will, in the present astonishing strides of human intellect, be forced to pass a rigid scrutiny, and undergo a radical improvement."—Smead.

"Because all systems which have hitherto been promulgated, have been false, and consequently transient, it by no means follows that there may not be found one which will stand a tower of strength, unharmed by the rude shock of opposition's bursting wave, through all succeeding time, and such a theory, it is conceived, may and will be formed of disease."—Whiting.

A volume of testimony like the above might be produced, but it is unneccessary to add more. It is this corrupt, dangerous, and exploded system that Dr. Knight holds up before community as meriting the confidence, patronage, and protection of our intelligent people! he appeals for legislative enactments. Is he not aware that in this he is too late? In the earlier ages of medical Reform these measures were carried through, and in many states laws designed to regulate medical practice were enacted: but the people have long since learned that no standard of qualification could be fixed by legislative enactments, and hence the laws were repealed. If I am not mistaken, ("Tell it not in Gath, publish it not in the streets of Askelon,) the last effort was made in our own enlightened Ohio. The committee appointed by the State Medical Society, to memorialize the Legislature on the subject, after their failure, submitted by their chairman a report, of which the following are extracts:—

"Members of the Legislature, individually and as a body, were very much indisposed to act upon this question favorably. "Indeed I regret to say that this indisposition on the part of the members of the Legislature to act on the subject, prevails to such an extent as to forbid the hope that the medical profession of Ohio will ever have any efficient legislation from them upon this question. "The members of the committe discovered with surprise and mortification that the belief prevailed to a great extent throughout the country that the medical profession asked this action of the legislature expressly for its own benefit, and as a boon exclusively for itself. "It is better, however, that we should, at this stage of professional existence in Ohio, individually cultivate our own minds, that each one of us should direct his attention to his professional improvement, and by the acquisition of knowledge, and by the cultivation of his mind to the highest degree, gain the ascendency over those who now attempt to defeat our objects in the Legislative Assembly. "Let us as the Legislature will do nothing for us—let us elevate the character of the medical profession in Ohio by hard study and laborious research—"Let us say make ourselves so scientific that he who runs can see that we are so. We will then have no need to ask for legislative aid."

Has Dr. Knight never seen this document? or how is it that he is still so fondly clinging to this visionary project? He must know that in this enlightened age of moral and political liberty, no people will be forced by legislative enactments to attain any particular system or dogma. All professional men in our country must therefore expect to sustain themselves only by scientific requirements and honest industry.

THOUGHTS ON MEDICINE.

Callicrate is a medical system monger. He likes an idea, and quaches himself to it; broods over it, fecundates it, fashions and stretches it beyond all measure, and it sometimes becomes a fixed idea, a monomania.

Let him once bestride the back of his systematic chimera, and he is ready to fight to the last extremity. Experience, established facts, phenomena, observation, inductions, principles, however opposed to his system, do not trouble him in the least; so he can make money, he applies his magnifying—glass of malevolent criticism to them, and from that moment sees what he wants to see, and as he wishes to see it. "There is nothing," he says, with energy, "Better demonstrated or more certain; a man must be very ignorant, or very dishonest, not to see as I do;" this is the pathognomonic symptom of his madness. After this, every proof suits him, every argument is good. How little you press him, Callicrates will maintain that white is not white, that a stick has not two ends. He reminds one of that bold and subtile dialectician who had an answer for every thing. Some one said, "the north wind is blowing;" "by no means," he replied; "it is the south wind—but it is going home." If you are irritated against a criticism; it annoys, it wounds you.—Weigh it well, however; if it is by a fool, forget it; if it is by an envious man, forgive it; if it is by a severe friend, make use of it. In any case, remember that it requires as much talent to profit by a good critique, as to be able to do without it.

Emancipation in the West Indies.

NO. III.

In the year 1841, a committee of the Agricultural and Immigration Society of Trinidad was appointed,—"to enquire and report respecting the state of the agricultural interest of the colony since the abolition of apprenticeship in Aug., 1838,—their present condition, and future prospects, and to recommend such measures as they may think conducive to the general prosperity." The result of their inquiry was the book to which I referred in my first article, written by the Hon. Wm. H. Burhlny, Chairman of that Society. In this book is embodied the evidence taken by the committee, and perhaps I cannot do better than to transcribe some of the evidence bearing on the subject before us. One of the witnesses was the Rev. Mr. Muhlhauser, a clergyman of the Church of England, stationed at San Terhando. In answer to the question—"What is your opinion of the general state of the laboring classes since the abolition of apprenticeship?"—he states as follows: "I think their state is generally improving, both physically and morally, but unfortunately they receive too much rum from the planters, which frequently renders them unable to attend divine service, and indifferent to improving their minds." Subsequently he states—"with respect to marriage their improvement has been very great,—in 1836, I united only one couple, in 1837, three, in 1838, seven; in 1839, fifteen, and in 1840, twenty-nine."

Q. "Do you think they are generally impressed with a due sense of the duties and obligations of a marriage state." A. "I think so, for, with one exception, all are now living happily together."

Q. "Do you think the industry of the laborers has generally improved since emancipation?" A. "I can only speak as to the estates which fall under my ministry, and I think they are improving in industry, although there is certainly a great opening for farther improvement in this respect."

Q. "Can you point out to the commitee any measure which will tend in your estimation to their further improvement?" A. "I think it would be very advantageous, if the practice of paying the people on Sunday, which I know exists in many cases, were entirely done away with, as it frequently interferes with their attendance on divine service."

Q. "Are you aware of any other improvement by the planters, which you can suggest?" A. "I recollect only one, that of discontinuing to cart produce on Sunday, but which I am ready to admit, is much less frequent than it was formerly."

Q. "In general, what are the circumstances and condition of the laboring class, which composes your flock; are any of them in want or in a state of destitution?" A. "Their circumstances are very comfortable, and I know that many of them are saving money."

Another witness was Rev. J. H. Hamilton, also of the Church of England. Q. "What do you find to be the state of morality amongst the laboring classes?" A. "Generally speaking, their moral and religious state is at a very low ebb indeed, but a gradual improvement is taking place."

Q. "In what particular points do you find this improvement?" A. In a more steady attendance at divine service, and less desecrations of the Sabbath in dancing, and other riotious amusements, increasing marriages, and the abandonment of many superstitions, and improper customs."

Q. "Do you think that they have lately improved in industry, frugality, and sobriety?" A. Considering their recent emancipation, and the benighted state in which it found them, added to the very high rate of wages they receive, I think there is more industry among them than we could reasonably have anticipated. With regard to their sobriety, the large quantity of rum gratuitously distributed on the estates, presents a temptation to inebriety which they cannot resist; and I certainly cannot say that they are frugal, being very extravagant in their dress, and squandering much money in amusements and luxuries."

Subsequently Mr. Hamilton states in, answer to questions put to him, that he has frequently inculcated upon his parishioners, the propriety of giving up the demoralizing practice of giving rum to the laborers,—that the planters invariably admitted the practice to be demoralizing, and pernicious, but that they complained of the want of unanimity in endeavoring to put it down. If one should give up the practice, the laborers would leave him and go to others. Again, on being asked whether he knew of any other proceedings of the planters unfavorable to the moral improvement of the laborers, he answers,—"I have reason to believe that the payment of the wages on Sunday continues in some instances."

The Right Rev. Dr. Smith, Roman Catholic clergyman, Bishop of Agna, and Coadjutor of the Diocese of the British and Danish Islands, was also examined by the committee. The following are a few of the questions put to him, with the answers:

Q. "Be so good as to state the principal effect which emancipation appears to have had upon the moral conduct and deportment of the peasantry in the British Island?" A. "In what I am about to state, and in any answer I may give to farther questions, I beg to be understood as speaking only of the members of my own church.—With respect to them, I am of opinion that emancipation has had the most favorable effects upon their general conduct and behaviour, particularly in a religious point of view; although I am sorry to say, that in some parts of Trinidad there are great deductions to be made from this favorable statement."

Q. "Then you do not find the improvement to be equally great in all the colonies under your jurisdiction?" A. "Not in the same proportion. In Grenada the laboring classes are unsettled and unsteady, arising, I believe, from the temptation of high wages in this island. Whilst in St. Louis, I think their improvement in industry and general moral conduct, has been the greatest."

Q. "In what particular points did you observe this improvement?" A. "In the first place they have exhibited the greatest anxiety to have resident clergyman and schools establish among them, for which purpose the sum of £17,000 has been subscribed by the laboring population alone not exceeding 12,000 in number, and during six weeks that I have passed in that island, visiting nearly every estate, I did not hear a single serious complaint from any one planter against the laborers."

In answer to other questions, he states that in St. Lucia he was credibly informed that the laborers worked quite as well as any time during slavery and apprenticeship—that there were no complaints of their vagrancy—of their quitting their estate after a short service to work upon another without apparent cause, and that there were no complaints of their drinking spiritious liquors to excess.

The above evidence clearly shows that as early as 1841, only three years after the extinction of the apprenticeship system, there was a manifest moral improvement among the people. It farther shows that the hindrances to improvement—such as the distribution of rum, the payment of wages on the Sabbath, &c., are chargable on the planters more than on the people themselves. But the improvement is much more visible now, as I am informed by those who have been on the island ever since that time. They attend much better at church and at schools, and have in a great measure ceased to remove from one state to another; and I was aware of no instance of wages being paid, for produce carted on the Sabbath in the part of Trinidad where I resided, although it was in the principal sugar region of the island. A great majority of the people of the island are under the influence of the churches to which the clergymen above mentioned belong—namely the Roman Catholic and Episcopal.

These may both be considered established churches, their clergy being paid out of the public funds. No dissenting clergymen was examined by the committee, but I make bold to assert and I think the people of the United States will not doubt the truth of the assertion, that the people under the influence of Dissention are by no means behind those of the established churches in moral and religious improvement. The Dissenters of the island are Presbyterians, Wesleyans, and Baptists, and although separately they are inferior or in number to either of the established churches, I am informed that together, they are equal to the Episcopalians.

In the sphere of my own labors in the island I am certain that the work of improvement, both intellectual and moral is going on. Numbers even of persons well advanced in life have learned, and are learning to read, and what is more they are learning to read the Bible. In many a hut now the Bible is read, and from many a hut I have reason to believe prayer ascends, where nothing of the kind would have been done, had it not been for emancipation. My brother missionary and colleague, Rev. Joseph Banks, who was three years in the island, speaks of the improvement of the people both intellectually and morally, as having been very striking during his stay.

But it ought to be decisive on this point that a door has been opened to religious and moral influences. Religious and moral teachers have free access to the people, which slavery always forbids. Even were no improvement yet visible, there would be hope of it, for the means and influences are at work from which we always expect such an effect to flow.

MORE GOOD NEWS.

A short time since Mr. Fowler's address on the evils arising from the use of tobacco was presented to me to peruse, which I did attentively, and the result was, that ere I had read it half through, I found I must forergo the gratification, (which I had indulged in for more than thirty years,) if I intended to secure my peace of mind. I hesitated not a moment, but immediately threw out my quid, and burst the cords that had so long held me in "durance vile," and I can assure you it has much increased my happiness. I would, therefore, earnestly recommend the perusual of this valuable work to my fellow citizens, in hope that its irresistible reasonings may have the same effect, universally, as it has on me.

A consideration of the many evils arising from the use of this noxious weed, has promoted the following lines. J. P. C.

What makes my teeth from day to day,
Exhibit symptoms of decay,
With pain and anguish rot away?
Tobacco!

What makes my breath so fœtid foul?
What makes the ladies on me scowl,
And shun me as they would an owl?
Tobacco!

What makes me, when I'm called to speak,
Fly quick for fear my mouth will leak,
The spit-box or the door to seek?
Tobacco!

What is the cause of war and strife,
Between the good man and his wife,
Embittering every hour of life?
Tobacco!

What makes an appetite for rum,
And sends the drunkard staggering home,
And prematurely seals his doom?
Tobacco!

These are the facts, then let us shun
That weed that many has undone,
And our just vengeance wreak upon Tobacco!

FIRE.

As this is the season when winter fires are being provided for, it may not be amiss to suggest to our fellow citizens the necessity of examining their flues carefully before commencing to use fires for the winter. It is well known that the acid produced from burning coal has a tendency to destroy the consistency of mortar, which then washes out and the bricks are left with cracks between them, through which the fire readily finds its way to adjoining combustibles. Our flues at best are often built too thin, and in this way instances of fire frequently occur. In conversation a few days since with a bricklayer he spoke of having recently found several flues in very bad repair, some of which the owners of the property knew nothing of, and yet the smoke was finding its way through the joints. The gentleman owning the property had very wisely employed a workman to institute a rigid search into the state of repair of their chimneys and flues; a measure that should not be neglected.—Danger frequently exists from openings into flues being made for stove pipes, and afterwards closed insufficiently; even sometimes by pasting paper over them. Such openings should be carefully closed with bricks and mortar, or a covering of tin or sheet iron, even though the flue be not used, if it be contiguous to others down which the fire may fall. It was in this way the fire originated by which Mr. PRATT's property was destroyed a few years ago, at the corner of Front and Main; and we saw a very pretty beginning for a fire not a year ago, that was produced by closing up a stove pipe opening with a bundle of rags! while a mass of combustible goods were piled below it, though another pipe entered the flue in a story above. A passer by discovered the fire in time to save the property.

A fruitful source of fires is found in deposites of ashes, especially as some suppose there can be no danger from the ashes of coal; but they are mistaken. The soot or lamp black of coal, as taken from stoves and such places will burn for hours without exciting attention, unless by the smell. We saw a few years ago a vessel of soot that had been set in a stable filled with combustibles and hours afterwards was found in passing by to be a mass of fire. The carelessness of some persons in regard to fire is intolerable. We saw last week a stove pipe not much higher than a man's head, protruded only a few inches through the side of a shed, on the roof of which, not a foot from the end of the pipe, was a large crate of straw; and that in a densely built part of the town. When pointed out it was promptly removed. Such carelessness might be more readily excused if the culpable parties were the only sufferers; but the whole town is interested, and after the fires of the last two years we might reasonably suppose that care would be taken.—Zanes. Gaz.

SNORING.—There is no philosophy in snoring—none that we can see of—and yet you must make the music go all night.—Can't help it! Would stop if you could!—We don't believe a word of it. How do you help it in the day time? We verily believe nature intended you for a hog; and made a mistake. For the life of us, we can't tell whether or not there is a grunter in our room when we awake—only the hog is more musical—that's the difference. But a hog does all his grunting in the day time, when he is awake; but the most of yours comes at night, when a poor fellow is tired and such sounds grate upon his ear. If you were not so snappish and growlish in the day time, we should have more charity for you at night We never knew a person of a good heart and kind disposition, to snore and keep another awake. The good angels that attend and watch the bed of such, would be frightened at the noise you make, and never come near the bed again. You will never cease to disturb your bed-fellows, while you are so morose and crabbed in the day time. The malignant feelings you cannot grunt out when you are awake, belch forth in torrents while you are asleep. Like a working barrel of beer, your body can't contain your bad feelings, and so at night, where they find a hole in your head, they squirt out to the provoking of all who sleep in the house.—Who could consent to become your wife.

NEVER TREAT RELIGION LIGHTLY.—Impress your mind with reverence for all that is sacred. Let no wantonness of youthful spirits, no compliance with the intemperate mirth of others, ever betray you into profane sallies. Besides the evil which is thereby incurred, nothing gives a more odious appearance of petulence and presumption to youth, than the affectation of treating Religion with levity. Instead of being an evidence of a superior understanding, it discovers a pert and shallow mind, which, vain of the first smatterings of knowledge, presumes to make light of what the rest of mankind revere. At the same time you are not to imagine that when exhorted to be religious, you are called upon to be more formal and solemn in your manners than others of the same years, or to erect yourselves into supercilious reprovers of those around. The spirit of true Religion breaths gentleness and affability. It is social, kind, cheerful—far removed from that gloom and illiberal superstition which clouds the brow, sharpens the temper, defects the spirit, and teaches men to fit themselves for another world, by neglecting the concerns of this. Let your Religion, on the contrary, connect preparation for Heaven with the honorable discharge of duties of active life. Of such religion, discover on every proper occasion, that you are not ashamed; but avoid making any unnecessary ostentation of it before the world.

Railroads are multiplying rapidly in Germany. By the end of October, 1847, there will be open to public use lines, extending, in the aggregate, to the length of 2,500 miles.

SKETCHES IN THE WESTERN WOODS.

NO. II.

A medley mixture
But out of which amusement may be drawn,
Yea, peradventure some instruction too.

Friday, September 25th, was fixed on to start, with my little family and "plunder," for my home in the woods with the intention of being at Br. Clinger's camp meeting on Saturday and Sabbath. But alas! Well has the poet said: "Here disappointment smiles at hopes career." For just at the very time appointed to start, who should pay me a visit but my old but not very agreeable, acquaintance Mr. Chill and Fever who has often given, not my hand only, but my whole frame such a hearty shake. Being desirous of getting rid of my disagreeable visiter, after a day or two, I sent for his inveterate enemy Dr. Calomel. Upon which the old gentlemen (if he deserves the title) withdraw for a short season. Taking advantage of his absence I yielded to the urgent solicitations of a good brother and started on Wednesday 30th, to Mt. Tabor (a few hours ride) where the Indiana Conference that day commenced its session.

Being not very well acquainted with all the modus operandi of splitting an annual conference and having sent word to the Wabash Conference that I wished my name entered on their list, I supposed that I would only be a looker on in the Indiana Conference. But the brethren decided that, as I had not crossed the dividing line and taken my abode in the bounds of Wabash District, they still had their fingers on me. I accordingly took my seat,—When lo! Here comes Br. Falkenburg from Wabash, and informed me that I was a member of that conference, and appointed to Wild Cat Mission. Wild Cat! Thought I,—Wish they had given it some other name. To think of encountering wild cats, is more than my nerves in their present week state will bear. But let me see. Yes I understand it now. What a wicked ferocous creature the cat is in its natural wild state. But when tamed and domesticated how mild, how gentle and affectionate. Even so man in his natural state. How malicious! How desperately wicked! But when tamed by the grace of God. How mild, gentle and loving. This then is my mission. To endeavor to be instrumental in taming the human wild cats. May God help me.

Having enjoyed the society of the brethren for several days, as well as the return of my old acquaintance aforesaid would admit of. I returned home and by the assistance before mentioned rid myself once more of my troublesome visitor and having packed up my "goods, chattles, and effects," and carefully stowed them together with my "tother half" and smiling boy, in the wagon —bade farewell to friends and (accompanied by my brother-in-law whom with his team and wagon I had employed) mounted my nag and started (driving before me our first rate old milch cow,) for the Miami Reserve. In an hour or two, reached Bloomington, the location of that good institution the Indiana University under the patronage and control of the State, and found the town swarming with the inhabitants of the surrounding country all on the tiptoe of expectation. In a few minutes here come Messrs. Howe and Mabies wagons, and carriages, bearing the accouterments belonging to their celebrated circus. Which was to be exhibited that day in Bloomington. For these benevolent gentlemen, with a self devotion rarely surpassed, have left the shores of the Atlantic accompanied by about thirty others of both sexes equally benevolent, and have traversed the western country on the praise worthy mission of showing how nearly human beings can arrive to the perfection of monkeys, for which (as the times are very hard) they only receive some hundreds of dollars a day.

Drove on through a country abounding in a "variety of pleasure, situate in hill and dale." Thought I presumed the faithful nags attached to the wagon would willingly have dispensed with some of the hills, and I would have been reconciled to deny myself the pleasure of driving a contrary cow through bushes nearly as thick as they could stand plentifully interwoven with green briars. Arrived about dark at the cabin of a brother Baptist who kindly gave us the shelter of his roof and the opportunity of cooking at his fire "free gratis."

Next morning (Thursday Oct. 8th,) started with the first beams of the sun, and in a mile or two, exchanged the green briar hills and deep ravines, for a rich level alluvial country, which continued till we reached the village of Martinsville, county, seat of Morgan Co. This villiage though small appears to have attained nearly its full growth, at least I could discover but few symptoms of a further growth.

Passing on we again traversed a country considerably rolling and sometimes even hilly though generally of a rich soil, and at noon halted on the green banks of Stotts' Creek. Fed and partook of some refreshments previously prepared. After resting a while—proceeded a few miles to Crooked Creek; upon the banks of which, on a high hill overlooking the road, resides sister Williams, relict of our lamented Br. John Williams, and mother of our respected and beloved Br. C. H. The family appears to be prospering in temporal matters under the prudent care of James (a younger brother of Charles.) Who although the prophetic spirit does noot seem to have fallen on him as on his father and brother is nevertheless worthy of such a father and brother.

This day, we passed some sad mementoes of the folly of our State consisting of a feeder dam and various half finished excavations, once intended to be the Central Canal, designed to intersect the Wabash and Erie canal at Ft. Wayne, and to terminate at Evansville on the Ohio river, but now deserted.

Having arrived within 15 miles of Indianapolis, the face of the country again changes to a level rich soil, producing abundance of all kinds of grain and vegetables suited to the climate, and not lacking in "the mellow apple and the juicy peach." But the inhabitants were suffering under the ravages of Bilious diseases.

About night fall, having procured feed, encamped by a bright fire, which we kindled by an ancient moss covered log, spread our tent, laid our bed upon the rustling leaves, and having partook of refreshment, and commended ourselves to God, lay down and slumbered till the crowing of the fowls from the adjacent barn yards admonished us of the approach of day.

Friday Oct. 9th. Rose and dispatched our morning repast, and after thanking God for his mercies, about the time "gray twilight ripened into day" were again on the road. After journeying a few hours—overtook a wagon, in which were 3 of our former neighbors, who had started to see the Reserve. Owing to my sickness they had given up all hopes of having our company, and had started the evening before we did. As soon as we came near enough to be recognized, they raised a shout which although somewhat wild proved the sincerity of their joy. With these very agreeable and accommodating companions we proceeped though the remainder of our journey. Pass'd through the beautiful and flourishing city of Indianopolis, capitol of the State, about 11 o'clock. This city is surrounded by as beautiful and fertile a section of country perhaps as the great west affords. But the inhabitants labor under disadvantage from the distance to market. But this will soon, to some degree at least, be obviated by the finishing of the Madison and Indianopolis rail road. Dined on the grassy banks of White river and proceeding some 12 or 13 miles farther, camped in sight of Eagle village on the Michigan road. One of our companions, a disciple or Campbellite brother, offered up our evening devotions under the thick shade of a spreading beach. About midnight the wind arose, dark portentious clouds overspread the sky, and it began to rain. We were therefore under the necessity of arising, and replacing our beds in the wagons. However the rain soon abated, and we sat by our glowing fire, under the thick boughs of the beach, till near daylight when we partook of our morning meal and after devotions, again sat out.

Saturday 10th. The country through which we pass'd this day was generally flat and clayey. The timber mostly beech—pass'd several places called towns, but which possessed little of the town excepting the name. In the afternoon we touched the southern extreme of the Reserve—which I confess is not likely to give a very flattering idea of this good country.

Having had the pleasure of driving over several sections of rail road (the rails of which however were placed the wrong way,) and through not over a good deal of mud turnpike, arrived at Michigan town, and put up till Monday morning. Br. Bassett if you and your readers can muster patience to read this long dry narrative, I will try to give give something more interesting in my next.

So good bye, S. W. Widney.

FOR MOTHERS.

Mrs Child, an authoress of this country, who has done a great deal to instill rules of conduct into the minds of young people, by means of a series of useful little works, gives the following valuable advices to mothers on the subject of teaching children politeness:—

"In politeness, as in many other things connected with the formation of character, people in general begin outside, when they should begin inside, instead of beginning with the heart, and trusting that to form the manners, they begin with the manners, and trust the heart to change influences. The golden rule contains the very life and soul of politeness. Chilhren may be taught to make a graceful courtesy, or a gentlemanly bow; but unless they have likewise been taught to abhor what is selfish, and always prefer another's comfort and pleasure to their own, their politeness will be entirely artificial, and used only when it is their interest to use it. On the other hand, a truly benevolent kind-hearted person will always be distinguished for what is called native politeness, though entirely ignorant of the conventional forms of society.

I by no means think graceful manners of small importance. They are the outward form of refinement in the mind, and good affections in the heart, and as such must be lovely. But when the form exists without the vital principle within, it is as cold and lifeless as flowers carved in marble.

Politeness, either of feeling or of manner, can never be taught by set maxims. Every-day influence unconsciously exerted, is all-important in forming the characters of children, and in nothing more important than in their manners, If you be habitually polite, your children will become so, by the mere force of imitation, without any specific directions on the subject. Your manners at home should always be such as you wish your family to have in company. Politeness will then be natural to them; they will possess it, without thinking about it. But when certain outward observances are urged in words, as important only because they make us pleasing, they assume an undue importance, and the unworthiness of the motive fosters selfishness. Besides, if our own manners are not habitually consistent with the rules we give, they will be of little avail; they will in probability be misunderstood, and will certainly be forgotten.

Foreigners charge the Americans with a want of courtesy to each other in their usual intercourse; and I believe there is some truth in the accusation. On all great occasions, however, they are ready, heart and hand, to assist each other: but how much more gracefully and happily the French manage in the ten thousand petty occurrences of life! And, after all, life is made up of small events. The golden chain of existence is composed of innumerable little links; and if we rudely break them, we injure its strength, as well as mar its beauty.

It is a graceful habit for children to say to each other, "Will you have the goodness?'—and 'I thank you.' I do not like to see prim, artificial children; there are few things I dislike so much as a miniature beau or belle. But the habit of good manners by no means implies affectation or restraint. It is quite as easy to say, 'Please give me a peice of pie,' as to say,'I want a piece of pie.'

The idea that constant politeness would render social life too stiff and restrained, spings from a false estimate of politeness. True politeness is perfect ease and freedom. It simply consists in treating others just as you love to be treated yourselves. A person who acts from this principle will always be said to have 'sweet pretty ways with her.' It is of some consequence that your daughter should know how to enter and leave a room gracefully; but it is of prodigiously more consequences that she should be in the habit of avoiding whatever is disgusting or offensive to others, and of always preferring their little pleasure to her own. If she have the last, a very little intercourse with the world will teach her the first.

I believe nothing tends to make people so awkward as too much anxiety to please others. Nature is graceful; and affectionate, with all her art, can never produce any thing half so pleasing.—The very perfection of elegance is to imitate nature as closely as possible; and how much better it is to have the reality than the imitation! I shall probably be reminded that the best and most unaffected people are often constrained and awkward in company to which they are unaccustomed. I answer, the reason is, they do not act themselves—they are afraid they shall not do right, and that very fear makes them do wrong. Anxiety about the opinion of others fetters the freedom of nature. At home, where they act from within themselves, they would appear a thousand times better. All would appear well, if they never tried to assume what they did not possess. Every body is respectable and pleasing so long as he is perfectly natural. I will make no exception—Nature is always graceful. The most secluded and the most ignorant have some charm about them, so long as they effect nothing—so long as they speak and act from the impulses of their own honest hearts, without any anxiety as to what others think of it.

Coarseness and vulgarity are the effects of education and habit; they cannot be charged upon nature. True politeness may be cherished in the hovel as well as in the palace; and the most tattered drapery cannot conceal its winning charms.

As far as is consistent with your situation and duties, early accustom your children to an intercourse with strangers. I have seen young persons who were respectful and polite at home, seized with a most painful and unbecoming bashfulness as soon as a guest entered. To avoid this evil, allow children to accompany you as often as possible, when you make calls and social visits. Occasional interviews with intelligent and cultivated individuals have a great influence on early character and manners, particularly if parents evidently place a high value upon acquaintances of that description. I have known the destiny of a whole family changed for the better, by the friendship of one of its members with a person of superior advantages and correct principles.

But it must be remembered that a call, or a social visit, may be made almost as injurious as a party, if children be encouraged in showing off, or constantly habituated to hearing themselves talked about. Much as the failing has been observed and laughed at, it is still too common for mothers to talk a great deal about their children. The weariness with which strangers listen to such domestic occounts is a slight evil compared with the mischief done to children, by inducing them to think themselves of so much importance: they should never be taught to consider themselves of any consequence, except at home in the bosom of their own families.

Nothing tends to foster the genuine politeness which springs from good feeling, so much as scrupulous attention to the aged. There is something extremely delightful and salutary in the free and happy entercourse of the old and young cheers the dreariness of age; and age can return the benifit a hundred-fold, by its mild maxims of experience and wisdom. In this country, youth and age are too much separated; the young flock together, and leave the old to themselves. We seem to act upon the principle that there cannot be sympathy between these two extremes of life; whereas there may be in fact a most charming sympathy—a sympathy more productive of moral benefit than any other in the world.

The aged, from the loneliness of their situation, the want of active employment, and an enfeebled state of health, are apt to look upon the world with a gloomy eye, and sometimes their gloom is not unmixed with bitterness; hence arises the complaint of their harshness and asperity towards the follies of youth. These evils, so naturally growing out of their isolated situation, would seldom gain power over the old, if they were accustomed to gentleness, attention, deference from the young they would be softened by juventile love, and cheered by juvenile gaiety. Such intercourse sheds a quiet brightness on the decline of life, like sunshine on a weather-beaten tree, or a moss-covered dwelling. What is there on earth more beautiful than an aged person full of content and benevolence!

One very prevalent fault among children is a want of politeness to domestics. Young people should not, from mere whim and caprice, be allowed to make demands upon the time and patience of those who are hired to attend upon the family. They should make no unnecessary trouble in the kitchen; and when they ask for any thing, they should speak politely, saying, 'Will you have the kindness?' 'I thank you,' &c.—Such conduct greatly tends to make domestics more respectful kind, and obliging.

Mrs Madison was esteemed the most thoroughly polite women in America. Others might perhaps enter the room as gracefully, or superintend at table with as much dignity; the secret of her power lay in her wonderful adaptation to all sorts of characters. She was emphatically an observing woman. As Jefferson had no wife, she presided sixteen years at Washington, during all which time she is said never to have forgotten the most trifling peculiarities of charactes, that had once come under her observation: she always remembered them, and fashioned her conversation accordingly. Some may object to the exercise of this power, lest it should lead to incincerity; and the charge may well be brought against that kind of false politeness, which springs merely from a love of popularity. Politeness is not the only good thing corrupted by an unworthy motive; all precious coins have counterfeit.—When we are polite to others entirely for our own sakes, we are deceitful; nothing selfish has truth and goodness in it. But there is such a thing as true politeness, always kind, but never deceitful. It is right to cherish good-will towards all our fellow-creatures, and to endeavour to make them as happy as we conscientiously can. The outward forms of politeness are but the expressions of such feelings as should be in every human heart. It would be wrong to tell people we love them, dearly, when in fact we know nothing about them; or to invite them to visit our houses, when we do not want to see them. But we are bound to be kind and attentive to all our fellow-creatures when they come in our way, and to avoid giving them any unnecessary pain, by our manners and conversation.

In order to teach children the right sort of politeness, it must be taught through the agency of a pure motive. They should not be taught to observe and respect the feelings of others for the sake of making themselves pleasing, but merely because it is kind and benevolent to do so.

Outware politeness can be learned in set forms at school, but at the best, it will be hollow and deceptive. Genuine politeness, like every thing else that is genuine, must come from the heart."

The Mounds and Relics of the Ancient Nations of America.

Extract of a letter from Professor B. Silliman of New Haven, to Dr. G. A. Mantell of London.

At a speciel meeting of the Connecticut Academy of Arts and Sciences, July 7, 1846, various interesting facts relating to the mounds of the Ohio and Sciota valley, and specimens from them, illustrating their objects and the habits of their builders, were laid before the Academy by Mr. E. George Squires. These structures of the West are either enclosures, some evidently intended as fortifications, or mounds; of various forms and sizes. This gentlemen, in connection with Dr. Davis, of Chillicothe, Ohio, has opened eighty of the mounds, and has attended personally at the excavation of more than sixty. The developments are wonderful, and our explorer has satisfied himself that of the mounds, first many are sepulchral; second, others sacrificial; third, others for look outs and alarm posts.

In the sepulchral are found human bones, generally much decayed; so that no skeletons, and rarely a perfect bone, can be extricated, so ancient are they; and often the mounds of all descriptions are covered with gigantic forest trees. In one instance a section of a tree gave six hundred annual rings. The sacrificial mounds cover altars sometimes of a large size and constructed of baked earth hardened like bricks or tiles, and more rarely of stone. These altars contain calcined human bones, charcoal and other proofs of the operation of the fire. The merely sepulchral piles are earth mounds thrown up at ramdom without arrangement of the materials. Those covering altars are artificially stratified, layer over layer of alternating beds of gravel, earth and sand, but following a common curvature like a series of caps drawn over the same head.—This stratification, when heretofore named, but not fully and acurately reported, induced Professor Hitchcock to suppose that the mounds were diluvial; but their form, and the interred altars with their relics, disprove that opinion, although we know not why the altars were covered with so much care, or why covered at all; probably the proceeding was interwoven with their religious notions. In both kinds of mounds, but more especially in the mounds of sacrice are found very remarkable works of art wrought in stone.—Among them were images of many of the animals and birds of that period; they were often wrought into pipes of various fanciful shapes: at otter with a fish in his mouth: a hawk tearing a bird to pieces: owls, eagles, bears, &c., and many human heads and faces, giving doubtless the craniology and physiognomy of the people: besides many things not exactly obvious as to their import. There are many stone arrow and spear-heads beautifully chipped out of hornstone of various colors, or formed from obsidian or limpid quartz; and among the relics are much white mica in flakes, vessels of pottery, and pipestone similar to that of Prairie du Chien, described in the American Journal, vol. xxxviii, p. 140. The minerals grouped in these mounds came often from remote regions, and thus furnish proof of extensive migrations, or friendly or warlike travelling, or commerce. There are stings of beads of ivory, (probably from the mastodon or Elephas primigenius, which were contemporary in this country,) strings also of pearls—doubtless from the fresh water moluses, and possibly from the Gulf of Mexico; and there were also fossil teeth of sharks, and other teeth, probably cetacean. Besides, there are chisels and axes of native copper, and articles of siver. [The copper doubtless came from Lake Superior, where it is now found abundantly; and at this moment thousands are exploring there for it on both the American and British side of the lake. The great mass, weighing from three to four thousand pounds, (see American Journal, vol. iii, q. 204,) now lies in the court yard of the War Office at Washington, and a piece weighing sixteen hundred and thirty pounds is almost in view at the window from which I am writing, in the door-yard of my friend Mr. Forrest Shepard, an active geological explorer; both these grand pieces with native silver adhering to them, are from Lake Superior copper region.]

The telegraphic mounds (No. 3.) extend in ranges at convenient distances for many leagues, so that fire kindled upon them would give early and effectual notice of the approach of an enemy, as I remember to have seen in England, in August, 1805, when Napoleon's invasion was expected.

The enclosures serving as regular works for defence, were furnished with parapets, ditches, towers at the angels, and covered ways especially to supplies of water near rivers.—These works appear often to have included dense population in villages, and it is obvious that the hundreds of earth structures found in the valley of the Scioto, and thousands, many thousands, in Ohio and other States (not a few of which I have seen in Ohio, Illinois and Missouri) necessarily implied a considerable population: and of course it was agricultural, at least in part, as they could not in such numbers subsist upon the chase alone: and there must have been an energetic government to coerce, or powerful mental influence to induce so much labor. The present Indians do not submit to such toils, and have only very humble arts. They have, however, often buried their dead in ancient mounds; but it is easy to distinguish these more modern depositos.

The ancient mounds were always erected in plains and valleys of fertile land, and on alluvial river deposites; and in some cases there are river terraces at lower elevations than those on which the mounds are found, thus perhaps indicating their high antiquity.

These explorations by Messrs. Squire and Davis differ from all preceding ones, not only by their number, but by the thorough manner in which the researches are made, an entire section of the mound, having been cut from top to bottom, thus disclosing its contents.—They have at Chillicothe six thousand specimens which have been taken from the mounds, a selection of which will be made to illustrate a work on this branch of atchaeology which is now in the course of preparation.

Mr. Squire has presented this subject in some of the principal Northern cities of the United States, where it has excited much interest; and both a learned individual and a learned society have volunteered the sums requisite for its publication. The races that constructed these works were probably the precusors of the Mexicans and Peruvians and may have either deserted their structures to move further south, or been driven from them by war.

The mounds resembling animals in form, which were described by Mr. R. C. Taylor, (American Journal xxxiv, 33,) and again by Mr. S. Taylor, (ibid xli, 21,) are regarded by the gentleman of whose labors I have given you a sketch, as more modern structures, perhaps even of the present races of Indians, but this is by no means certain.

Voted, that the report of the committee on Slavery be read and adopted, which is as follows:

Resolved, 1st, That the practice of buying or selling men, women, or children, with the intention of enslaving them, or holding them in involuntary slavery, is, in the judgment of this Annual Conference, an offence condemned by the word of God—and, believing as we do, we affirm that we have no fellowship for any man, professing Christianity, who can with impunity enslave the Lord Jesus Christ, in the person of his brother, and thereby defile the temple of the Holy Ghost—neither can we fellowship any man, as a Christian, that apologizes for Slavery in the M. P. Church.

Resolved, 2d, That we, as a Conference of the M. P. Church in session, are as much as ever opposed to the system of American Slavery—and, whereas, that system has an existence in the Southern portion of the Meth. Prot. Church, Therefore,

Resolved, 3d, That, whereas, the late General Conference of the M. P. Church decided that they had no constitutional right to legislate upon the subject of Slavery, we beg leave to dissent from that body in opinion, and think that we have sufficient reason to recommend a call for a Convention, for the purpose of taking into consideration our relation to the subject of Slavery, and to adopt such measures as shall be deemed most advisable earnestly praying the Northern Conferences to co-operate with us, in bringing about, in a peaceable and Christian-like manner, the desired object. Said Convention to be held as soon as practicable.

* * * * *

Resolved, 4th, That if the Northern Conferences will not co-operate with us, in calling a Convention, we will, nevertheless, as an Annual Conference, recommend a call for a Convention of the Onondaga District, for the above named purpose.

Resolved, That we disapprove of secret oath-bound Societies, considering them uncongenial with the Discipline or spirit of our government.

The sermons on Sabbath were truly interesting. Love-feast commenced at 9 o'clock, and at an early hour the house was filled. First sermon by the President, Rev. John Baum—after which the ordination of Deacon was attended to. The brethren ordained were of the first order, of young men full of zeal for the cause of God and reform. They have gone forth to bear the reproaches of Christ.

Religious Intelligence.

PITTSBURGH DISTRICT.

Lewis Circuit, Va. Nov. 12th 1846.

Br. Bassett:—It is only from a sense of duty and that the church generally may be informed through the medium of your very worthy paper, of our condition and prospects on this little circuit.

I hold it to be the duty of each and every superintendent to keep the President of the District, and the church informed occasionally how they are prospering in their field of labor. It is with this conviction that I write. I have the happiness too of saying that as a church we are prospering, at almost every point. The Lord be praised for it. God forbid that I should glory, save in the cross of our Lord Jesus Christ, by whom the world is crucified unto me, and I unto the world. (Gal. 6.14.)

One Presidential, and first Quarterly meeting was held at, Old Harmony meeting Meeting-house (on Hackers creek,) which commenced on the 24 day of Oct. lasted seven days. We had an excellent meeting. Thank the good Lord for it. It would have done you good, Br. Bassett, could you have been present on Sabbath, of our meetings and heard our very worthy President, G. Brown preach. Though very feeble in body, in consequence of his last illness, and the fatigue in getting to his appointment at old Harmony. But he was strong in the Lord." Our congregation was large on the Sabbath, and continued to gain in strength, and interest, as the meeting progressed. We had a good time on the Sabbath, together around our Masters table. There our poor hearts did rejoice in believing in God.

Our members generally crowded to the feast, and were heard to bless the founders name. O! what harmony and union. May God help all his followers to be faithful until death. And then send a convoy of angels, to conduct them safe over Jordan, to Canaan's peaceful shore. The Patriarchs are there Abraham, Isaac and Jacob, and the Prophets are there. And the Martyrs are there. Many of our friends are there, In glory who were fed, and feasted, here around the Sacramental board of the Lord. "Glory be to God." Said the Saviour of the world, "I go to prepare a place for you. That where I am, there you may be also." (John 14, 23.) "That is you my disciples." There Christ will gird himself, and serve us. O, what a delightfull thought, to be fed and feasted for evermore, in that eternal world of joy. There parents, and children, shall meet, never to part any more. And friends to meet, our friends to greet, on that delightful shore. O, ye lovers of my Master, how encouraging is the thought. Our love feast meeting on Monday morning was a very interesting one. True the love of God was as manna to the faithful soul. For my poor heart feasted largely on the blessings of God, in our love feast meeting. "For truly it was a feast of love." During our Quarterly, and Presidential meeting 31 joined the M. P. Church on probation. They were principally young men. William M. Esq. joined at this meeting. "Bless God for it." For he will no doubt be of interest to the church, as his influence is very considerable, in his neighborhood. So much for our Q. and P. meeting." Bear with me, and I will give you a brief account of a Protracted meeting, which was held at M. Smith's near Weston, Lewis Co. Va. Said meeting commenced on the 1 day of the present month. And lasted four days. Here also we met the power of God to convict, and convert sinners, I think that we had one of the most heart-effecting seasons that I ever have experienced in all my life before. Such a mourning and weeping time amongst sinners, I hardly ever witnessed before. Christians were made to weep, with those that wept, while the lovers of my Master, were trying to direct the enquiring mind to the Lord Jesus Christ. On Sabbath evening of the meeting after sermon by Rev. H. R. Bennet. The mourners' bench was prepared, and mourners, called for, to come and kneel down to it. 8 or 10 persons ventured to come forward as seekers of the religion of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ. Among those who come forward were the daughters of J. J. J. Esq. The old representative of Lewis Co. Va. Here we had a very good love feast on Monday morning J. J. J. Esq. himself also being resolved to seek religion, came to our love feast meeting, and was resolved never to leave the place until God would have mercy on him. Just as the sun was setting behend the western hills on Monday evening, God converted his soul, O, what a rejoicing time we had together in the house of the Lord. "Glory to God it was a refreshing time indeed to many. At this meeting 11 joined the M. P. Church on probation. Making in all since I commenced my laborers on this circuit 42 added to the church. And so far as I have been able to judge from circumstances, about 40 conversions to God. Making in all, 910 persons who have joined the M. P. Church under my administration since I have been trying to labor in weakness in the itinerancy of the M. P. Church, which is little upwards of three years. But here, let me quote again from the apostle, "God forbid that I should glory, save in the cross of our Lord Jesus Christ." May I have all those souls to present to as sheaves in the last day? May I have them all and more is my prayer to Almighty God. Now unto God and our Father, be glory for ever and ever. Amen. (Eph., 4. 20.)

Yours in Christ,

Buchanon Circuit, Va. Nov. 16, 1846.

BR. BASSETT: I would inform our friends, thro' the Recorder, that the cause of God is very much on the advance on this circuit. Our first Quarterly Meeting commenced Oct. 11th, and lasted till Monday night. The Lord was with us. Seven were added to the church. And there were several seekers who did not profess pardon. Believers were powerfully blessed. Thank God for his mercies. We commenced a protracted meeting on the 7th of November, at Mt Gilead, which is still in progress. The Lord has graciously revived his work. Eleven have been added to the church, ten of whom have been converted since our meeting commenced. Eight or 10 backsliders have been reclaimed, and believers very much built up. Our meetings are very interesting at every appointment. Thank God for his mercies.

R. H. WALKER.

MUSKINGUM DISTRICT.

Cambridge O. Nov. 17, 1846.

DEAR BROTHER BASSETT: I would inform Br. Clancy and the friends of Christ that we are trying to live on this (the Cambridge) Circuit and are getting along in peace and harmony. Our first quarterly Meeting commenced on 31 of Oct. We tried to obtain help from all the neighboring Circuits, but failed, and to add to our discouragements it commenced raining on the night previous. Our Meeting was at Ragan's Chappel. Here we have a large and commodious House of worship and a large and substantial membership, but like too many societies had become lukewarm on the subject of vital godliness. Under these discouraging circumstances, Br. Remsburg and myself commenced our meeting, trusting in the God of the armies of Israel, and the prayers of the faithful. Our Congregations on Sat. and Sat. Night were unusually small. On Sunday the weather was more favorable and Congregations good, but nothing of any importance was accomplished on that day. On Monday we had our lovefeast and Sacrament in connection and had a very good Meeting but no souls converted to God. At night, there were 3 seekers of religion came forward. We labored with them for some time but they arose and retired with sorrowful hearts. On Tuesday night the same 3 came forward and returned in the same manner. On Wed. night there were 5 came forward, and 2 obtained religion. This gave fresh encouragement to the Church. One of these 2 persons swooned away at about 9 o'clock and laid for 20 hours with out speaking. We continued the meeting 12 days after this and one or more experienced religion, almost every night after, during the meeting, there were between 30 and 40 seekers in all 18 for the first time professed religion at the altar some in the congregation and some at home. Eighteen united with Church, and a number of backsliders were reclaimed. The Church was much revived. In relation to this work I think I never saw clearer evidences of conversion in my life, nor did I ever see mourners struggle harder or so long in my acquaintance in these things, which has been for 18 years. Twenty-one rceived the ordinance of baptism and it certainly was the best meeting to my own soul I have had for 5 years. Members of all denominations joined in and helped on the good cause. A number of our M. E. Brethren did us good service and one good Brother of the Wesleyan Church Br. Nickerson labored hard and faithfully, and I thank God he was well paid for his labors of love.—Our prayer is that God will continue the work until it shall extend all around the Circuit. Amen, and Amen.

Yours in Christ,
J. NICHOLS.

Monson, O. Nov. 20, 1846.

BR. BASSETT: I would inform the President, and friends of Zion, through the Recorder of our condition. I reached my appointment on the 6th of September, preached twice the same day at the Burton appointment, and that week, succeeded in getting my family on the circuit. 13th had no appointment, 20th preached twice at the Shardon meeting house, and the same week I was taken with the fever and ague, and had it every day for sometime, and then succeeded in getting it broken; but it was only for a short time. It returned again, and continued daily for about two weeks, and then I succeeded in getting it broken the second time. And these eight weeks have past and I have not been able to preach a sermon, and am not yet able. Our first quarterly meeting was to be held on the last day of October. But in consequence of my ill health, I was not able to attend it, and no quarterly conference was held. So our circumstances are rather discouraging. But we are looking for better times. My health is improving, and I soon expect to resume the labours of the circuit. And as for the membership so far as I have become acquainted, I regard them equal to any of my acquaintance; they are spiritual in their devotions, loving when they meet; and all are willing to assist in bearing the burdens of the circuit. We have found friends, and such as are warmed by the pure streams of God's love shed abroad in the heart. They not only say "be ye fed, and be ye warmed;" but they enquire after our wants, and see that we have a supply. A more hospitable people I have never found, I have not the language to express my feelings of gratitude to them; and not to them only, but to others, Baptists, Presbyterians, Disciples, and all are interested in our welfare and contribute to our support. And while my feelings towards them are inexpressible, I rejoice to know that the Almighty has established a system of Christianity that will control the selfishness of the human heart; and gives the charity that is kind.

To all human appearance, I have not been able to advance the interests of the circuit. Yet God whose ways are in the deep, may have designed the greatest possible good in this affliction, to the circuit, and to me. He may be about to cause the lowering cloud to pass, and pour upon us the renewing and converting influence of his spirit. For this I pray, and for this I will labor if God gives strength.

A. R. BROWN.

Chesterfield, O. Nov. 20, 1846.

BR. BASSETT: I wish to inform the President (Br. Clancy) and our friends generally, how we are getting along on this (Pennville) circuit. I reached my field of labor the next week after the rise of conference, and commenced my labors the Sabbath following. And I am happy to say, I found a people in a general thing whose hearts were warm with the love of God and whose affections do not only move towards Him but also toward mankind. And I would here say that in the interval between the preachers of last year leaving and my arrival on the circuit our local brethren had held two days' meetings, both of which as I am informed were attended with the presence of the Lord and good was done. Those meetings were held at Lucas Run and Mount Pisgah. One united in church fellowship at the former and six at the latter place. Since that time we have held one two days meeting at Mt. Calvary, and had a very pleasant time. The Church was revived—one united with us at this meeting. We were deprived of the privilege of commemorating the dying sorrows of our blessed Master there being no one present to administer. Our first Q. Meeting commenced on the 7th inst. at Pennylle. Here Brs. J. W. Southard and S. Akins were in attendance, and labored to acceptance and profit. May the Lord bless those brethren and reward them for their work of faith and labored of love.

At this place (Pennville) the enemy had sown the seeds of discord, and chief friends were alienated in their affections towards each other; and to all human appearance the result would be fatal, and there was but little fruit seen until Monday morning in our love feast, in the opening of which we directed the mind of the people to the object, and truth had its effect. And while the brethren and sisters were speaking and praying, the God of Elijah who answers by fire, came down in mighty power, and such a melting time I never before saw. In a few moments the house was as it were on fire of love. Individuals were going to and embracing each other, and asking for and granting forgivness the one and the other; and we felt as the mountains weight had been removed, and we left the place rejoicing in God our Saviour.

This is the Lords doing and it is truly marvelous in our eyes. Glory to his name. I have been in many good love feasts but such an one as this I never attended before.

Our meeting closed on Thursday night. One united with us making in all 13 since Conference.

One brother received licence to preach at our quarterly Conference, and another brother received licence to exhort both of whom promise usefulness to the Church if faithful.

We are looking and I trust honestly laboring for better times times on Pennville circuit. May the Lord hear our prayers and revive his work abundantly this conference year. Pray for us.

I am yours &c.
C. J. SEARS.

M'Connellsville, O. Nov. 21, 1846.

BR. BASSETT: This circuit is one which with a faithful Ministry, and promptness of action upon the part of the officiary, and spirituality through the whole body may rank among our best. We hope through grace to be able to do our part, and look to God for success.

Our Quarterly Meeting resulted in the addition of five names to the Church, 4 at the time, 1 since.

The time of the meeting was very unfavorable, the weather being rainy. Congregations were comparatively small. Yet great good was done, by way of reviving the hopes of God's Children. Our lovefeast on Monday morning, was truly rich with the presence and power of God.

Br. Warren, is at his post, doing well, and is well received. I am truly gratified in being associated with such a brother in the field of gospel labor and sufferings. We hope to be able to communicate more pleasing intelligence ere long.

JAMES M. PIPER.

OHIO DISTRICT.

Springfield, Ct. Dec. 1*st* 1846.

DEAR BR. BASSETT: Our first Quarterly Meeting for this Circuit was held at Clifton, commencing on the seventh day of November. Considering all things we had a good meeting; one was added to the Church from the world.

We have just closed a protracted meeting at Pleasant Hill, at which the Church was much revived, and a deep interest awakened among nonprofessors: one experienced the pardoning love of God, and manifested his resolution to forsake the ranks of the enemy by giving his name to the Church. I think our prospects on this Circuit are growing brighter—in Springfield there appears to be a greater interest manifested by the membership to keep up prayer and class meetings, than formerly. Pray for us.

BR. BASSETT: Through much affliction, yet with pleasure, I would inform you, that though I cannot travel and preach, I am trying, by the help of my Redeemer, to do what little I can for the advancement of those principles that lay so near my heart, praying the Great Head of the Church to assist by his Spirit; and that I may be enabled to endure my affliction with Christian fortitude.

EDITING A PAPER.

Hear what the 'National Intelligencer,' published by Messrs. Gales and Seaton, at Washington city, one of the most valuable and ably conducted papers in the country, says about editing a newspaper:

"Many people estimate the ability of a newspaper, and the industry and talents of its editor, by the quantity of editorial matter which it contains. It is comparatively an easy task for a frothy writer to pour out daily, columns of words—words, upon any and all subjects. His ideas may flow in 'one week washy, everlasting flood,' and his command of language may enable him to string them together like bunches of onions; and yet his paper may be a meagre and poor concern. But what is the labor, the toil of such a man, who displays his 'leaded matter' ever so largely, to that imposed on the judicious, well informed, editor who exercises his vocation with a consciousness of its responsibilities and its duties, and devotes himself to the conduct of his paper with the same care and assiduity that a sensible lawyer bestows upon a suit, or a humane physician upon a patient, without regard to show or display! Indeed, the mere writing part of editing a paper, is but a small portion of the work. The industry is not even shown there. The care, the time employed in selecting, is far more important—and the tact of a good editor is better shown by his selections than by anything else; and that we all know, is half the battle. But as we have said, an editor ought to be estimated and appreciated, by the general conduct of his paper, its tone, its temper, its uniform consistent course, its principles, its aim, its manliness, its dignity, its prosperity. To preserve these as they should be preserved, is enough to occupy fully the time and attention of any man. If to this be added the general supervision of the newspaper establishment, which most editors have to encounter, the wonder is, how they can find time or room to write at all!' "

PAPERING CHURCHES.—It is said that papering has some decided advantages over every other method of dressing walls. The Methodist Protestant Church on 9th street in this city, and the and the Rev. T. H. Stockton's Church in Philadelphia have recently been beautifully papered; the former in imitation of marble and the other variously.—Fountain.

WESTERN RECORDER.

PUTNAM, OHIO.

SATURDAY, DECEMBER 5, 1846.

SLAVERY IN MISSOURI. In the last number of the Colonization Herald, we find published, the Testimony of the Synod of Missouri, (New School Presbyterian) respecting slavery. We are gratified to see that that Synod does not pronounce its benediction upon the 'peculiar institution,' nor denounce, without sparing, the abolition brethren, but consents that the subject of slavery shall be "fully and fairly discussed, upon all suitable occasions." Let us speak kindly to the southern brethren, and not in rude menaces, and they will yet give us a hearing upon this subject. The following, with other resolutions, were adopted by the Synod, unanimously.

Resolved, That it is the duty of masters to give to their servants opportunities of religious instruction; that to this end we recommend that they be taught to read the Bible, and that they be not only allowed, but required, to attend regularly on religious worship, both in the family and in the house of God, either with their masters, or a service expressly for themselves.

Resolved, That, living as we do in a slave state, we are yet free to declare to the North and the South, that we desire and pray for the entire removal of slavery from among us, so soon as it can be done with safety and manifest advantage, not so much to the masters as to the servants themselves.

Resolved, That while we deprecate all violent agitation, and especially the spirit of denunciation and exclusiveness, as evil and only evil in its spirit and in its results, we wish distinctly to declare that we are not unwilling that this subject should be fully and fairly discussed upon all suitable occasions; that we believe the full and temperate discussion of slavery at the late meeting of the General Assembly has done good, by softening the prejudices equally of the North and the South, and showing good men on both sides that they stood really much nearer together than they supposed; that we have no opinions on this subject which we are not willing in all proper places, with modesty and firmness, to state and defend; believing that when all the circumstances of our situation are considered, our course will be appproved by the enlightened piety of the American church and of the Christian world.

SOUTH CAROLINA.—The Charleston Mercury brings us the Message of Gov. Aiken of South Carolina, being the first gubernatorial message of the season. It was presented to the Legislature on the 24th ult. He alludes to the great failure of the provision crop of the previous year, inflicting severe suffering upon many, but states that it has been "followed this year, by a most abundant and plenteous yield of every kind grain and grass." He alludes to the cotton crop, as moderate,—and states that the health of the people is good. He refers with painful feelings to the war of Mexico, but lays all the blame upon that Republic. He urges upon the Legislature the subject of education. The State debt he says has been materially reduced. He recommends a reduction of the rate of interest to a lower standard, viz: 6 instead of 7 per cent. He advises an increased attention to Rail Road improvements, also a Geological and Agricultural survey of the State. He recommends the establishment of a State Penitentiary. The Message of Gov. Aiken occupies little more than two columns of brevier in the "Mercury."

REV. E. E. PARISH—OREGON.—We have just received through Br. J. Nichols, of Cambridge Circuit, a response to inquiries made in our paper a few weeks ago respecting Br. Parish. The following extract from the letter of Br. Nichols, will convey some information satisfactory to enquirers.

"I am requested by Br. Dean, son-in-law of Br. Parish, to respond to the enquiry from friends at Penville. He thinks it not possible that Br. P. has left Oregon for California, as reported, forasmuch as his children received a letter from him that must have left about the time the man did who professed to give the information to his father-in-law, and in that letter he talks very differently, in giving his children directions for writing to him. He says, direct yours letters to Oregon City, care of James Rob, by way of Independence, Mo. to which place you must pay the postage, and request the post master to forward by the Emigrants. Again, he says, "take with you 150 lbs. of flour, and 50 lbs. of bacon to each person, with coffee, tea, sugar, &c. to suit your taste. Bring two years' clothing, and a large supply of shoes. Let your teams be oxen, and plenty of them, so as to have some to drive loose for a change." It is thought he means 150 lbs. flour, and 50 of bacon from Independence, Mo. to each person. His son in law, Hugh Nicherson, lives in Hoskinsville, Morgan Co. Ohio, who thinks of starting next spring. From him, more minute information may be obtained."

REV. R. C. HATTON. We notice in the list of appointments of the Tennesse Conference of the M. E. Church South, just published in the Nashville C. Advacate, the name of R. C. Hatton as Presiding Elder, Lebanon District. We presume this is the Br. H. who was once a short time with the Methodist Protestants, at Pittsburgh and then joined, for a while, the Cumberland Presbyterians? Are we right, Br. C. P. at Uniontown? Our statement and enquiry are only for information.

The Markets.

Wheat is still selling in Zanesville at 50 cts. Flour $3 25 cts. In Pittsburgh on the 2nd inst. Flour was worth $3 25; Wheat 60 cts. In Philadelphia $4 87½, and Wheat $1 98.

LADIES' DEPARTMENT.—The article for Mothers on our first page, is a selection from Chambers' Edinburg Journal, sent us for publication by a friend. Besides this, on our fourth page, the ladies will find a useful article, under the head of "Peculiar Temptations." We think both will be found well worthy of attention.

☞GEN. SCOTT and staff have been ordered to Tampico, Mexico, passed through Philadelphia last week en route for his destination. So says the Saturday Enquirer.

GRAHAM'S MAGAZINE.—The December number is received, concluding the twenty ninth volume. It has three very fine engravings, the most interesting of which, is a view of the City of Columbus; also two wood cuts representing Game Birds of America. Graham, professes to be at the head of the Periodicals of the World, in point of Circulation, and Popularity.' In point of usefulness, too, might be added, if novels and fashions were omitted. The publishers have paid $1200 for a new sea novel, called "the Islets of the Gulf," an entire copy of which, is promised to be furnished to the subscribers to 'Graham' for 1847, in parts, accompanying each number of the Magazine. How much more, might the 50,000 readers of the Magazine, be benefitted, by being furnished with some book of information. Terms of the Magazine, for 1847 $3,00 in advance. Two copies for $5. Five copies for $10, in advance, post paid. G. R. Graham, Publisher, 129 Chesnut St. Philadelphia.

THE CHRISTIAN SOUVENIR. We are pleased to acknowledge the receipt of the October and November number of this work. It is a monthly Magazine commenced last spring, published in Philadephia, by F. C. Wilson, Chesnut Street, and edited by Rev. H. D. Moore, of that city, and Rev. A. A. Lipscomb, of Baltimore. The literary reputation of those gentlemen, is sufficient guaranty of the merits of the Souvenir.' As its name indicates, it is a Christian publication, calculated to disseminate a pure and useful literature. With this view of the work, we welcome it to our table, and wish it great success. Each number is accompanied with good engravings. From an inspection of the two numbers received, we feel prepared to recommend the 'Christian Souvenir' as worthy the patronage of our western friends. And we will be pleased to aid in extending its Circulation. Terms, $1 per year, an advance.

GODEY'S REPRINT of Blackwood's Ladies' Magazine and Gazette. We have received the first two numbers of this interesting work. That it is something neat is sufficiently evidenced by the announcement that it is from the house of Mr. Godey. It is published in monthly numbers, of 16 pages each, in quarto form. It contains some valuable reading matter, interspersed with some very fine poems. We shall esteem it a privilege to lay before our readers occasionally a choice article from the Reprint.' Terms, one dollar per annum. Two copies for $1,50. Address, L. A. Godey. 101, Chesnut St. Philadelphia.

GODEY'S REPRINT, of the London World of Fashion. We acknowledge the receipt of the first number of this work. It is of the same form, and furnished at the same price as the Reprint of Blackwood. But though we are under many obligation to the respected publisher, he will excuse us, that in conducting a religious journal, it does not become us to commend a work professedly devoted to the fashions. Address, same as the above.

THE SOUVENIR and Youth's Literary Mesenger. We have omitted to acknowledge the receipt of the first number of a new Monthly, with the above title, published by Binkley and Taylor at our neighboring village of Roseville. It is issued in monthly numbers of 16 pages each, 8vo, at 50 cts. per annum. It is neatly gotten up, and contains many interesting things. The editors profess very laudable designs in behalf of the cause of educations, in which we are bound to pledge to them our co-operation, and our wishes for their success. We only regret, that in presenting a work professedly for the benefit of Youth, they should commence with their first number the publication of fictitious tales. This is all the fashion we know. But does it not induce in youth a taste for novel reading, rather than for the substantial reading, which should be recommended to youth?

CHRISTIAN WORLD—MONTHLY REPORTER.—We still meet with frequent enquiries respecting these publications, but regret that we cannot give any satisfactory information respecting them. The Editor announced through the Meth. Protestant, some weeks ago that the publication of the C. World was still further suspended, but that the remaining numbers of the Reporter would be issued soon. A number of the Reporter was accordingly soon after acknowledged in the same paper, but it has not reached our office. Br. O. P. Stephens, of Springfield, O. (last year, of Greenfield) transmitted by us $5 last winter, for the contemplated Monthly and Weekly publications, but says he has only received two numbers of the Reporter. We state this to the respected Publisher, by request. Hope we shall hear form him soon, after so long a silence, occasioned we presume by his afflictions.

OUR CORRESPONDENCE. Our readers will find both the east and west represented in our present number. The letter from the western woods, will certainly be read with interest. Also, the letter of our New England Correfpondent, whom we are happy to introduce to our readers for the first time. He is a good writer, having had years of experience as an editor in eastern cities. At this time he is traveling as a lecturer in behalf of some benevolent and useful enterprises, and we hope he will favor us freqeuently. What has become of our Cincinnati Correspondent? Does nothing happen any more, at the Queen City?

☞We direct attention to the Prospectus of the 'Congressional Globe & Appendix,' in another column. Having been favored to receive the work during last session of Congress, we feel prepared to recommend it as a full and faithful history of the doings of both houses of Congress, without favoring either political party.

VOLUNTEERING.—The Philadelphia Saturday Enquirer says that the military fever is up in Pennsylvania. Several companies in Philadelphia have offered their services, and have been accepted. Preparations are in progress for an early start for Pittsburgh, the place of rendezvous.

OJIBWAY MISSION.

On last Sabbath we enjoyed the privilege to hear an address in the Presbyterian Church, by Rev. Mr. Bardwell, a Missionary amongst the Ojibways, in the extreme N. W. Ter. We were entertained with an interesting statement in reference to the condition and habits of the Ojibways, and the success and prospects of the Mission. Mr. B. represented the facts in reference to the imposition practiced upon Indian tribes by our government, as well as numerous impositions by individuals, and showed that these circumstances were for some time a serious barrier to the efforts of the mission to obtain the confidence of the Indians. In this however, they have at length succeeded. Great difficulties have to be contended with, in the vicious habits of the Indians. Tey are addicted to intemperance—will get intoxicated, (both men and women,) whenever liquor can be procured. And when intoxicated, they perpetrate upon each other frequent outrages and murders. They have a passion for gambling—and an inveterate habit of thieving. They seldom however steal from each other, but on all possible occasions from the whites. This is the less strange, as they know how grossly they have been imposed upon by the whites in having their country, and almost their all taken from them, and almost driven away to a remote wilderness. Mr. B. observed however that the Indians were not addicted to profanity—that their language did not contain words that could be used for such an unholy purpose. The Ojibways are associated in bands, subsisting but a few months in a place, when they are upon the move for some other location in quest of game or fish. Their roving habits are again an obstacle to the success of Missions among them. Neglecting agricultural pursuits and the arts of civilization, the people, have but a bare subsistence.—Often times do our missionaries divide their food with those who are suffering starvation. The address of Mr. B. was inteaupted, and the congregation mainly dispersed by an alarm of fire in Zanesville. But we heard him give some interesting statements in reference to the success of the Mission. Some interesting conversions had occcured, amongst whom were some of the chief men of the tribe. A Temperance Society had been formed amongst them and most of the members had kept their pledge with fidelity. The Missionary among the North American Tribes, has to endure most serious toils and privations. But we are glad that there are some who will meet these difficulties, and endure the loss of all for the Kingdom of Heaven's sake. And we are glad too, that in this noble work of evangelizing the heathen, they have supporters in a portion at least of the membership of churches in this country. We would be glad to see a missionary spirit more largely and extensively diffused. Mr. B. very cogently remarked, that we have got from the Indians, their country, and we ought at least to give them the gospel. He showed that Indian Missions had peculiar claims upon the people of this country.

FROM A NEW ENGLAND CORRESPONDENT—OF THE WESTERN RECORDER.

Rochester, Massachusetts, Nov. 24th 1846.

DEAR BR. BASSETT; Should you or your reader be interested in the incidents which have occurred or which may occur in the Land of the Pilgrims, among the Granite Hills, of N. H. or the Cloud Capped Mountains, and verdant vallies of Vermont, it will afford me pleasure to keep you advised thereof.—Our fruitful season has passed away leaving behind the blessings of plenty, unless I were to except the all-pervading epidemic which prevails among the potatoes.—Our New England holliday is just at hand, when chicken pies, roast turkies, and plumb puddings on the one hand, and the joyful meeting of parents and children, lovers and friends, on the other, will form the centre of attraction both to our physical and intellectual being.—

One thing which makes our thanksgiving day in the Old bay State, seem a little more relishable, is that our excellent Gov. Briggs come out in his annual proclamation this year, earnestly entreating the people of this commonwealth to assemble with their ministers of religion and pray, among the things, that the beautiful sentiment contained in our Declaration that all men are born free and equal may be justly regarded, and that we may soon be a Republic free and happy without a bond man to be found in all the length and breadth of it. After such sentiments as these were read from more than a thousand pulpits, Gov. Briggs was re-elected by an overwhelming majority by the people. I regard this as a clear demonstration that public sentiment is about right on the subject of our great national evil of Slavery.

A death occurred some weeks ago in Exeter, N. Hampshire, which was noticed in the 'Olive Branch; but which, if you did not quote it into the Recorder, will be news to several of your readers, and about which they will feel no ordinary interest. I allude to the death of the Rev. Urial Minor. He had been a minister in the Methodist Protestant Church, but died in the communion of the Wesleyan Methodists leaving a wife and several children to mourn their loss—but to mourn not as those who had no hope. Although I had known him for almost twenty four-years, yet I never saw in him so much of religious devotion as in the two or three last years of his life. Br. Minor had one attribute of character which is a tribute to his memory, I would not pass over in silence. He combined with high companionable and social qualities the capability of strong sympathy—a sympathy which often led him to great self sacrifice, even to a forgetfulness of himself, to benefit those whom he would befriend. I am aware that this propensity may be carried so for as to loose for it all claim to virtue. But it is far easier to condemn an over wrought simpathy than to imitate its proper exercise.

Br. Minor had less to do with the world for several of his last years, which never afforded him affluence. But I trust he has gone to that land where he finds employment more congenial to a heart purified by the redeeming blood of Jesus, and society composed of kindred spirits, free from the necessity of grappling with a cold and selfish world.—

Among the reasons which influence me to give so much space to a notice of the deceased, is on account of the connecting link his life forms with other incidents of endearing interest.

More than twenty two years since, I left my father's house in Vermont, to travel and preach the gospel. I was then a youth not out of my "teens." My parents having been chiefly instrumental in my conversion to the Redeemer's cause, and my brothers and sisters, all of whom had made a profession of religion before me, and who had been peculiarly useful in aiding me along my new Pilgrimage through my tender years, were, on these accounts, doubly dear to me. To part with them on the one hand, and to venture upon all the untried realities of attempting to preach Christ, on the other, was a scene so full of soul-stirring interest that I found it deeply interesting to have a friend who could sympathize with me, and to whom I could make a free communication of my thoughts and feelings. Such a friend I found in Br. Minor. The first time I went any considerable distance from home was in his company. We traveled on both sides of the green Mountains, some three hundred miles, having meetings together and apart, nearly every day in the week. Early impressions, especially those made in the early adventures in a young preacher's life, are abiding. When I meet the notice of Br. Minor's death I lived not only these scenes all over again but my mind's eye glanced back through the series of years since our first acquaintance, until I followed my early friend to the land of silence! How many of the companions of our youth are fallen! When one goes down to the grave who was in any way woven into our early recollections how it rouses us up to realize that this world is not our home! And if we were to lie down in everlasting forgetfulness even, how gloomy would be the reflection. But life and immortality are brought to light."

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

Terrible Disaster--70 lives lost.

The fine large steamer Maria, on her way up from New Orleans to St Louis, was run into by the Sultana, below Natcheez, and almost instantly sunk. The loss of life has been very great, though the extent is not precisely ascertained. The following letetr from the clerk of the Talma to the Louisville Courier, contains all the particulars we have:

DEAR SIR:—On Saturday, 21st inst., near two o'clock, A. M., 7 or 8 miles below Natcheez, the steamer Maria ascending, and the steamer Sultana decending, came in contact, sinking the former immediately, in not less than three fathoms water. The shock was most terrible—displacing her boilers, bursting her steam-pipes, and creating the most dreadful havoc among her crew; consisting, (we learn from her clerk,) of fifty-two men, not including her officers and servants, out of which number 12 or 14 escaped unhurt, 25 to 30 dangerourly scaled, balance missing—together with her first clerk, Mr. James R. Durst, and third engineer, name unknown. She had no deck passengers, and but few cabin, all of whom were probably saved, with most of their baggage.

There were only two females on board, Mrs. Dr. Mead, of St. Louis, and Mrs. J. G. Lonsdale and family. Those ladies certainly displayed great presence of mind, especially Mrs. L., who prudently closed her doors to protect herself and children from the steam. The Talma being almost instantly along side, they were safely conducted on board.

The wounded were brought on board of us in sheets and matresses, and arranged in our cabin. Their shrieks were heart-rending; their agonies cannot be described—horrible to witness. Yet everything was done by the officers of the Maria, Sultana and Talma to render them as comfortable as circumstances would admit. Drs. Mead and Saunders, and more particularly Mr. Samuel Hyman, of Lousville, were very efficient in dressing their wounds and endeavoring to relieve their sufferings. Capt. Hite. (of Talma,) remained along side as long as he could be of any service, and did not leave until after consulting if more could be done. Then running up to Natchez, we there left the afflicted, twenty-two in number, in charge of the physician of the hospital.

The Sultana was injured and supposed to be in a sinking condition when we left.

With regard to the accident—which boat—if either, or both—were or were not in fault, I am unable to speak.

It was truly an unfortunate affair. Captain Peas, I am informed, did all he could to save life. After the boats struck he used every exertion with his boat to tow or rather push the Maria out upon the bar.

It is very probable that but few, if any, of the number injured will survive.

Very respectfully, yours,
J. M. MARTIN,
Clerk. S. B. Talam.

Since the above was in type, the Queen of the West come up from below. When she passed the wreck of the Maria, 20 bodies had been found and 28 more ascertained to be missing, mostly of the crew.

A bulk head had been fitted on the Sultana and she had proceeded to New Orleans.—Cin.-Gazette.

LAKE DISASTERS—LOSS OF LIFE.

BUFFALO, Nov. 21—11 P. M.

The Buffalo Commercial Advertiser has received accounts of the loss of the steamers Helen Strong and Indian Queen; the beaching of the schooners Cleveland, Dayton, J. H. Lyon, U. S., H. H. Sizer, Chas. Howard, and Huron, in the northwest gale of Thursday. Two passengers, a man and a woman, names not known, were lost off the Helen Strong, and four of the hands off the Osceola. The Indian Queen was heavily loaded with goods, and was wrecked above the lower point of Dunkirk harbor. The Helen Strong, after losing her rudder and bursting a steam pipe, struck broadside against the rock coast four miles above Barcelona. The Osceola was blown ashore four miles above the Helen Strong, and the rest of the sail craft are beached between this and Erie. There is a break in the Welland canal—10 days to repair.

BUFFALO, Nov. 22—7 P. M.

The steamer Helen Strong, reported ashore at Barcelona, is a total wreck. Two lives lost. Sixteen bodies have been found drowned near Barcelona. Several vessels were fallen in with on the lake, bottom upwards. A schooner was beached opposite Quincy and four lives lost. The steamers Indian Queen, New Orleans, and Madison, are all wrecked. Great fears are entertained for the safety of others.

Lamentable Steamboat Disaster--Forty Lives Lost.

I have the lamentable news to communicate to you, that the magnificent steamer Atlantic, one of the line which carries passengers between New York and Boston, via. Norwich and Worcester, has been entirely lost.

She was a new boat, and one of the most splendid of the truly magnificent boats that now run on the East river. She was on her way from Norwich with 62 souls on board, inciuding the officers and crew, and the passengers from Boston and intermediate places; when on Thursday night, during a tremendous gale, she went on shore on Fisher's Island, and broke into pieces, being a total wreck.

Of the passengers and crew on board, only twenty-two are known to have been saved, leaving forty as lost, among whom is Capt. Dustan, who was one of our best steamboat captains.

Some of the passengers who were saved arrived here this morning. They describe the scene on Thursday night, whilst the boat was beating on the shore, as awful beyond description.

The same paper publishes a list of the lives lost, which agrees exactly with the list of the saved, as published in the New York Herald, extra. We rely upon the latter. Among them we note the name of Hiram Tarbox, known to some of our citizens. By the Herald we also learn the following:

We extract the annexed particulars of the awful calamity from the second edition of the New London News, of last evening—

During the awful gale of Thursday, the 26th, which we gave an account of in our paper this morning, and in which the splendid steamer Atlantic was driven ashore, has brought sorrow and sadness to many hearts.

This day, at half past 2 o'clock, the steamer Mohegan returned from the scene of the wreck, where she went this morning at about 8 o'clock. She has brought up TWENTY-TWO dead bodies.

As was previously surmised, a part of the Atlantic's machinery gave out on Thursday night—the steam box bursted shortly after she left New London, being wrenched apart by the heavy sea; and letting go her anchor, she drifted to within a quarter of a mile of Fisher's Island shore—where she was riding at anchor when the Mohegan went down to her on Thursday noon.

This (Friday) morning at 4½ o'clock, she went ashore, and has gone entirely to pieces.

The persons who lost their lives, did so in attempting to get on shore.

A number of persons were left on the island at the residence of Mr. Winthrop, when the Mohegan left, many of whom are badly wounded; and 5 dead bodies were just picked up when the Mohegan left, but they were not taken on board.

The Mohegan has gone to Norwich with a number of the dead and living persons taken from the Island, and will return to the scene of the wreck this evening.

It is related of Capt. Dustan, who took and kept his position over the upper saloon, that to the repeated and earnest solicitations of his companions in peril, not to expose himself thus, he replied —"If the Atlantic goes, I go with her."

In addition to the foregoing, we would state that the body of the unfortunate Capt. Dustan was brought to Brooklyn by the return of the Long Island cars.

Mr. Varnum Marsh; one of those saved, was likewise brought to the city by the cars.

SATURDAY MORNING, November, 21, 1846.

AWFUL ACCIDENT.—Loss of Life.—A dreadful accident occured yesterdy, in the Seventh Ward, at the Oregon Foundry, from the explosion of a boiler. It took place about three o'clock in the afternoon, and was one of the most singular, and fatal of which we have heard for a long time.

The engine house was a building, immediately in the rear of the frame in which the castings were made and when the accident occurred, the men were employed in that apartment. The boiler was lifted completely out of its place, and carried through the casting room forcing its way through the front of the buildings, moving over the street, and finally striking the side hill, about one hundred yards distant. The machinery, in fragments, was scattered in every direction.

Wm. Holland, one of the owners, James M'Clory, a Pattern maker, who was running the engine at the time, were killed instantly.

When we reached the scene of the disaster, both bodies had been drawn out from the rubbish, and were extended on the floor, quilts being thrown over them.

The head was completely from the body of Mr. Holland. Portions of the face, head and hair, had been collected and were place beside the corpse.

The whole of the back part of the head, with one side of the face of Mr. M'Clory, had been carried away. Nothing could have been more ghastly than the remains of the blacked features.

Both men appear to have been killed instantly; but we have never seen an instance in which death left more revolting traces of his presence.

Mr. Holland leaves a wife and two children. —His wife seems almost frantic at her loss; but she has not been permitted to see the mangled remains of her husband. He is said to have been a man of estimable character.

Mr. M'Clory, was a young man, unmarried. His father resides in the Seventh ward.

There were three other persons injured? Wm. Wilson, a yonth of about 17, Jno. Jones, another boy of about the same age, and Wm. Linton. The wounds of the two last are serious: but it was not thought that the former would survive through the night. He was carried to a tavern in the vicinity, where every attention was paid to him.—His head and face were black and swollen, and he appeared to suffer intense agony: indeed when we saw him, death would have been a happy release. His half choaked and inarticulate cries, were really heart rending.

He was attended by Drs. Walters and Watt.

Coroner Richardson, immediately on his arrival empannelled a Jury, and a verdict was returned in accordance with the above facts.

The Foundry was owned by Messrs. Algeo, Holland & Co, The engine house is completely destroyed, being a mere pile of rubbish. The Foundry is also much shattered.

The report of the explosion was not so loud as is usual in cases of the kind. One of the men stated to us, that his attention was first attracted by the cries of the boys.

We examined the boiler and found the head blown out: the head piece is lying broken into several pieces. The boiler itself appeared thin, and the head very much shattered, and the appearance of having been melted, or partially so.

The head of the boiler it is supposed, struck the two men who were killed: while Wilson was scalded. Jones has a slight wound on the head. —Pitts. Com. Jour.

In a western county, a miserable drunken loafer was elected to the office of justice of the peace, for the fun of it. He immediately became temperate and industrious, dressed himself in good style, and discharged the duties of the office in a respectable manner.

FEARFUL SCENES IN FRANCE.—Hundreds of Lives Lost.—It has already been stated in our columns that for a number of days preceding the 19th of October, rain fell in torrents in many parts of France, and particularly in the valley of the Loire. On the afternoon of that day, the river and its tributaries bagan to raise, and in the course of a few hours, the inundation was most awful. Property to the extent of millions of francs was destroyed—thousands of cattle perished—and hundreds of human lives were lost. Whole hamlets were swept away, and several villages were completely submerged. The Paris correspondent of the Boston Atlas says "that the large cities of Nantes and Blois—of Tours, Orleans, and Nevers, were, in many parts of them, under water, and such injury was done to property, that millions of dollars cannot repair it; and such a loss of life was there that all the valley is mourning. A diligence with eleven passengers, ten men and one woman, left Feurs on its way to Paris. It was obliged to cross the Loire. The people on the bridge, who were watching the rapid rise of the river, warned them not to proceed, as the causeway beyond was already under water, but an inspector, one of the passengers, said that he had come over that very piece of road two hours before, and it was perfectly safe—and he called on the driver to proceed. They went on, and in three minutes the horses stood still, where they could neither turn nor go on. The passengers lashed the diligence to a tree by a small rope, and waited for help. Seven men in a boat attempted to reach them, but failed, and were obliged to fasten their boat to a tree, and remain in her all night. Soon the lady in the coupee cried out that she was drowning, and called upon those on top to get her out. The conductor and the driver let down a rope, which a priest, also in the coupee fastened around her body. The attempt to hoist her up capsized the diligence and broke the rope by which it was fastened to the tree. She, with her conductor and driver, was drowned.

Deeds of wonderful courage and humanity were performed. One man saved eighty persons from drowning, but at last fell by accident from his boat, that he had just filled from an inundating vilage, and though those whom he had saved made every possible effort to recover him, he was swept away and lost."

AN APPALLING OCCURENCE.—On Monday last between 10 and 11 o'clock our citizens were thrown into a state of excitement and alarm, by a sudden report and shaking of the houses, which was afterwards found to have been occasioned by a terrific explosion of Mr. Beatty's Belona Powder Mills, about 6 miles from the city, on the Baltimore and Susquehanna Rail Road, by which accident five of the workman were instantaneously killed! Their names were William Braden, Francis Woodhurt, James Bush, August Benofi, and a colored boy, Nelson Mingo. The Sun's Reporter says; "We have not words to depict the sight that presented itself, in the room where the shapeless remains of the unfortunate victims had been collected.—Not one of the bodies had the full compliment of members attached to it. Various portions of the different bodies were found at a distance of 100 yards from the site of the mill, and we even saw pieces of entrails hanging on the tops of two trees, 60 yards from the spot from whence they were blown. The works consisted of the grinding mill, the graining mill (70 yards apart) and the 'cracker house,' in which the cakes were dried before being crushed and grained, (25 yards distant from the other buildings.) These three were successively blown up, the powder igniting from one spot to the other. Two tons of powder were destroyed, besides some, partially manufactured." A number of houses in the vicinity were materialy injured by the concussion of the atmosphere. The origin is unknown.—Meth. Prot.

ILLNESS OF JOHN QUINCY ADAMS.—We regret to find the following painful intelligence in the Boston Advertiser of Friday:

"The public will be pained to learn that the venerable John Quincy Adams was yesterday forenoon seized with a paralysis of his left side, which for a time rendered him nearly insensible. He had just left the residence of his son, the Hon. Chas. F. Adams, in Mount Vernon street, in a good state of health when the gentleman with whom he was walking, suddenly perceived that he was laboring under some severe affection of his limbs, and was obliged to assist him to prevent his falling.

He was conveyed back to his son's house and received immediate medical aid. After a short time his consciousness returned, and he was subsequently much relieved, and we are happy to learn was not considered in immediate danger.—Mr. Adams is, we believe, about 80 years of age, notwithstanding which he has hitherto been able from the vigor of his constitution to endure unremitted labor, like a man in the prime of life.

Later.—The Boston Transcript of Friday evening has the following;

We are pleased to be able to inform our readers that Mr. Adams was much more comfortable this morning, and that his physicians entertain strong hopes of his ultimate entire recovery.

FRIGHTFUL ACCIDENT.—A girl by the name of Jane Hamilton, was thrown from her horse, on the Brownsville Road, last Sunday, while returning from church. The animal took fright, and her foot having caught in the stirrup she was dragged for about a hundred yards over the stones, mutilating her head and face in a shocking manner. She is not expected to survive.—Pitts. Com. Jour.

ATLANTIC, LAKE AND MISSISSIPPI TELEGRAPH.—The following will show the progress of the Western Telegraph Scheme.

In answer to inquiries from various editors, who are desirious of arranging for Congressional and legislative reports, and for the transmission of other intelligence, it is proper to state, for my associates as well as myself, that the progress of the Telegraph Line, which I am now constructing across the Allegheny Mountains, warrents belief "the lightning line," will be in successful operation to the Ohio River by the first of January. A substancial "iron cord," and not copper thread, is now streched from Philadelphia beyond Chambersburgh; and the advanced parties in constructing the work will be at the Ohio River on the first of December.

The extension of the line thence to Cincinnati, Louisville and St. Louis as well as to Cities on the Lakes, will be prosecuted with steady energy unchecked by winter storm or other obstacles, (active operations having also been commenced along the Lake Line;) and every effort will be made by my associates, as well as myself to complete the connexion between the "Atlantic and the Mississippi" in the shortest practicable time, and a manner most satisfactory to the public.

HENRY O'RIELY.

Philadelphia Exchange, Nov. 17, 1845.

EMPLOYMENT.—The government advertises for 10,000 army blankets, 160,000 yards of Canton flannel, 286,000 yards of unbleached cotton, 150,000 yards of shirting, 2,000 uniform caps, 8,000 engineer caps, 180,000 pair of laced boots, and 10,000 dozen of wollen stockings.

MEXICAN ITEIMS:—Santa Anna's forces at San Louis, were thought to be about 20,000 men. His plan appears to be to offer no resistance to the capture of Tampico, trusting that General Taylor will be compelled to dismember his army by dividing it into small detachments for the purpose of garrisoning the fortified places and out posts which he may capture.

The Government of San Louis Potosi had issued a decree proclaiming Santa Anna chief of the Republic, with the sole power to appoint the President pro-tem. Gen. Valencia had been selected by Santa Anna as his second in command, and was expected at San Louis with five or six thousand men. It is pretended that Gen Cortagas had raised 2,500 to 3,000 volunteers. They were busily engaged in increasing the defences of Vera Cruz, whose garrison is said to be 4,000 men, and farther reinforcements arriving. Gen. Salas had returned to the capital. A rich individual of the capital had advanced $50,000, to be sent to Vera Cruz, to be applied there to pay the garrison, or for other public purposes.

Mexican papers account for the loss of Santa Fe, by charging Armijo, their Governor, with treason, the United States Government having paid him $100,000 to evacuate the place! He had 4,600 men, while General Kerney had only 1,500. Ampudia on the 8th October, caused a Mexican peasent to be shot for having carried a despatch for the Americans. His name was Jesus Valdes.—Ampudia alleges that the Mexican people in all the villages from Montery to Matamoras, are hostile to the United States.—N. Y. Sun.

FLOUR FOR VICTORIA.—Notwithstanding that the flour and other breadstuffs sent to England are of the purest quality; nevertheless we learn from the Batavia Times that Mr, Henry Smith, an enterprising miller of that county, sent six barrels of the choicest superfine Genesee flour manufactured at his mill in Wheatland, Monroe county, to Queen Victoria, and for which, in due time, he received from her Majesty the comfortable little sum of three thousands dollars. The flour was put up in highly finished barrels, neatly varnished, enclosed in sacks, and forwarded direct to the Queen at London. The fortunate experiment upon the appetite of Royalty, seems to have suited her Majesty's palate so nicely, that in addition to the ample remuneration for his first adventure, he has recently received an order direct from London, for three thousand barrels more "of the same sort," which he has promptly forwarded.

In consequence of the scarcity abroad, great efforts have been making to produce fair crops. The Milwaukie Courier says that Menomonee raised three hundred and sixty bushels of wheat on eight and a half acres of land—forty-two and a half bushels to the acre! Pretty well done for Wisconsin.

THE NEW YORK CANALS.—"The Express says: —"Navigation on the Canals is about closed for this season. The latest advices from Albany say that from Schenectady, Utica, Rome, and other points the canal navigation was closed. About one hundred boats are between Albany and Utica, the majority of which are this side of Schenectady. This interruption may be very brief, as there is a promise of a thaw. The number of boats freighted with flour and other products now lying in the basin, was large, and the tow-boat companies had great difficulty in providing barges as fast as they were required."

Mass Temperance Convention.

The Board of Managers of the State of Temperance Society, have been instructed by the late Temperance Convention, to issue this call for a MASS TEMPERANCE CONVENTION, to be held in the city of Columbus on the 16th day of December next.

It is designed that all petitions, circulated, in accordance with the action of the late Convention, in reference to the License Question, should be then collected and presented to the legislature as ONE GREAT PETITION, and it is extremely desirable that a large delegation of the friends of Temperance should be then present, to add moral force of such presentation.

The influence of a large and enthusiastic Convention of the friends of Temperance, at that time, will be of incalculable benefit, in advancing the prospects of the great reformation.

Let every Township and County Society then appoint, and SEND, a large delegation to that Convention. As an inducement to some, it may be stated that a great Celebration of the Sons of Temperance will be held at the same place, on the morning of the Convention.

NOVEL-DECISION.—The following walks round the Ohio black law in good style. Whatever may be thought of it as a legal interpretation it aims at and secures justice between the parties.

Isabella Drummond, vs. Canal boat Queen of the West } Suit in attachment, Before M. Barnett, Esq.

The plaintiff in this case was a colored person; she had been on the boat as a cook; the Captain refused to pay her wages; a writ of attachment against the boat was issued.

At the trial a colored man, a hand on the boat, was subpœnœd; attorney for defence objected to the testimony of the witness, as a colored person cannot testify in any case where a white person is a party.

The Justice decided that a canal boat is not a white person within the meaning of the law; the testimony of witness was heard and verdict rendered for the plaintiff in attachment.

The decision of Justice Barnett in this case was a just one.—Clev. Her.

MYSTERIOUS.—The passengers on board the steamer Pike from Louisville to New Orleans were aroused in the night by the discharge of a pistol in the Cabin. On examination it was ascertained that Mr. Trotter agent of the Bank of Kentucky had been shot in his birth. The ball inflicted a severe though not dangerous wouud in the head. The assassin was not discovered. Mr. Trotter had in charge a large amount of funds.

MORE SLAVE TROUBLE.—Bill Grose was convicted of murder in the second degree, at Hagerstown, and was sold out of the State. He was purchased by a Baltimore gentleman, and sold to a Louisianian, and carried to that State, but being a convict, it was against the law, and his owner had to pay a heavy fine and remove him. Bill was brought back to Hagerstown, where he is again to be sold.

DEATH OF AN OLD MINISTER.—Rev. Thornton Fleming, one of our first Methodist Ministers who preached the Gospel West of the Allegheny Mountains, died at the residence of his son-in-law, REV. DAVID SHARP, in Elizabeth, Allegheny Co., Pa., on Saturday last. There was only one older Method ist Preacher in the United States, REV. EZEKIEL COOPER, of the Philadelphia Conference. Mr. Fleming was a man greatly esteemed, and died full of years and with the honor that cometh from God—the joyful hope of a blissful immortality.—Pitts. Gaz.

DISASTERS OF MARBLEHEAD.—This celebrated fishing town in a deep mourner from losses in the great gale of September 10. Hopes were entertained that the vessels had been blown into the Atlantic, but intelligence has arrived confirming the loss of eleven fishing vessels, together with their crews of 65 men and boys. By this calamitous result, 42 widows and 151 orphans have been thrown upon the mercy of the world. For many years such disasters from heavy gales have been unknown. We have received a pamphlet in Spanish of 72 pages detailing the losses, destruction of property and shipping in the sea ports and towns on the Island of Cuba by the hurricane of the 11th of October, which furnishes a truly appalling statement.—New York Sun.

DEATH ON THE RAILROAD.—Mr. Charles Riley of Albany was killed on the railroad, Saturday evening, while returning from Schodack. He was deaf, and was walking on the track when overtaken and killed by the engine.

DEATH BY ACCIDENT.—At Philadelphia on Tuesday, two horses belonging to the circus company of Sands, Lent & Co ran away. At the corner of Chestnut and Eight streets stood a vehicle with a man in it, who jumped out to turn his horse out of the way, when he was knocked down and trampled to death by the circus horses.

AGES OF BRITISH STATESMAN.—The Duke of Wellington is now 77 years old, Joseph Hume 70, Lord Morpeth 44, Dan. O'Connell 72, Sir Robert Peel 58, Lord Stanley 46, Earl Gray 44, Lord Brougham 67, Lord Lyndhurst, 74, Lord George Bentick 44, the Duke of Richmond 53, the Duke of Rutland 68.

The Telegraph is becoming a really mighty engine. On Thursday morning a Telegraph despatch was received at Philadelphia from a gentleman in Providence, authorizing a lawyer to institute proceedings to recover money from the captain or consignee of a vessel, then about to sail for Europe. In twenty minutes from the time of the despatch leaving Providence, the vessel was placed in custody.

The death of Azariah Smith, Esq., of Manlius, N. Y., has produced deep regret in the neighborhood, where he had spent a long and honoaable life.

EXCOMMUNICATION.—A man in St. George, N. B., by the name of Owen Boag, a Roman Catholic, was excommunicated by the priest of that parish for selling a small lot of land to the Baptists, on which to build a meeting house.

SAD CALAMITY.—Mr. Gerrit V. Orton, merchant of this village, was drowned on the evening of the 16th instant, in the race near Barber & Carhart's new factory. He had been to Clarksville on business, and started to return about 6 o'clock, and it being very dark, he is supposed to have fallen in from the bridge into the race. His body was found in the Flume this morning.—Auburn Journal.

We learn that Lorentzo Lewis, Esq., of Jefferson county, has disposed of the Woodlawn estate (comprising 2,000 acres) in Fairfax county, Virginia, to a company of Pennsylvanians, principally Friends, who will settle on the land, and proceed to its cultivation by forming nurseries, gardens, &c. We hail with pleasure every movement that will go to improve the adjacent country.—Alex. Gaz.

Alexander Hamilton, lately from Montreal, was accidently drowned on Wednesday morning from the barge Rochester, when opposite New Baltimore. His property and effects are in the possession of C. S. Olmstead & Co., of Albany.

Three more gone. William Mason—Edward Stewart aged 89, and John Myers aged 90, all soldiers of the Revolution, and the last of the glorious band of Davie county, died on the 13th and 14th ult., in Davie county. N. C.

YANKEE INGENUITY IN ENGLAND.—Mackintosh, the celebrated India rubber manufacturer, took the contract for raising the Great Britain steamer, after the most skilful English Engineers had abandoned the work. Mackintosh was born and educated in America, and will doubtless succeed in performing this great undertaking.

The Scientific American says there are two shoemakers living on one street in Pittsburg, whose names are Gschwind and Ochse. It is said to be difficult to pronounce the latter name without sneezing.

JOHN SMITH.—There are in the city of New York 101 persons bearing the name that heads this article, pursuing 55 different trades and professions.

SUICIDE PREVENTED.—Father Taylor related an anecdote of a man who met another on London Bridge, in the night. "What are you here for, at this late and gloomy hour?" "Why, I am so poor and distressed for a morsel of bread to eat and for a starving family, that I determined to come here and destroy myself." "Well," said the interogator, "I am here for the same purpose, but for a directly oppsite cause. I have so much wealth, so many cares and perplexities in taking care of it, that I wish to be delivered from my troubles of this world. And now I will give you a check, that I may be relieved a little." He signed the check, and a great burden was off his mind—he signed another, and another, and finally he was so relieved, that he concluded to live—and the other man came to the same conclusion. Such is the opperation of relieving and being relieved.

DEAR BR. BASSETT: It is now a little better than four weeks since I left home, for the labors of the District. My health improves, in the midst of my toils, and I hope to be able, still to travel on, and perform a reasonable share of work among my brethren. I cant well be idle—much of my happiness, grows out of doing what I can, for the church of my choice, and for the honor of my blessed Saviour. Br. J. Clarke, Ill. we regret that your order for 3 or 400 pamphlets, did not come a few days sooner. We had shipped a box to Cincinnati, to supply the Ohio and Indiana Districts. POSTAGE ON THE REGISTER.—The postage on this pamphlet any distance, is 2½ cents. Individuals at remote points having no other means of obtaining parcels but by mail, may be deterred from ordering them, on account of this expence. We have therefore concluded to divide this expense with those who have postage to pay upon pamphlets, and who will send us the pay with the order. For example, Br. B. C. Johnson, of Illinois, has sent us $2 which pays for four dozen copies. But we have sent him five dozen for this amount. Br. Wm. Tipton, of Maumee Mission, has paid us $1, for two dozen copies, but we have sent him 30 copies for this sum. We will deal with any other brethren who may see proper to order copies, at the same rate.

NEW SERIES

OF THE

Congressional Globe and Appendix.

CONGRESS at it its last session, through the Joint Library Committee of the two Houses, having authorized a large subscription for the Congressional Globe and Appendix; and the Senate, by resolution, having directed the mode of preparing the reports of the proceedings, and authorized the Secretary of the Senate to contract with the undersigned, stipulating that the reports when written out shall be subject to the revision of the speakers, the Congressional Globe and Appendix is now offered to the public, not only as an authentic, but as an official report of the proceedings of Congress, made under the eye, and published by authority of the body.

The undersigned originated the mode of journalizing the proceedings of Congress, which, thus adopted, is to be perfected with the aid and under the supervision of Congress. Their publication was the first and only one that gave each successive step in every measure in both branches of Congress; a brief of all the debates; every important vote; and an Appendix, including at full length all the revised speeches delivered during the session.

The work, as it is now to be conducted by them, will be found a most perfect political history. The Senators from the States and the Representatives from every section of the Union bring with them into Congress a knowledge of the feelings, sentiments, and interests of their several constituencies. Public opinion and the public information as it exists among those they represent, are embodied by them; and in the crucible of Congress the wisdom of our times is brought to its test, and is there concentrated, in directing the political movements of the whole country. The impulses thus given through Congress from every quarter react upon the nation as a whole, and all its component parts are made to move in co-operation. The press cannot be more usefully employed than in condensing and again spreading abroad the intelligence of our free country, tending to such happy results through our almost miraculously adjusted State and National institutions.

Having identified ourselves with the plan of advancing the usefulness of Congress by publishing full and impartial reports, and having a large share of the Congressional Globe and Appendix, issued during the last twelve years, which would be impaired in value to us and utility to the public if the work were discontinued, we have a double motive to prompt us to extend it through a new series. We are resolved, if possible, to give it permanence, and hand it down to successors as a standard work worthy of being maintained and improved. We shall enter upon our new undertaking without being distracted or burdened by any associate labors of the press; and thus unencumbered, shall hope to make the new series a step in advance of the former in all points of execution. With a view to accomplish this, we shall be (one or the other) in attendance on Congress.

The reports will not be affected by our party bias. We believe every member of Congress will bear witness that our reports are full and fair.

The Congressional Globe is made up of the daily proceedings of the two Houses of Congress, and printed on superfine double royal paper, with small type, (brevier and nonpareil,) in quarto form, each number containing sixteen royal quarto pages. The speeches of the members in this first form are condensed—the full report of the prepared speeches being reserved for the Appendix. All resolutions, motions, and other proceedings, are given in the form of the Journals, with the yeas and nays on every important question.

The Appendix is made up of the President's Annual Message, the reports of the principal officers of the Government that accompany it, and all speeches of members of Congress, written out or revised by themselves. It is printed in the same form as the Congressional Globe, and usually makes about the same number of pages during a session.

During the first month or six weeks of a session, there is rarely more business done than will make two numbers a week—one of the Congressional Globe and one of the Appendix; but during the remainder of a session, there is usually sufficient matter for two or three numbers of each every week. The next session will be unusually interesting; therefore, we calculate that the Congressional Globe and Appendix together will make near 1500 large quarto pages, printed in small type—brevier and nonpareil. We furnish complete Indexes to both at the end of a session.

We have on hand the Congressional Globe and Appendix for the last fifteen sessions of Congress, making together fifteen large royal quarto volumes, which we will sell unbound, for $41; or bound with Russia backs and corners for $56. Those who want the back volumes should apply for them immediately, as they are in demand. Congress subscribed for 341 complete sets during the two last sessions. The proceedings of Congress for the last nine years cannot be procured from any other source—Gales & Seaton having stopped printing their Register of Debates in 1837.

We will endeavor to print a sufficient number of surplus copies to supply all that may be miscarried, or lost in the mails; but subscribers should be very particular to file their papers carefully, for fear that we should not be able to supply all lost numbers.

TERMS.

For one copy of the Congressional Globe,	$1 00
For one copy of the Appendix,	1 00
For six copies of either, or part of both,	5 00

The money may be remitted by mail at our risk. The safest and best way to remit is, to pay the amount to the Postmaster where you reside, and take from him a receipt.

Our prices for these papers are so low that we cannot afford to credit them out; therefore, no person need consume his time in writing for them unless he sends the money.

POETRY.

From an English Paper.

THE SONG OF THE SWORD.

Weary, and wounded, and worn,—
Wounddd and ready to die,
A soldier they left, all alone and forlorn,
On the field of battle to lie.
The dead and dying alone
Could their presence and pity afford;
Whilst with a sad and terrible tone,
He sang the Song of the Sword.

Fight! fight! fight!
Though a thousand fathers die;
Fight! fight! fight!
Though thousands of children cry;
Fight! fight! fight!
Whilst mothers and wives lament;
And fight! fight! fight!
Whilst millions of money are spent.

Fight! fight! fight!
Should the cause be foul or fair;
Though all that's gained is an empty name
And a tax too great to bear;
An empty name and a paltry fame,
And thousands lying dead;
Whilst every glorious victory
Must raise the price of bread.

War! war! war!
Fire, and famine, and sword,
Desolate fields and desolate towns,
And thousands scattered abroad
With never a home and never a shed,
Whilst kingdoms perish and fall,
And hundreds of thousands are lying dead,
And all—for nothing at all.
Ah! why should such mortals as I
Kill those whom we never could hate!
'Tis oboy your commander or die,—
'Tis the law of the Sword and the State
For we are the veriest slaves
That ever had their birth;
For to please the whim of a tyrant's will
Is all our use upon earth.

War! war! war!
Musket, and powder, and ball:
Ah! what do we fight so for?
Ah! why have we battles at all?
'Tis justice must be done, they say;
The nation's honor to keep:
Alas! that justice is so dear
And human life so cheap!
'Tis sad that a Christian land—
A professedly Christian State,
Should thus despise that high command—
So useful and so great—
Delivered by Christ himself on earth,
Our constant guide to be:
To "love our neighbors as ourselves,
And bless our enemy."

War! war! war!
Misery, murder, and crime,"
Are all these blessings I've seen in thee
From my youth to the present time;
Misery, murder, and crime,
Crime, misery, murder, and woe;
Ah! would I had known in my younger days,
In my hours of boyish glee,
A tenth of its misery;
I now had been joining a happy band
Of wife and children dear,
And I had died in my native land,
Instead of dying here.

Weary, and wounded, and worn,—
Wounded, and ready to die,
A soldier they left, all alone and forlorn,
On the field of battle to lie:
The dead and the dying alone
Could their presence and pity afford,
Whilst thus, with a sad and terrible tone,
(Oh! would that these truths were more perfectly known)
He sang theSong of the Sword.

Humanity and Divinity of Jesus Christ.

No. 5.

Mr. Editor: I attempted in my last, to show that the sufferings of the Lord Jesus, were vicarious; and to answer some objections, and to render some reasons why it was necessary that the Deity should dwell in the man Christ Jesus. Though that which follows would, probably, have answered, as valuable a purpose, to have preceded the last, as in the present position, I will endeavor to present a few reasons, why, in the redemption of sinners, it was necessary that Jesus Christ should be a man, as well as a Divine Being. Though, I will first observe, that it is indispensibly needful, that we recollect that the Divine nature of the Lord Jesus, was in no way, whatever, humanized; neither was his humanity before, or after his sufferings death, resurrection, or ascension, changed into Divinity. Jesus Christ however, in his human nature, in consequence of its connection with his Divinity, is so highly exalted, that, the oracles of God, in demanding the confidence and adoration of our hearts, make no distinction between the Divinity and Humanity of the Lord Jesus Christ. The apostle says. "And again, when he bringeth in the first begotten into the world, he saith, And let the angels of God worship him." Heb. I. 6. The wise men from the east, "When they were come into the house, they saw the young child with Mary his mother, and fell down and worshipped him." Matt. II. 11. Time would fail to enumerate those passages of scripture, that go to show that the Lord Jesus, in this world, was again and again adored by men; and, in no instance, did he admonish them not to worship him, as they then beheld him. The idea, however, that the humanity of the Saviour is changed into Divinity, is not supported by the scriptures, for the apostle John says. But we know that, when he shall appear, we shall be like him, for we shall see him as he is." I. John, III. 2. The Bible no where represents that the saints shall be changed into Divinities which would be the case, if the humanity of Jesus Christ is changed into Divinity, and we are made, in the resurrection, like him. The word of the Lord, notwithstanding, uniformly represents that the bodies of the saints shall be like the resurrected body of the Saviour; and he said that he had, after his resurrection "flesh and bones." Hence, the bodies of the saints, will still have "flesh and bones;" and since the body of the Lord Jesus, after his resurrection, had "flesh and bones," and the Deity is a spirit his body is not changed into Divinity. And we have no evidence from scripture that his soul is changed, in any other way, than its high state of exaltation from a previous state of deep humiliation. If it could be made to appear dearly, that the humanity of the Saviour was really changed into Divinity, it would deprive us of the high pleasure of having "an elder brother"—a kinsman, as our intercessor on the throne of God, But why spend any more time, the supposition is preposterous—impossible a change of this character should take place. To proceed; I would say, Adam was constituted our representative, in the garden of Eden, and when he fell, we all, of necessity, fell with him, so that we lost that moral rectitude we enjoyed previous to the fall. Our Lord and Saviour, is, by the same high authority, constituted our second Adam, or representative. Adam was a man, and manhood had sinned; and the denunciation was against man; hence, it became him, Jesus, "to be made like unto his brethren, that he might be a merciful and faithful high priest in things pertaining to God, to make reconciliation for the sins of the people; for in that he himself hath suffered, being tempted, he is able to succor them that are tempted." Heb II. 17. 18. The law, under which man had been placed, had been violated, and its demand was against man alone. Angels were not, nor any other intelligent creatures, under this law, as it respects the particular prohibition; "thou shalt" not eat, &c. hence, the law, unless its claims were transferred, could have demands, upon no others than those who had violated its precepts; and, since there were no reasons, as far as I can discover, why the claims of the law should be removed from the delinquents, and arbitarily fixed upon the innocent; which, would be gross injustice, its claims must have still been against Adam and his posterity; or, against manhood in the general. Hence, the necessity of the Lord Jesus being "made of a woman, made under the law, to redeem them that were under the law, that we might receive the adoption of sons." Gal IV. 4. 5. From the foregoing, we have grounds to adore the great author of the plan of salvation. The highest wisdom is displayed in its adaptation to the condition of man. None but the Deity could have devised, or carried it into successful operation. But notwithstanding we have attempted to show that the Divinity of the Lord Jesus, is truly God, we do not, as our opponents affirm, hold that there are three Gods. We believe in only one God. It is impossible, as already stated, that there can be more than one. The manner of the Divine existence we know nothing about. Though, in the one God, there are Father, Son or Word, and Holy Ghost; how these three are but one God, we cannot tell. The fact is a matter of revelation alone; and this fact we believe, because God has communicated it to us. If any raise objections to this, because it cannot be defined, they may, with equal good reason, object to the union between their own souls and bodies, to the operations of their mental and physical powers, to their own existence, and, in short, if they will only believe in that which they can comprehend, they must, at once, deny the existence of all spiritual beings; and then, at another sweep, reject the existence of the whole material universe for no man can define, either of what spirit or matter consists. True, he may inform us of the attributes of both matter and spirit; but we do not enquire for the attributes of either; but, what is the essence of spirit—of what does matter consist? The man who attempts to give an answer, will find himself just as much in the dark, as if he were to attempt to define the manner in which the Father, Word, and Holy Ghost are but one God.

"HORSEOLOGY."

Mr. Editor.—The undersigned, about four years ago, proffered their services to Rev. G. Brown, to give him any information in their possession, at any time he might ask it, relative to "horseology." To their note, an answer was written, and the correspondence was abruptly closed. But as it has been recently published, accompanied with two editorials, one of which calls on us for further information, we politely respond to the call, at the earliest moment, having only received the paper yesterday, owing to some unaccountable delay in the mails.

You, Mr. Editor, like our Rev. Br. Brown, appear to have misapprehended our design, and misinterpreted our language. The whole matter depends upon these two things, our design, and our phraseology.

With regard to the design, it was simply to proffer our friendly services, to give private information concerning any old, foundered horses, which the president might have left on any part of his district. This course we thought would supercede advertising in the Recorder for such information; a thing which we much desired to see avoided, for several reasons, but particularly because some unlearned persons might suppose, that sick horses were a subject of presidential duties. Another reason was, that our sympathies were very much aroused, for a good brother, when we saw, that nothing short of a grave publication, in a religious periodical, would elicit sufficient interest in his cause, to afford him a word of information concerning a poor foundered and afflicted horse; and that too, many weeks after the poor fellow was dead & gone. Now, Mr. Editor, would you not have sympathised in such a case? Was it not natural for us to sympathise? Who would not have sympathised? Even our friends Burns and Dorsey did sympathise, though they neither were members, nor constituents of the committee.

"Have pity on me, oh my friends!!!"

As for our phraseology, we must say, that we used the word horseology, not in opposition to Theology but to Craniology and Mesmerology, and all the ologies, which were so popular at that time. But our precise meaning, Mr. Editor, must be sought for by reference to the context, as you preachers say. The context, you will perceive, is, "Your poor Jack has gone to Davy Jones's locker."—"He died two days after you saw him."—"The sorrel and the roan both, since, dead." Then in the next sentence occurs this Anglo-Greek word, horseology. Is it not manifest, then, by the context, that it means something about dead horses themselves, and nothing more?

Our friend says, "Horseology.—This includes all about a horse, I take it, pay and all."—"I owe for that dead horse."—

["——— —— —— —— —— —— Aye, there 's the rub."] "Thank you, friends, for the proffer—it is help in time of need."—"Now about $5 each will be very important to me. Br. Burns and Br. Dorsey, though not of the dead horse committee, no doubt have their hearts deeply enlisted in this matter; if so $5 between the two will be enough for them. I don't want to be hard with my friends," [But—

"A horse! a horse! My kingdom for a horse!!"]

We cannot but admire the logic of our correspondent, in the above quotations. We proposed to give "any word" of information on horseology, which might have been desirable. This is the premises. The inference is, that we are to give $5 each. Is not this a clear inference? For, does not "a word" mean $5? Or, is not $5 logically inferable from a word? This, however, is not the best of our Brother's logic; for he infers that we must have had constituents;—and that there were just two of them; and then, by a beautiful metonomy, slides into the conclusion, that they are responsible for $2,50 of each. Surely all this is as clear as demonstration.

We fancy we see our logician, in the midst of these lofty flights of logic, hovering in imagination over the dead carcass of his old horse, stretching the powers of his ratiocination, to devise the ways and means of "raising the wind;" and after he has descended from this lofty height, being astonished at the force of his own genius, and fearing that he has overwhelmed his friends, by the powerful appeal he has made to their pockets, he exclaimed,

"Good friends! sweet friends! Let me not stir you up To any sudden flood of" charity.

In addition to the logical deduction of our friend, we admire the precedent he has set for others, to take advantage of the sympathies of friends, who offer their condolence on the death of superannuated horses. Let it once be established, that a proposal to give a word of information concerning a dead horse, means to give $5 toward paying for him; and any one can see the great advantages which would follow.—Itinerant preachers would buy horses, without paying for them; and founder them, or ride, or drive them to death, without fear of consequences; and then publish their obituaries, to call forth public sympathy for their owners. Such a precedent we should like to see established. And our friend evidently contemplates something of the kind: for he says,—"Such a committee should be strong in numbers, talent, and cash, as they may often have important cases submitted to their action."

In conclusion, had we contributed ever so much, on this case, it would be improper for us to give the fact any notoriety; because it would be immodest and unchristian, to "sound a trumpet before" us, or let our right hand know what our left hand doeth.

With respetful consideration for all concerned,
We are, &c. M. M. LAUGHLIN.

THE QUESTION OF SLAVERY AGAIN.

Mr. Editor: Permit me to review an argument made against my communication of Sept. 3rd by Br. Collier. I presume he thinks the doctrine taught in that communication, could not be let pass without giving it a blow. Now, Mr. Editor, I do not wish to enter upon the field for the discussion of the slave question; and much less was my former article written to draw out a discussion upon that troublesome subject. But my good friend has seen fit to take me up on two points, and expose them by his lucid arguments, no doubt he thinks to the satisfaction of many. My position was this: "I wished to beg leave to differ with many who are of the opinion, that the slave while in the hands of a religious master, and well treated is a sin against God." I still maintain my former position, which I think contains plain and unquestionable facts; easily to be seen by those possessing the least capacity of discernment, when the contrast is drawn between the slave possessing a religious master, and the one possessing a wicked master. But our friend if I understand him rightly, makes it a sinful relation let the slave be in the hands of whom he may, and ever so well treated. Now to talk about the slave being stripped of all his rights, and reduced to the level of the brute creation is a mere farce, for if we would but take a cursory view of the slave who has a religious master, we would see that he is privilidged far above the one in the hands of the wicked. For while the former lives and is clothed well, and allowed to blow around the family altar; and a measurable amount of the immunities of the church are enjoyed by them. Now can he under these circumstances enjoy religion and get to heaven? I think so. But our friend seems to possess great discriminative powers, so as to let us know when a man is not innocent in this matter. When enlightened upon the subject, and will not liberate his slave or slaves. The great desideratum with our friend is, he must be the judge when circumstances make it sinful or not sinful, for he has given us two instances in which a man cannot be innocent, and another when if he will use his legal influence for the emancipation of his slave or slaves; where legislative disabilities prevent him in his own words. (I cannot condemn.) I now ask, where is that part of the world where slavery exists; that legislative power does not interfere, in giving the slaves the same rights that we possess;* much less when we question the word of God upon this point, though I dont wish to go into a citation of passages of scripture at this time, but suffice it to say, "servants be subject to your masters, with all fear, not only to the good and gentle; but also to the froward:" But how often do we find it the case, as even in reference to the above passage, among many that which does not just suit them, or look reasonable in the blessed word of God, they are ready to reject or bend it to their own notion. May God forbid that ever I should judge my fellow man of things as being sinful when not revealed as such in his word. I shall here present the latter condition of the slave. Turn your attention to those in the hands of hard taskmasters, on those sugar and cotton farms in the west and south, we would at once see a mighty contrast. There the slave is partly starved and almost destitute of comfortable clothing, afflicted, oppressed, and prohibited from any religious privileges in families, or churches. I dont say, but under these circumstances it is sinful, and with the Apostle in saying, ye masters forbear threatning; knowing that ye also have a master in heaven. Though our friend would have us to believe the slave is dispossessed of every attribute of man, and stripped of all his rights and reduced to to the level of the brute creation. Now how passing strange is it, that a man with eyes wide open, would represent the slave in such a condition as that. Now it is far from being the fact in the latter case described of the slave, and much less of the former. Again "he thinks the slave may be treated well as a slave, but not as a man." To treat him otherwise than described by the religious man, would be inveighing against the laws that be. But according to our friend's own assertion the desideratum is just to use legal influence, or in other words just give an expression against the system; even where legislative disabilities hinder those from liberating their slaves. I cannot condemn. "Your correspondent thinks that the meddling with it, does it more harm than it does good." Perhaps agitation is the legal influence to which the brother wishes to stir up the friends of the slave. Now let me here say that the way that the subject has been carried on, has done an injury to the slave. And on that account discourages many who will fall out by the wayside and everlastingly perish. If this is God's plan, I suppose our friend is heartily engaged in it. But I think he will have to use soft words, and stronger arguments than he has made against my communication, before the desirable thing is accomplished by such agitation, i. e. churches and state divided. Perhaps I would hazard nothing in saying that it is those good, slaveholders or moderate drinkers of the system who Live by their example and influence the greatest support to slavery. No slaveholder nor moderate drinker of the system as you suppose, any further than the word of God teaches. I am an anti slave man, opposed to ultraism, and inconsistency.

Yours in peace, in church and state.

Extract of a Letter to the Editor.

Mt. Vernon, O., Nov. 24, 1846.

I am greatly pleased in perusing those pieces containing the doings of the World's Convention or Evangelical Alliance.

I have been anxious to see in the Recorder something from the people of Cincinnati as a reply to the address made them by the friends and brethren of Exeter in Great Britain. Will they not reply or have they replied ere this. The idea of war is dreadful: but when realized it is beyond expression.

I should be glad to see the Recorder abound still more and more in terms strongly disapproving the practice of war. Should any be found ultra enough to go for non resistance, I think they would be in company with the spirit of the gospel and doctrine of Christ.

If we would labor as hard to settle difficulties without war as we do by war; I think many lives might be saved. The money required to support war, probably would settle the difference. But this would be too humiliating, say thousands. They seem to forget that "better is he that ruleth his spirit, than he that taketh a city." The example of Abraham toward Lot is in my opinion well worthy our consideration and imitation, viz. "if thou wilt go to the right, then will I go the left and vice versa."

Perhaps I would not be doing too much in the way of praise, to say that I am much pleased with the Recorder. I meet it as a welcome guest.

MISCELLANY.

FICTITIOUS WRITINGS.

Novel reading is so popular, that one runs the risk of being branded as a bigot if he ventures to speak disapprovingly of the practice. Nothing can be more unjust, for every body knows, or ought to know, that one may speak his honest convictions on this subject, and be as free from bigotry as he can in speaking on any existing evil, which every reflecting mind is convinced is exceedingly pernicious. But this shows the great extent, and insidious nature of the evil of which we speak. The public mind drinks at the fountain of the fictitious, and we may say, licentious press, and seems to be insensible of the intellectual, and moral poison with which every cup is filled. Alcholic beverages were not more common when "every body drank," than is the use of the stream which issues from this fountain. And the effect of the latter is quite as pernicious to the intellectual nature, as the effect of the former is to the physical. Yet the multitude drink, and drink to intoxication. Not only those who seek their enjoyments from "all that is in the world, the lust of the flesh, and the lust of the eyes, and the pride of life," but also those who profess to be governed by the truth as it is in Jesus, and the realities of the unseen world, are drawn into this snare of the devil.

"I hope you don't spend much of your time, in reading such works as this," said one to a young lady, as he laid down a very objectionable work which he had taken up from her table.

"Why, what harm is there in it? You don't suppose that I will occupy all my leisure moments in pouring over religious books, when such good, pious people as Mr. F's. family are, set me the example of reading such works as this; for Mrs. F.,—who is very religious—has been reading it with much interest, as she informed me; and, by the way, I borrowed it of her; and she says her husband furnishes her with as many such books as she can get time to read; and you know she has a good deal of leisure."

Now a fact like this may look strange in print. But hundreds of such facts might be printed without any fictitious coloring. It is a painful fact, but none the less true.

If these pernicious writings could be found only in books, the evil would not be so great as it is. But all the cheap papers are filled with them. You can scarcely take up a paper whose columns are not corrupted with tales which cannot be read without poisoning the mind.

But these writings are popular—fashionable; and you might as well be out of the world, as out of the fashion. Alas! you might as well be out of the world, as in such a ruinous fashion. You have in fact stepped out of the real world into the ideal and this transition unfits you for the realities of life. How unhappy, discontented, fictitious it makes you. What are you good for, but to be the sport of winds which blow nobody any good—of wild and wicked imaginings—of hopes deferred, which make the heart sick—actually the sport of the spirit that worketh wretchedness in the children of disobedience.

Throw away this mental poison—repent, reform—seek other food for the immortal mind. Come back into the real world, look at things as they are and not as if you had something else to do than to dream away your mortal existence, and finally lose your soul. You might as well turn papist at once, go to Rome to kiss the great toe of the pope, and count your beads and make the best arrangements you can for an insurance of priests' intercessions for your delivery from purgatory, after your mortal career is ended.

The temptation to the evil in question has its seat in the nature which must be crucified before we can have a proper sense of the serious realities of our existing relations, and accountability. The evil one, understanding the propensities of this nature better than those who possess it, and how it may be nourished and kept in vigorous action artfully avails himself of the book, and then of the newspaper press to supply sentiment for it. It is one of his most subtle wiles—most successful stratagems. The newspaper press is the dish on which he secures his fatal bait, because it is in common use. Thus multitudes are deceived and ruined. What shall be done? Shall the evil continue? Is it not time for those who have some just cause of it to rally their combined influence to remedy the evil. Let that portion of the newspress which has kept itself free from the contamination speak in a decided manner.—There is moral principle enough in the community to rectify the perverted public sentiment respecting this evil. The current of popular reading can be turned into the right channel. Let such as desire it use their influence.

But, says an objector, would you make no distinction in fictitious writing?—are not some of them useful? Our reply is, the distinction will take care of itself. And there need be no difficulty in deciding as to what is useful. There is a great work to do, before any danger of going to far can claim attention.

The recent "tragedy at Richmond," which was a consequence, (as is admitted by even the friends of the parties,) of the kind of reading condemned in this article, we are gratified to see has caused the utterance of some just sentiments on this subject. We hope a regular and determined warfare against the licentious writings with which the community is flooded will be prosecuted until the evil shall be removed, and the press purified from the pernicious trash which it now sends forth. —Anti-papist.

Anecdote of the Twin Sisters. We know of a farmer in Connecticut who has a pair of twin daughters, of whom a capital anecdote is told.—They both attend the same school, and not long since one of them was called up by the master to recite a lesson in geography, which she had learned very imperfectly, and in fact could not go on at all. The teacher who was getting quite out of patience, was called to another part of room, and just at that moment the twin sister sprang on the floor unobserved, and pushed the delinquent scholar to her seat took her place. The master proceeded with the questions, which were answered with a degree of promptness and accuracy which, at the close, drew forth from him a few words of commendation. The joke was not discovered by the teacher until some days after. Of course it was too good and successful to occasion any offence.

Peculiar Temptations.

Favor and beauty are qualifications which expose females to peculiar temptations, especially the younger class. Personal beauty is a dangerous gift; inasmuch as to those who possess it, it often becomes a temptation and a snare. How often do we witness the possessor of a beautiful person, becoming the victim of a vanity which destroys all moral beauty, "leaving the unhappy females like a fair temple, from which the divinity has forever departed." Such persons seem to have forgotten that beauty is the gift of God, and consequently can never lay the foundation of praise; for it is confered without solicitation, and never won by personal merit. It can never reform the heart, cultivate the understanding, or fix the affections upon objects worthy of an immortal soul. A beautiful countenance may conceal the most inordinate selfishness and vanity, and it becomes at once fruitless and vain; in securing the respect of those whose opinions are worth any thing. When sensible men find, under a beautiful mask, ignorance cold-hearted selfishness, and impurity of feeling, though they may "flutter awhile in the sunshine of beauty, they will beware how they are scorched in the blaze."

Favor is deceitful; that is, the favor which results from natural gifts, from comparative kindness and quietness of disposition; and the favor with which females are regarded in society, is no test of real character, but one calculated to deceive and mislead. The perfection of female character is personal piety. "A woman that feareth the Lord, she shall be praised." Beauty is the gift of God, and is not to be undervalued or despised, for he is glorified in the perfection of the human countenance. "The heavens declare the glory of God, and the firmament showeth his handy work," "and every tree that lifts its foliage towards heaven, and every flower that spreads its blushing beauties to the sun, pronounce his praise. But how much more excellent is the form of man created in God's image, fearfully and wonderfully made, a little lower than the angels." The temple in which you act, then, is God's temple; beautify and adorn it, therefore, "with well ordered lives and conversation." Seek to please, but never desire to be praised; strive to excel, but let your excellence be adorned with humility. So manage your earthly tabarnacle, in which your better part dwells, as to command respect from all your acquaintainces; and when this is done, see to it, that you lose not what you have gained by manifesting a spirit of self esteem. Walk softly and circumspectly, and the virtuous will always be your attendants; in such society, you need not fear, and the prowling libertine will never dare to step his foot in the pure path which you tread. Give heed, then; your safety depends upon the adoption of the most uncompromising principles of virtue.

The difficulties that you have to contend with, are common to all of your sex and time of life.—There are few who have not mourned over the deceitfulness of man. Who has not seen the sparkling eye, the winning smile, the tender sympathy of man reversed to cold and icy formality? Who has not felt the finest sensibilities of the soul go out towards an object apparently worthy of confidence, and felt a conciousness of purity of motive, and finally received a chilling rebuff that seemed to dry up the very fountains of the soul? This is a life of trial, of disappointment, of hopes, of fears, of joys, of sorrows; and therefore, we must look to a source beyond these transient scenes, if we would find a resting place. If every path were strewed with flowers, and no thorns were to be found, we should not know which to follow. God has thrown us into circumstances of trial and temptation, to teach us that there is but one path which we should follow, and this is the path that leads unto eternal life.

BAD HABITS.

Have you any bad habits conquer them. It is hard, we know, but it will be harder still to grow prematurely old—to suffer in body and mind, and perhaps kill yourself by degrees. Thousands have within a few years past overcome the power of temptation to drink ardent spirits. It was like cutting off the right hand, but they persevered and conquered it. For worlds you could not induce them to return to their old habits.

Have you no bad habits to conquer? Do you smoke or chew tobacco? Break the chain at once. From this time resolve never to puff a segar or chew a cud of tobacco. It is a bad habit and is offensive to many—especially to women.

Do you use profane language? You have no excuse for this. You hanker not after wicked words, and you feel no satisfaction after you have used them. If there is one sin, that calls loudly for reform, it is this. Think, young man, think before you speak, and never give utterance to a word that will pain a Christian heart.

Do you make use of indelicate words? Nothing is more offensive to the ear of modesty, or disgusting to refined society. Reflect on the injury you do yourselves, when you give currency to foul language. No one respects a person who is habitually guilty of indelicate expressions or impure allusion

Whatever your habits are that are really bad, have strength and courage to conquer them. Let your voice and your example whatever you are, speak for virtue and truth. Let your influence be ever exerted for the best good of others. This cannot be done unless you reform your habits and bad propensity. The following translation from an Italian author is appropriate and beautiful:

"Crown his brow with laurel wreath,
Who can tread the fields of death—
Tread with armed thousands near—
And know not what it is to fear,
But greater far his need of praise,
Justor has claim to glory's page,
Who, true to reason's voice, to virtue's call,
Conquers himself—the noblest deed of all."

For the Boys.—Seven classes of company to be avoided.

1. Those who ridicule their parents or disobey their commands.
2. Those who profane the Sabbath or scoff at religion.
3. Those who use profane or filthy language.
4. Those who are unfaithful, play truant, and waste their time in idleness.
5. Those that are of a quarrelsome temper and are apt to get into difficulty with others.
6. Those who are addicted to lying and stealing.
7. Those who are of a cruel disposition; who take pleasure in torturing and maiming animals and insects, robbing birds of their young, &c.

All these classes of companions are to be avoided; for if you associate with them, they will soon make you like themselves.

Under all circumstances there is but one honest cousc; and that is, to do right and trust the consequences to Divine Providence. "Duties are ours—events are God's." Policy, with all her cunning, can devise no rule so safe, salutary and effective, as this simple maxim.

From the Halifax Recorder of the 14th, we learn that at St. Pierre, N. F., from 30 to 40 houses were laid in ruins, and 10 persons seriously injured by the explosion of a powder magazine, occasioned by the villain who intended to destroy the town, and in attempting it, he killed himself.

Notes on Zanesville and Putnam Ohio

Mr. Editor—Zanesville and Putnam are among the oldest towns in our State, and I have thought that some facts in their history, and particularly in relation to their churches and schools might be interesting to some of your readers.

These towns, or villages I should say, for in yankee phrase a town is a township; these villages, are located by the side of each other on the Muskingum River, which is the largest in the State, seventy-six miles above its junction with the Ohio, in what is now Muskingum county, of which Zanesville is the seat of justice. As the river descends from the north, it makes a short bend westward. At the western angle of this turn it receives the tribute of Licking River.—This bonding of the river forms a beautiful tract of land between it and the hills on the east.—Here sets the peaceful City of Zanesville, not yet 50 years old, yet assuming something of the dignity of age. She fills up this nook of the wide world; and if every nook and corner was as well filled as this, the number of the world's inhabitants would far exceed eight hundred millions; yet we have room for a few thousand more without disturbing the quiet of the surrounding hills. The river, having received the Licking waters, runs eastwardly for a half mile to regain its original course. This forms a handsome bottom land on the south side; a fine place for another villiage, and sure enough, there sets Putnam in her New England dress, with her in lot houses, white and clean, with surrounding shrubbery and testeful gravel walks.

Zanesville is two years older than Putnam, and was founded in the year 1799 by Jonathan Zane and John McIntyre; two bold pioneers of the west. The following historical paragraph I have copied from an authentic map of Zanesville and Muskingum county published by Wyllys Buel in 1833.

"In 1796, Congress by law authorized Ebenezer Zane to open a bridle track from Wheeling to Maysville, Ky., for which service he was to receive three sections of land; one where the trace should cross the Muskingum, and the other where it should cross the Hockhocking and Scioto. In the following year the trace was opened by Jonathan Zane and J. McIntyre, both of whom, in the early history of the West were celebrated woodsmen or hunters. For opening the trace they received of U. S. Zane the Section, in the South-east corner of which they laid out, in 1799, XIX squares of the town of Zanesville. The place had in a previous but unrecorded plat received the name Westbourne which it continued to bear until the first mail was carried through in 1797, when it received, from the then Post-master General, its present name. The first cabin on the town plat was built in 1799, although there were squatters in its neighborhood two or three years earlier."

This beginning was made in the North-western Territory; for the State of Ohio was not yet.—Zanesville now contains 6000 inhabitants.

Putnam was founded by the 'Spring-hill Company,' which consisted of Rufus Putnam, Increase Mathews, and Levi Whipple, and subsequent to their formation Ebenezer Buckingham was added to the firm. All of these have deceased except Doctor Mathews, who still resides in Putnam.—These were enterprising New England young men. They called themselves "The Spring-hill Company" from the high hill that rises boldly on the North west of their villiage, overhanging the river, out of which dashes a noble Spring of water. It is now called "Putnam Hill." This company purchased the land on this side of the river, at the Congress sales made at Marietta in 1801, and the same year laid out a villiage and called it Springfield. This name it retained until 1815, when it was exchanged for that of Putnam, in honor, I presume of one of its founders. The township in which it is situated still retains the name of Springfield. The Spring-hill Company as a nucleus around which gathered kindred spirits from New England and Marietta; hence the fact that Putnam is a New England town, though in the bosom of Ohio. Pennsylvanians, Dutch, and Irish, have rushed in and around, yet Putnam remains a yankee town in spite of the tide. You can't mix oil and water—the elements will not co-alesce. Zanesville received and retains its character from the western Pensylvanians and Virginians, a surefooted but clumsy race, slow to improve in mannars and matters of taste, lest they might be poisoned with "Yankee Notions." I shall be allowed to speak freely, as I happen to come of this race myself. But I am rather pleased with the thought that Ohio will yet be New-Englandized in many respects, but I desire that the faults of New England may be left out of the imprint. But to return; Putnam now contains about fifteen hundred inhabitants. I will now proceed to give you some account of the origin of the Presbyterian Churches here. In this matter Putnam has the honor of making the beginning. The better class of New England people carry with them, wherever they go, an inveterate notion of having a Church. Wherever they lay out a villiage they never forget the lot for a meeting house, and another for a school house. The consequences of this forethought will have a happy effect to the latest generation.

In the year 1806 or 7 (the precise time cannot now be ascertained) a Congregational Church was organized by a committee of three ministers recently from New-England; Rev. Samuel P. Robins, of Marietta; Rev. Timothy Harris, of Granville; and Rev.——Potter, from near Steubenville.—The meeting at which the organization took place was held in the house of Mr. Benjamin Tupper. The number of members of which the new church was composed cannot now be ascertained with accuracy, as it appears that no record of the transaction has been preserved; but the number could not exceed eight or ten. They held public worship from house to house, catching sermons as they could from traveling ministers. Among these wayfaring messengers was R. G. Wilson, D. D. then a young man from North Carolina.—In the year 1808, Mr. William Jones now the Rev. Pastor of the churches or Tarlton and Amanda, in the Presbytery of Columbus, a licentiate of the Presbytery of Ohio, was sent this way. The Presbytery of Ohio, was not in Ohio, as strangers might infer from the name; it was in Pensylvania, having Pittsburgh for its centre; and so called from the Ohio river; I presume. He came to Zanesville in November, and to use his own language "began to blow the gospel trumpet in the old wooden courthouse, a building of not much size or value, and continued the blast on the other side of the river," that is, in Putnam, or rather Springfield. Mr. Jones was employed for the term of three months to labor alternately in both villages. At the close of this period it was concluded to settle him as their pastor. No church was, as yet, formed in Zanesville. As Mr. Jones was a Presbyterian minister and his supporters in Zanesvill were Presbyterians, it was agreed to carry their wishes into effect according to Presbyterian order, or rather to speak more correctly, according to the plan of union adopted between Presbyterians and Congregationalists, in other parts, in 1801. Application was made to the then Presbytery of Lancaster for the organization of the Presbyterian Church in Zanesville. Their petition was granted, and the Rev. John Wright was sent to perform this duty, which he accomplished in the summer of 1809. Shortly after, Mr. Jones thinks in the same year, he was ordained to the whole work of the ministry, by the same Presbytery, and installed pastor of the united Church of Zanesville and Springfield. The session of the new church consisted of the two elders Messrs Benjamin Sloan and Johnston Thompson, with whom were associated Messrs. Levi Whipple and Ebenezer Buckingham "committee men." This new organization, according to the best of Mr. Jones' recollection, consisted of fourteen communicants. Mr. Jones continued his labors here until April 1812—three years and a half, when he removed to Circleville, Ohio. When he left the communicants exceeded thirty. The additions during his labors were chiefly from the Zanesville side.

In August 1812, Mr. James Culbertson, a licentiate of the Presbytery of Carlise came and commenced his labors. The church soon agreed to call him to the pastoral office, and accordingly he was ordained and installed in the following December, by the Presbytery of Lancaster. This pastoral relation continues to this day, a period of thirty-four years. At the time of Mr. Culbertson's instalation the church consisted of thirty-two communicants. He commenced preaching in the old courthouse in Zanesville and in Mr. Buckingham's dwelling in Putnam.

I will pause here for the present; but design sending more notes, if Providence permit.

Yours, as ever,

Zanesville.

NARRATIVE.

A WESTERN INCIDENT.

Interesting and True.

In 1817, twenty-nine years ago, three intelligent, enterprising young men, members of the congregation of which Dr. B., then in the vigor of life, was pastor, and sons of one of his deacons, left their native village in New England, and directed their footsteps to the far West. Providence led them to the prairies of Illinois. They located themselves about ten miles east of the city of St. Louis, near the bluffs of the far famed American bottom. The region which they chose for their home was comparatively a wilderness.—A few settlers, here and there, had erected the rough log cabin, and had begun to break the clods of the prairie. Schools and churches there were none; and every thing bore the marks of a country but just deserted by the uncultivated savage. The steamer had but just begun to plough the waters of the Mississippi; and the cities of Cincinnati and St. Louis, were then in the weakness of infancy. In the latter city, the devoted and faithful Giddings recently had recommenced his labors, which were so successful in the end, and which have immortalized his name there, as the founder of Presbyterianism if not of Protestantism.

These young men were induced to leave their homes and friends principally from the same motives which scatter the sons of New England all over the world; the spirit of enterprise—a desire to improve their temporal condition. But they carried with them a large portion of the spirit of their pilgrim fathers.

No sooner had they settled and commenced business, than they felt that they must have a place where they could engage in the worship of Jehovah. And the very next year, with some assistance from other settlers, they erected the first frame meeting house ever built in the State of Illinois.

But one of three brothers was then a professor of religion, yet each day did they call around the family alter the numerous workmen employed, read the scriptures of divine truth, and poured out their hearts in prayer to Him, upon whom they were dependent for all blessings temporal and spiritual. As soon as they had enclosed their house of worship, they established a Sabbath school, one of the first in the State; and also set in operation the common school. Both the Sabbath and common schools have been continued from that time to the present, and have uniformly been in a flourishing condition. Many individuals who have united with the Presbyterians, as well as with other churches, attribute their conversion to the influence of this Sabbath school, and there are mothers in the neighborhood whose whole education has been attained in the Sunday school established by these young men.

Five years after the three sons had been transplanted to the West, the father, then upwards of sixty years old, was induced by their request to break loose from the circle in which he had moved so long, in order that he might aid his energetic sons in carrying forward the good work which they had commenced. It was a sad day to the devoted pastor, when his church, determined with the remainder of his large family to follow his sons to the West. The West! What was then the West? It was scarcely known, except as a howling wilderness. Ministers and churches at the East then felt less interest in it than they do now in Oregon and California, and it was considered so distant and difficult of access, that it was thought those who emigrated thither would never return.

The day arrived when the deacon and his family were to set out on their long journey, and bid, as they supposed, a final adieu to all behind. Some of their friends, among whom was Dr. B., met to bid them a last farewell. He felt almost as sad as though he were called to follow so many of his parishioners to the grave. He wept, and they all wept. They were going, he said, on a "wild goose chase;" for such he regarded the emigration of both sons and father. Little did he think at that time of the intense interest he was in later years to feel in the destiny of the mighty West. Little did he think that he himself, with his whole family, was one day to follow in the "chase;" he to be a President of a theological seminary; and that five of his sons, then but boys, were to be scattered in different States in the great valley, as heralds of the cross, one of whom was to be President of a college, of which this good deacon and family were to be among the earliest friends and most liberal patrons, and that his son at the college, and he at the seminary, should educate a young man who was to become the pastor of a church founded principally by this family, who in 1817 started on the goose chase. But such were the facts. In 1822, the father and family joined the three sons in Illinois. The next year a church of 11 members was formed, seven of whom belonged to this family. They had no regular preaching till 1828, yet the Sabbath school and worship were mantained on every Sabbath. When a preacher could be had of any evangelical denomination, they gladly listened to the word; when none was present, a sermon was read, or a prayer meeting was held.—From 1828, to 1840, they enjoyed regular preaching half the time, being aided part of the time by A. H. M. Society. In 1840, they settled a pastor who has ever since supplied them every Sabbath with the bread of life, and whom they have sustained without assistance. This church has been blessed with frequent revivals of religion. The whole number received into the church since its formation is 200; on profession 162; on certificate 38. The present number of communicants is about 100. The church enjoys general prosperity and encouraging prospects. It owns, unembarrassed by debt, a neat and commodious church building, erected in 1843— a small session house, and a pleasent and convenient parsonage, with four acres of ground attached; and a contribution is taken up every alternate month for some of the benevolent societies of the day, varying from $5 to $60, at a time. All this the deacon, now in his 86th year, has lived to see, though three of his noble sons, a lovely daughter and the cherished companion of half a century have dropped into the grave.—And he now sees around him a rural village composed of neat white habitations, resembling much a New England village both in its appearance and inhabitants, undisturbed by intemperance or its victims; a school cherished with the warmest care, flourishing, and circulating intelligence among the young; and all around presenting the appearance of a prosperous, an orderly and happy community.

A number of young men belonging to the church, are now in college or fitting for college, among whom is a grandson of the old deacon, a son of the lamented Giddings, above alluded to as the first Protestant pastor in St. Louis. These are some of the results of the wild goose chase.

But the history will not be complete without a notice of the distillery that was. When the deacon and his sons first settled in the West, the temperance movement had not yet commenced in our country. Making and vending ardent spirits was considered as lawful a business as selling beef and flour. And strange as it may appear, the good deacon and his sons, after they had set the church and Sabbath school in operation, erected at a great expense a large distillery; and for several years carried on a profitable business in the manufacture of whisky. But when they were in the height of their prosperity, the notes of the temperance reformation was sounded in the East. Its tones were heard in the far West. A contest commenced between the consciences of these good brethren on the other. The father and five sons were so connected in business, that if the distillery was abandoned, it must inevitably break up the family and scatter them; and it could not be done without the sacrifice of several thousand dollars. The struggle was severe and painful, but not of long continuance. Conscience gained the mastery. The distillery must be given up at all hazards. Soon it was all taken down, its boilers knocked in the head and sold for old copper, and the foundation taken up, and the rocks which formerly sustained the distillery and its work of death, now sustained the parsonage and in part the church of the living God. Not content with this, an effort was made to get all the landholders in and about the village to sign a bond, forfeiting their land if they permitted ardent spirits either to be made or sold on their premises. And now no deed of any lot of land however small can be obtained without this restriction.

The venerable Dr. B.* still lives to know and rejoice in all this, and to admire that divine wisdom which was so much superior to his own—which directed these sons of New England to the distant West, on what seemed to him a wild goose chase—a forsaking of their post of duty—but what was designed by an over-ruling Providence for the advancement of the kingdom of the blessed Redeemer.

Inferences—1. Professors of religion in the older states, whose religion will not bear transplanting, had better remain where they are.

2. A consistent profession of religion and great usefulnes are not inconsistent with a high degree of worldly prosperity. Few who come to the West with no other object even than to make money, are more successful than have been this family, who have been instrumental in erecting three houses of worship in different places, and of forming three churches of Christ; and one of them was enabled on his decease to will $10,000 to a benevolent institution.

3. We see how much good a single pious family may do by settling down in some destitute portion of our country. Let many of the decendants of the Puritans and other followers of Christ go and do likewise.

Finally; let not the pastors of New England and older States discourage their enterprising pious families from breaking up and pushing off to the far West. They can be spared from the old and well established churches in the East, as well as not; and they are very much needed in the West, as the Aarons and Hurs to sustain the feeble hands of the fainting missionary—to be the founders of churches, and supporters of Sabbath schools, and of education generally, to oppose popery, intemperance, Sabbath-breaking, &c. Let such families go, and the more of them the better—to Illinois, Missauri, Wisconsin, Oregon, California, Texas—let them pursue just such a wild goose chase as I have described, and depend upon it, their labor will not be in vain. MUSKINGUM DISTRICT.

Columbia Ct., Nov. 26, 1845.

Mr. Editor: I would through the 'Recorder' inform the President that I reached my appointment Sept. 6. Being appointed to a circuit in my own vicinity, I felt some reluctance in entering upon its duties. Yet I have great cause of gratitude, that I have been kindly received by all the brethren. Br. Kingsbury, my colleague by appointment, not having come on nor been heard from, it fell to my lot, to take charge of the Circuit alone. We held our first quarterly meeting, 21, and 22d of November, at Graham's Station. The Lord was with us, and we had a refreshing time. The members there, were much revived, and they remarked that it was the best meeting held at that place for a long time. The brethren there manifest a praiseworthy liberality. They paid their apportionment for the year at the first quarterly meeting, and 75cts. over.

I am much gratified to say that we have peace in all our borders. While I am trying to preach to others, my own soul is watered and refreshed. And since I have come upon the circuit, I can say with the utmost assurance that I have enjoyed constant and inexpressible peace of mind in answer to prayer; and my heart is full of desire and expectation that we will have a year of peace and prosperity. I believe we are united in prayers as touching this thing. S. Elliott.

Berlin, O., Nov. 23, 1846.

Br. Bassett: I reached my appointment, (Mahoning Mission,) Sept. 20th—found the prospect quite discouraging—only 20 members returned to Conference, and but one regular preaching place. I have removed my family here, and by the help of the Lord, I shall do the best I can. I have now five appointments. We have held our first quarterly meeting, which was a good time. The brethren are more encouraged. I have received ten into society since I came on, and thank the Lord, there is some prospect of more. I never wish to be amongst a better hearted people. May the Lord reward and bless them. May he revive his work, and raise our Zion here. Pray for us, dear brethren, that our faith fail not.

Yours in Christian fellowship,

D. Richardson, Supt.

OHIO DISTRICT.

Port William Circuit, Dec. 1, 1846.

Mr. Editor: Our circuit has been in rather a cold state for the last few months. This may be owing in part to the late election, and in part to the abundant grain and fruit crops. When the providence of God prepares bountifully for us we forget to be grateful, and occupy our time in attending to the "creature more than the Creator." We have peace in all our borders. In some of our classes, the class meeting spirit is strengthening, and prayer meetings are attended to with much interest. It is true, a few have thought fit to discontinue their membership with us, because some members in the South hold slaves. We do not wish to pursue them with insult and indignity, if the few who left us, did act as to them seemed right. Our prayer is, that God's blessing may attend them in every effort to do good. Notwithstanding all the efforts to produce discord and disunion among us, our quarterly Conference passed off, on the 21, and 22d. November, most pleasantly. And I never attended a Quarterly Conference, when all its members appeared as anxious to see good promoted and their church influence enlarged. Our new meeting house at Br. Hartsock's will soon be ready for worship. This will be a meeting house of a neat finish. We will hold our first meeting in it, the first Sabbath in January next. We are praying for a general revival on our circuit. The Lord give success.

Emancipation in the West Indies.

NO. V.

I have come now to what I intend to make the last part of the inquiry, namely, whether the general prosperity of the colony has been advanced by emancipation? From what has been already stated, I think it must be evident that the two main classes of the inhabitants—the planters and laborers have been essentially benefited, and on their prosperity must depend in a great measure that of the colony. The planters, it is true, have had difficulties, but they admit themselves that their prospects are better now than ever before. But even if emancipation had been detrimental to the interest of the planters, this would not prove that it had not been, on the whole a blessing. It is too common on discussions on this subject to regard the interests of the planters alone, and to determine on the success of emancipation by the way in which that interest seems to be effected. It should be remembered that the laborers in any community are far the most numerous class, and that no country can be really prosperous, where the welfare of a majority of the population is disregarded.

There are in Trinidad less than 200 sugar estates, while the population of the Island is supposed to exceed 70,000. Were it even so then that the sugar business is not so profitable as formerly, —were it even so that it could not be carried on by free labor at all,—still the question would not be settled. If it could not be carried on without slave labor, then if slavery involves injustice, and destroys human happiness, this much would be settled, that it ought not to be carried out at all. Should the happiness of 60 or 70,000 people be sacrificed for the sake of the few hundred connected with these sugar estates?

Still, however, viewing the island as a sugar colony, it must be admitted that its prosperity is in a great degree identified with the prosperity of the sugar business. And viewing the people as laborers on the sugar estates, their pecuniary prosperity must be identified with that of this business. The capital invested in sugur estates in the island, and in their cultivation, and the manufacture of sugar exceeds, I am informed on competent authority, at a low estimate, £2,000,000 sterling. This appears to be an excessive amount of fixed manufacturing capital in proportion to the population.

The colony, therefore, cannot prosper if this business does not, unless its industry be turned into some other channel. But happily the question whether sugar can be profitably manufactured by free labor has been satisfactorily solved. The planters there all admit that it can. All they ask is, not slave labor, but the command of a sufficient supply of free labor. To obtain this has been the great desideratum since emancipation and the want of it the cause of all their difficulties. They do not hesitate to assert that sugar can be labor. Mr. Burnley, from whose book I have already quoted, says:—"It is known by experience that if a hundred laborers be conveyed as freemen from Africa to Trindad, the same number will be generally found twelve months afterwards in health and strength, whilst if an equal number be transported to Brazils and Cuba, more than one half will be lost in the first year, from mortality in the middle passage, and the subsequent seasoning on shore, and as every African landed in Trinidad would cost the colony only sixty dollars instead of three hundred and fifty, the lowest price at which the slaver can afford to sell, it follows as an undeniable consequence, that we should not only make double the quantity of sugar which they can, with the same number of imported laborers, but effect it at a greatly reduced price."

The truth is, (and I have my information from persons in the island well acquianted with the state of things, some of whom are planters) that even now the sugar business is highly prosperous. Such estates as are out of debt are making money rapidly, and in nearly all cases the invested capital is yielding large profits. Many of the estates however are involved in debt, and those to whom they are in debt are willing to keep them so, for this brings into their hands the shipping of the produce, and the furnishing the estates with such supply as are wanted from the mother country. On these they can put their own prices, and thus it seems they manage to pocket the profits of such estates. If the proprietors do not make money, the reason is not that the capital invested in their estates does not yield profits, but because these profits go into other pockets.

So far as I was able to observe, the planters and managers themselves are much more to blame than the people, for any difficulty they experience. There is evidently a great want of economy generally in the management. It appeared to me that economy and prudence used by our intelligent farmers would soon enable them, with their advantages of soil, and climate, and market, to make fortunes. But the old thriftless habits of slavery are in a great measure retained by many. To give but one instance—I observed that the mules (the animals chiefly used on sugar estates, and a great number of which are required,) on many estates were not kept in working order. They are usually in the hands of careless or ignorant stock-keepers—are under-fed—over-worked and cruelly treated. The usage they receive soon destroys them, and then they just go to the market and buy more mules, to be treated and destroyed in the same way. On other estates, where there are careful and experienced stock-keepers, and where they are kept in proper working order, I am told that the same set of mules lasted many years. It is easy to see what an amount may be save in a short time by economy in this one particular. If emancipation would teach them a lesson of economy, it would confer on them a vast benefit.

To give an idea of the want of economy in agriculture, it may be mentioned that the use of the plough is scarcely known in this Island.—Some estates, I believe, are beginning to use it, especially near the capital, but for my part, I did not see a plough going while on the Island, although residing in the midst of one of the principal agricultural districts. The hoe and cutlass are almost the only implements used. Think of the vast amount of mutual labor and consequent expense necessary to cultivate an estate of some hundred acres in this way, especially in a stiff clayey soil as it appears generally in Trinidad, and when it is considered that vegetation grows with a rapidity and vigor wholly unequalled in the temperate zones. Yet such is the exuberant fertility of the island, that even with this kind of cultivation, where there is anything approaching to good management, the sugar business is highly profitable.

Another difficulty which they make for themselves arises from the way in which they treat the people. Many of them evidently retain much of the driving spirit of the slave system. The people know that they are free, and do not wish to be treated as slaves, and sometimes the tyrrany of a manager will cause a number to go away. This is full as likely to take place too at the most critical times as any other. There were some estates in our vicinity where I never heard any complaint of want of people; and so far as I could judge from what I saw, and from what I knew of the character of the managers, those were the estates where they were treated more like rational beings. It is my opinion that were the laborers treated in all cases so as to gain their confidence, there would be few instances of people going away and interrupting the business of the estates.

Another source of difficulty is the manner of paying the people frequently practised. I have already mentioned the abounding of rum shops.—These are usually connected with small establishments for retailing dry goods and groceries. I was told that managers of estates sometimes have an interest in these establishments. This, it appears, has been quite common formerly, but is less so now, as public opinion has in some measure, been set against it; but the people, it seems, are frequently paid in orders on these establishments. Here they are charged an exhorbitant price for every thing they buy, and the shop-keeper will not fail to furnish them with abundance of rum. If under such circumstances they should get into a spree, and neglect their work for a few days, I should think the planters have very little right to complain. In another number, which shall be the last, I intend to mention a few facts in order to show that emancipation has increased the prosperity of the colony.

A BAD HABIT.

"Oh, mother! I am tired to death!" said Jane Mills as she threw herself into a chair on her return from school.

"Tired to death!" repeated her mother, slowly.

"Yes, mother, I am—almost, I mean," she added.

"No, my daughter, not even almost;" said Mrs. Mills.

"Well, at any rate," continued Jane, "I would not walk from here to school again, to-day, for anything in the world!"

"Oh yes you would, my dear," said her mother, gently.

"No, mother, I am sure I would not.—I am certain nothing would tempt me.".

"But I am nearly certain you could be induced to go without any urging," answered her mother.

"Well, mother, try me, and see if any thing could make me willing to go."

"Suppose" said Mrs. Mills, "I should offer to take you with me to the new panorma this afternoon? I expect to visit it."

"Do you mother," said Jane, with great animation. "May I go? You promised to take me when you went."

"I intended to have done so," replied her mother, "but the place where it is exhibited is a very long way beyond your school."

"But I am quite rested now, dear mother," said Jane. "I would not fail of going for all the world. Why do you smile, mother?"

"To think what an inconsistent little daughter I have."

"What do you mean by inconsistent, mother?"

"Why, when a little girl says one minute that she would not walk a particular distance "for anything in the world," and in the next minute says, "she would not fail" of walking still further "for any thing in the world," and in the next minute says "she would not fail" of walking still further "for all the world," she not only talks inconstantly and extravagantly but foolishly. It is a very bad habit to use such expressions. Yesterday, when you came home from school, you said you were almost frightened out of your life, and when I enquired as to the cause of your alarm, you replied that you had met as many as a thousand cross dogs on your way home from school."

"Now, my daughter, I wish you to break yourself of this bad habit. When you are tired or hungry or frightened, use the simple words that express your meaning. For instance, you may be tired—very tired—or exceedingly tired. Or you may be alarmed, or frightened, or terrified.

"From this time, let your lips speak the thing you mean. The Bible says, "Let your yea be yea, and your nay, nay; and adds, that Whatsoever is more than these cometh of evil."

"Will you try to remember what I have been saying, and strive to correct this fault, my dear child," said Mrs. Mills.

"Yes, dear mother," replied Jane; for I know it is wrong, and I feel ashamed and sorry for it."

"Well, my dear," added her mother,—"Improve. And now you may get ready to go with me to see the panorama.

WESTERN RECORDER,

PUTNAM, O. DEC. 12, 1846.

No apology, we think, will be required of us that our news matters, editorial, business department &c. all give place this week to the President's Message. Many of our friends will be gratified, that by arrangement with our respected contemporary of the Zanesville Courier, we are enabled at so early a moment, to lay before them this document, received by express from Baltimore, President's Message.

Gentlemen of the Senate and House of Representatives:

In resuming your labors in the service of the people, it is a subject of congratulation that there has been no period in our past history, when all the elements of national prosperity have been so fully developed. Since your last session, no afflicting dispensation has visited our country; general good health has prevailed; abundance has crowned the toil of the husbandman; and labor in all its branches is receiving an ample reward, while education, science and the arts are rapidly enlarging the means of social happiness. The progress of our country in her career of greatness, not only in the vast extension of our territorial limits, and the rapid increase of our population, but in resources and wealth, and in the happy condition of our people, is without example in the history of nations.

As the wisdom, strength, and beneficence of our free institutions are unfolded, every day adds fresh motives to contentment and fresh incentives to patriotism.

Our devout and sincere acknowledgments are due to the gracious Giver of all good, for the numberless blessings which our beloved country enjoys.

It is a source of high satisfaction to know that the relations of the United States with all other nations, with a single exception, are of the most amicable character. Sincerely attached to the policy of peace, early adopted and steadily pursued by this government, I have anxiously desired to cultivate and cherish friendship and commerce with every foreign power. The spirit and habits of the American people are favorable to the maintenance of such international harmony. In adhering to this wise policy, a preliminary and paramount duty obviously consists in the protection of our national interests from encroachment or sacrifice, and our national honor from reproach. These must be maintained at any hazard. They admit of no compromise or neglect, and must be scrupulously and and constantly guarded. In their vigilant vindication, collision and conflict with foreign powers may sometimes become unavoidable. Such has been our scrupulous adherence to the dictates of justice, in all our foreign intercourse, that though steadily and rapidly advancing in prosperity and power, we have given no just cause of complaint to any nation, and have enjoyed the blessings o peace for more than thirty years. From a policy so sacred to humanity, and so salutary in its effects upon our political system, we should never be induced voluntarily to depart.

The existing war with Mexico was neither desired nor provoked by the United States. On the contrary, all honorable means were resorted to to avert it.—After years of endurance of aggravated and unredressed wrongs on our part, Mexico, in violation of solemn treaty stipulations, and of every principle of justice recognized by civilized nations, commenced hostilities, and thus, by her own act, forced the war upon us. Long before the advance of our army to the left bank of the Rio Grande, we had ample cause of war against Mexico; and had the United States resorted to this extremity, we might have appealed to the whole civilized world for the justice of our cause.

I deem it to be my duty to present to you, on the present occasion, a condensed review of the injuries we had sustained, of the causes which led to the war, and of its progress since its commence ment. This is rendered the more necessary because of the misapprehensions which have to some extent prevailed as to its origin and true character. The war has been represented as unjust and unnecessary, and as one of aggression on our part, upon a weak and injured enemy. Such erroneous views, though entertained by but few, have been widely and extensively circulated, not only at home, but have been spread throughout Mexico and the whole world. A more effectual means could not have been devised to encourage the enemy and protract the war, than to advocate and adhere to their cause, and thus give them "aid and comfort."

It is a source of national pride and exultation, that the great body of our people have thrown no such obstacles in the way of the government in prosecuting the war successfully, but have shown themselves to be eminently patriotic, and ready to vindicate their country's honor and interests at any sacrince. The alacrity and promptness with which our volunteer forces rushed to the field at their country's call, prove not only their patriotism, but their deep conviction that our cause is just.

The wrongs which we have suffered from Mexico almost ever since she became an independent Power, and the patient endurance with which we have borne them, are without a parallel in the history of modern civilized nations.—There is reason to believe that, if these wrongs had been resented and resisted in the first instance, the present war might have been avoided. One outrage, however, permitted to pass with impunity, almost necessarily encouraged the perpetration of another, until, at last, Mexico seemed to attribute to weakness and indecision, on our part, a forbearance which was the offspring of magnanimity, and of a sincere desire to preserve friendly relations with a sister republic.

Scarcely had Mexico achieved her independence, which the United States were the first among the nations to acknowledge, when she commenced the system of insult and spoliation, which she has ever since pursued. Our citizens, engaged in lawful commerce, were imprisoned, their vessels seized, and our flag insulted in her ports. If money was wanted, the lawless seizure and confiscation of our merchant vessels and their cargoes was a ready resource: and if, to accomplish their purposes, it became necessary to imprison the owners, captains and crews, it was done. Rulers superceded rulers in Mexico in rapid succession; but still there was no change in this system of depredation. The government of the United States made repeated reclamations on behalf of its citizens, but these were answered by the perpetration of new outrages. Promises of redress made by Mexico in the most solemn forms were postponed or evaded. The files and records of the department of state contain conclusive proofs of numerous lawless acts perpetrated upon the persons and property of our citizens by Mexico, and of wanton insults to our national flag. The interposition of our government to obtain redress was again and again invoked, under circumstances which no nation ought to disregard.

It is hoped that these outrages would cease, and that Mexico would be restrained by the laws which regulate the conduct of civilized nations in their intercourse with such other after the treaty of amity, commerce, and navigation of fifth of April, 1831, was concluded between the two republics; but this hope soon proved to be vian. The course of seizure and confiscation of the property of citizens; the violation of their persons and the insults to our flag pursued by Mexico previous to that time were scarcely suspended for even a brief period, although the treaty so clearly defines the rights and duties of the respective parties that it is impossible to misunderstood or mistake them. In less than seven years after the conclusion of that treaty our grievancies had become so intolerable that, in the opinion of President Jackson, they should no longer be endured. In his message to Congress in Feb. 1837, he peesented them to the consideration of that body, and declare that 'The length of time since some injuries have been committed, the repeated and unavailing applications for redress, the wanton character of some of the outrages upon the property and persons of our citizens, upon the officers and flag of the U. S. independent of recent insults to this government and people by the late extraordinary Mexican minister, would justify in the eyes of all nations immediate war." In a spirit o kindness and forbearance, however, he recommended reprisals as a milder mode of redress.

He declared that war should not be used as a remedy, "by just and generous nations confined in their strength for injuries committed, if it can be honorably avoided," and added, "it has occurred to me that, considering the present embarrassed condition of that country, we should act with both wisdom and moderation, by giving to Mexico one more opportunity to atone for the past, before we take redress into our own hands. To avoid all misconception on the part of Mexico, as well as to protect our own national character from reproach, this opportunity should be given with the avowed design and full preparation to take immediate satisfaction, if it should not be obtained on a repetition of the demand for it. To this end I recommend that an act be passed authorizing reprisals, and the use of the naval force of the United States, by the Executive, against Mexico, to enforce them in the event of a refusal by the Mexican government to come to an amicable adjustment of the matters in controversy between us, upon another demand thereof, made from on board one of our vessels of war on the coast of Mexico."

Committees of both Houses of Congress, to which this message of the President was referred, sustained his views of the character of the wrongs which we had suffered from Mexico; and recommend that another demand for redress should be made before authorizing war or reprisals. The Committee of Foreign Relations, in their report, say: 'After such a demand, should prompt justice refused by the Mexican Government, we may appeal to all nations for the equity and moderation with which we acted toward a sister republic, but for the necessity which will then compel us to seek redress for our wrongs, either by actual war or by reprisals. The subject will then be presented before Congress at the commencement of the next session; in a clear and distinct form, and the committee can not doubt but that such measures will be immediately adopted as may be necessary to vindicate the honor of the country, and insure ample reparation to our injured citizens.'

The Committee on Foreign Affairs of the House of Representatives made a similar recommendation in their report they say that they "may concur with the President that ample cause exists for taking redress into our own hands, and believe that we should be justified in the opinion of other nations for taking such a step. But they are willing to try the experiment of another demand, made in the most solemn form, upon the justice of the Mexican government, before any further proceedings are adopted."

No difference of opinion is believed to have existed in Congress at that time.—The Executive and Legislature departments concurred, and yet such has been our forbearance and desire to preserve peace with Mexico, that the wrongs of which we then complained, and which gave rise to these solemn proceedings, not only remain unredressed to this day, but additional causes of complaint of an aggravated character, have ever since been accumulating.

Shortly after these proceedings, a special messenger was dispatched to Mexico, to make a final demand for redress, and on the 20th of July, 1837, the demand was made. The answer of the Mexican Government being date on the 29th of the same month, and contains ass ces of the anxious wish' of the Mexican government 'not to delay a moment of that final and equitable adjustment which is to terminate the existing difficulties between the two governments;' that 'nothing should be left undone which may contribute to the most equitable termination of the subjects which have so seriously engeged the attention of the American government;' that the 'Mexican government would adopt as the only guides for its conduct, the plainest principles of public right, the sacred obligations imposed by international law, and the religious faith of treaties;' and that 'whatever reason and justice may dictate respecting each case will be done.' The assurance was further given that the decision of the Mexican government upon our cause of complaint for which redress has been demanded, should be communicated to the government of the United States at Washington.

The solemn assurances, in answer to our demand for redress, were disregarded. By making them, however, Mexico obtained further delay. President Van Buren, in his annual message to Congress, on the 5th of December, 1837, states that 'although the larger number' of our demands for redress, and 'many of them aggravated cases of personal wrongs, have been now for years before the Mexican government, and some of the causes of national complaint of the most offensive character, admitted of immediate, simple and satisfactory replies, it is only within a few days past that any specific communication in answer to our last demand, made five months ago, has been received from the Mexican minister.'

That 'for not one of our public complaints has satisfantion been given or offered, that but one of the cases of personal wrong has been favorably considered, and that but four cases of both descriptions, out of all those formally presented, and earnestly pressed, have as yet been decided upon by the Mexican government.'

President Van Buren, believing that it would be vain to make any further attempt to obtain redress by the ordinary means within the power of the Executive, communicated this opinion to Congress, in the message referred to, in which he said, "On a careful and deliberate examination of the contents," (of the correspondence with the Mexican government,) "and considering the spirit manifested by the Mexican government, it has become my painful duty to return the subject as it now stands, to Congress, to whom it belongs, to decide upon the time, the mode, and the measure of redress."

Had the United States at that time adopted compulsory measures, and taken redress into their own hands, all our difficulties with Mexico would probably have been long since adjusted, and the existing war have been averted. Magnanimity and moderation on our part only had the effect to complicate these difficulties, and render an amicable settlement of them the more embarrassing. That such measures of redress under similar provocations, committed by any of the powerful nations of Europe, would have been promptly resorted to by the United States, cannot be doubted. The national honor, and the preservation of the national character throughout the world, as well as our own self-respect, and the protection due to our own citizens, would have rendered such a resort indispensable.

The history of no civilized nation in modern times has presented within so brief a period so many wanton attacks upon the honor of its flag, and upon the property and persons of its citizens, as had at that time been borne by the United States from the Mexican authorities and people. But Mexico was a sister republic, on the North American continent, occupying a territory contiguous to our own, and was in a feeble and distracted condition; and these considerations, it is presumed, induced Congress to forbear still longer.

Instead of taking redress into our own hands, a new negotiation was entered upon with fair promises on the part of Mexoco, but with the real purpose, as the event has proved, of indefinitely postponing the reparation which we demanded, and which was so justly due. This negotiation, after more than a year's delay, resulted in the convention of the eleventh of April, 1839, "for the adjustment of claims of citizens of the United States of America upon the government of the Mexican republic."—The joint board of commissioners created by this convention to examine and decide upon these claims was not organized until the month of August, 1840, and under the terms of the convention they were to terminate their duties within eighteen months from that time.

Four of the eighteen months were consumed in preliminary discussions on frivolous and dilatory points raised by the Mexican commissioners; and it was not until the month of December, 1840, that they commenced the examination of the claims of our citizens upon Mexico. Four teen months only remained to examine and decide upon these numerous and complicated cases. In the month of February, 1842, the term of the commission expired, leaving many claims undisposed of for want of time.

The claims which were allowed by the board, and by the umpire authorized by the convention to decide in case of disagreement between the Mexican and American commissioners, amounted to two million twenty-six thousand one hundred and thirty-nine dollars and sixty-eight cents. There were pending before the umpire when the commission expired additional claims which had been examined and awarded by the American commissioners, and had not been allowed by the Mexican commissioners, amounting to nine hundred and twenty-eight thousand six hundred and twenty-seven dollars and eighty-eight cents, upon which he did not decide, alleging that his authority had ceased with the terminotion of the joint commission.

Besides these claims, there were others of American citizens amounting to three million three hundred and thirty six thousand eight hundred and thirty seven dollars and five cents, which had been submitted to the board, and upon which they had not time to decide before their final adjournment.

The sum of $2 026,139 68 which had been awarded to the claiments, was a liquidated & ascertained debt due by Mexico, about which there could be no dispute, and which she was bound to pay according to the terms of the convention. Soon after the final awards for this amount had been made, the Mexican government asked for a postponement of the time of making payment, urging that it would be inconvenient for her to make payment at the time stipulated. In tha spirit of forbearing kindness toward a sister republic, which Mexico has so long abused, the United States promptly complied with her request.

A second convention was accordingly concluced between the two governments on the thirtieth of January, 1843, which upon its face declares, that "this new arrangement is entered into for the accommodation of Mexico."—By the terms of this convention, all the interest due on the awards which had been made in favor of the claimants under the convention of the eleventh of April, 1839, was to be paid to them on the thirtieth of April, 1843, and "the principal of said awards, and the interest accruing thereon," was stipulated to "be paid in five years, in equal instalmeets every three months."

Notwithstanding this new convention was entered into at the request of Mexico, and for the purpose of relieving her long embarrassment, the claimants have only received the interest due on the thirtieth of April, 1843, and three of the twenty instalments. Although the payment of the sum thus liquidated, and confessedly due by Mexico to our citizens as indemnity for acknowledged acts of outrage and wrong, was secured by treaty, the obligations of which are ever held sacred by all just nations, yet Mexico has violated this solemn engagement by failing and refusing to make the payment. The two instalments due in April and July, 1844, under the peculiar circumstances connected with them, have been assumed by the United States and discharged to the claimants—but they are still due by Mexico.

But this is not all of which we have just cause of complaint. To provide a remedy for the claimants whose cases were not decided by the joint commission under the convention of April the eleventh, 1838, it was expressly stipulated by the sixth article of the convention of the thirtieth of January, 1843, "that a new convention shall be entered into for the settlement of all claims of the government and citizens of the United States against the republic of Mexico which were not finally decided by the late commission, which met in the city of Washington, and of all claims of the government and citizens of Mexico against the United States."

In conformity with this stipulation a third convention was concluded and signed at the city of Mexico on the twentieth of November, 1842, by the plenipotentiaries of the two governments, by which provision was made for ascertaining and paying these claims. In January, 1844, this convention was ratified by the Senate of the United States with two amendments, which were manifestly reasonable in their character. Upon a reference of the amendments proposed to the government of Mexico, the same evasions, differences and delays were interposed which have so long marked the policy of that government towards the United States. It has not yet even yet decided whether it would or would not accede to them, although the subject has been repeatedly pressed upon its consideration.

Mexico has thus violated a second time the faith of treaties, by failing or refusing to carry into effect the sixth article of the convention of January, 1843

Such is the history of the wrongs which we have suffered and patiently endured from Mexico through a long series of years. So far from affording reasonable satisfaction for the injuries and insults we had borne, a great aggravation of them consists in the fact, that while the United States, anxious to preserve a good understanding with Mexico, have been constantly, but vainly, employed in seeking redress, new outrages were constantly occurring which have continued to increase our causes of complaint and to swell the amount of our demands. While the citizens of the United States were conducting a lawful commerce with Mexico under the guaranty of a treaty of "amity, commerce and navigation," many of them have suffered all the injuries which would have resulted from open war.

This treaty, instead of affording protection to our citizens, has been the means of inviting them into the ports of Mexico, that they might be, as they have been in numerous instances, plundered of their property and deprived of their personal liberty if they dared insist on their rights. Had the unlawful seizures of American property, and the violation of personal liberty of our citizens, to say nothing of the insults to our flig which have occurred in the ports of Mexico, taken place on the high seas, theo would themselves long since have constituted a state of actual war between the two countries.

In so long suffering Mexico to violate her most solemn treaty obligations, plunder our citizens of their property, and imprison their persons without affording them any redress, we have failed to perform one of the first and highest duties which every government owes to its citizens; and the consequence has been that many of them have been reduced from a state of affluence to bankruptcy. The proud name of American citizen, which ought to protect all who bear it, from insult and injury throughout the world, has afforded no such protection to our citizens in Mexico. We had ample cause of war against Mexico long before the breaking out of hostilities. But even then we forbore to take redress into our own hands until Mexico herself became the aggressor by invading our soil in hostile array, and shedding the blood of our citizens.

Such are the grave causes of complaint on the part of the United States against Mexico—causes which existed long before the annexation of Texas to the American Union; and yet, animated by the love of peace, and a magnanimous moderation, we did not adopt those measures of redress which, under those circumstances, are the justified resort of injured nations

The annexation of Texas to the U. S. constituted no just cause of offence to Mexico. The pretext that it did so is wholly inconsistent and irreconciable with well authenticated facts connected with the revolution by which Texas become independent of Mexico That this may be the more manifest, it may be proper to advert to the causes and to the history of the principal events of that revolution.

Texas constituted a portion of the ancient province of Louisiana, ceded to the U. S. by France in the year 1803. In the year 1819, the U. S. by the Florida treaty, ceded to Spain all that part of Louisiana within the present limits of Texas; and Mexico, by the revolution which separated her from Spain, and rendered her an independent nation, succeeded to the rights of the mother country over this territory. In the year 1824, Mexico established a federal constitution, under which the Mexican republic was composed of a number of sovereign States, confederated together in a Federal Union similar to our own.

Each of these States had its own Executive, Legislature and Judiciary, and for all, except federal purposes, was as independent of the general government, and that of the other States, as is Pennsylvania or Virginia under our constitution. Texas and Coahuila united and formed one of these Mexican states. The State constitution which they adopted, and which was approved by the Mexican confederacy, asserted that they were 'free and independent of the other Mexican United States, and of every other power and dominion whatever;' and proclaimed the great principle of human liberty, that 'the sovereignty o the State resides originally and essentially in the general mass of the individuals who compose it.' To the government under this constitution, as well as to that under the federal constitution, the people of Texas owed allegiance.

Emigrants from foreign countries, including the United States, were invited by the colonization laws of the State and of the federal government to settle in Texas. Advantageous terms were offered to induce them to leave their own country and become Mexican citizens. This invitation was accepted by many of our citizens, in the full faith that in their new home they would be governed by laws enacted by representatives elected by themselves, and that their lives, liberty, and property would be protected by constitutional guaranties similar to those which existed in the republic they had left. Under a government thus organized they continued until the year 1835, when a military revolution broke out in the city of Mexico, which entirely subverted the federal and State constitutions, and placed a military dictator at the head of the government.

By a sweeping decree of a Congress subservient to the will of the dictator; the several State constitutions were abolished, and the States themselves converted into mere departments of the Central Government. The people of Texas were unwilling to submit to his usurpation. Resistance to such tyranny became a high duty. Texas was fully absolved from all allegiance to the Central Government of Mexico from the moment that government had ablished her State constitution, and in its place substituted an arbitrary and despotic Central Government.

Such were the principal causes of the Texan revolution. The people of Texas at once determined upon resistance, and flew to arms. In the midst of these important and exciting events, however, they did not omit to place their liberties upon a secure and permanent foundation. They elected members to a convention, who, in the month of March, 1836, issued a formal declaration that their "political connexion with the Mexican nation has forever ended, and that the people of Texas do now constitute a free, sovereign, and independent republic, and are fully invested with all the rights and attributes which properly belong to independent nations." They also adopted for their government a liberal republican constitution. About the same time Santa Ann, then the dictator of Mexico, invaded Texas with a numerous army for the purpose of subduing her people, and enforcing obedience to his arbitrary and despotic government. On the twenty-first of April, 1836, he was met by the Texan citizen-soldiers, and on that day was achieved by them the memorable victory of San Jacinto, by which they conquered their independence. Considering the numbers engaged on the respective sides, history does not record a more brilliant achievement. Santa Anna himself was among the captives.

In the month of May, 1836, Santa Anna acknowledged, by a treaty with the Texan authorities, in the most solemn form, "the [illegible] republic of Texas." It is true he was then a prisonor of war, but it is equally true that he had failed to reconquer Texas, and had met with signal defeat; that his authority had not been revoked, and that by virtue of this treaty he obtained his personal release. By it hostilities were suspended, and the army which had invaded Texas under his command returned in pursuance of this arrangement, unmolested, to Mexico.

From the day that the battle of San Jacinto was fought until the present hour, Mexico has never possessed the power to reconquer Texas. In the language of the Secretary of State of the United States, in a despatch to our minister in Mexico, under date of the eighth of July, 1842, "Mexico may have chosen to consider, and may still choose to consider Texas as having been at all times since 1835, and as still continuing, a rebellious province; but the world has been obliged to take a very different view of the matter. From the time of the battle of San Jacinto, in April, 1836, to the present moment, Texas has exhibited the same external signs of national independence as Mexico herself, and with quite as much stability of government.

Practically free and independent, acknowledged as a political sovereignty by the principal Powers of the world, no hostile foot finding rest within her territory for six or seven years and Mexico herself refraining for all that period from any further attempt to re-establish her own authority over that territory, it cannot but be suprising to find Mr. de Bocanegra (the secretary of Foreign Affairs of Mexico) complaining that for that whole period citizens of the United States, or its government, have been favoring the rebels of Texas, and supplying them with vessels, ammunition and money, as if the war for the reduction of the province of Texas, had been constantly prosecuted by Mexico, and her success prevented to their influence from abroad."

In the same despatch the Secretary of State affirms that "since 1837 the United States have regarded Texas as an independent sovereignty, as much as Mexico; and that trade and commerce with citizens of a government at war with Mexico cannot, on that account be regarded as an intercourse by which assistance and succor are given to Mexican rebels. The whole current of Mr. de Bocanegra's remarks runs in the same direction as if the independence of Texas had not been acknowledged. It has been acknowedged: it was acknowledged in 1837 against the remonstrance and protest of Mexico; and most of the acts of any importance, of which Mr. de Bocanegra complains, flow necessarily from that recognition. He speaks of Texas as still being an integral part of the territory of the Mexican republic, but he cannot but understand that the United States do not so regard it. The real complaint of Mexico, therefore, is, in substance, neither more nor less than complaint against the recognition of Texan independence.

It may be thought rather late to repeat that complaint, and not quite just to confine it to the United States, to the exemption of England, France, and Belgium, unless the United States, having been the first to acknowledge the independence of Mexico herself, are to be blamed for setting an example for the recognition of that of Texas." And he added, that "the constitution, public treaties, and the laws oblige the President to regard Texas as an independent State, and its territory as no part of the territory of Mexico."

Texas had been an independent State, with an organized government, defying the power of Mexico to overthrow or conquer her for more than ten years before Mexico commenced the present war against the United States. Texas had given such evidence to the world of her ability to maintain her separate existence as an independent nation, that she had been formally recognized as such, not only by the U. States, but by several of the principal powers of Europe. These powers had entered into treaties of amity, commerce, and navigation with her. They had received and accredited her ministers and other diplomatic agents at their respective courts, and they had commissioned ministers & diplomatic agents on their part to the government of Texas.

If Mexico, notwithstanding all this, and her utter inability to subdue or reconquer Texas, still stubbornly refused to recognize her as an independent nation, she was none the less so on that account. Mexico herself had been recognized as an independent nation by the U. States, and by other powers, many years before Spain, of which, before her revolution, she had been a colony, would agree to recognize her as such; and yet Mexico was at that time, in the estimation of the civilized word, and in fact, none the less an independent power because Spain still claimed her as a colony.

If Spain had continued until the present period to assert that Mexico was one of her colonies in rebellion against her, this would not have made her so, or changed the fact of her independent existence. Texas, at the period of her annexation to the United States, bore the same relation to Mexico that Mexico had borne to Spain for many years before Spain acknowledged her independence. with this important difference---that, before the annexation of Texas to the United States was consumated. Mexico herself, by a formal act of her government, had acknowledged the inpependence of Texas as a nation. It is true, that in the act of recognition she prescribed a condition which she had no power on authority to impose, that Texas should not annex herself to any other Power, but this could not detract in any degree from the recognition which Mexico then made of her actual independence. Upon this plain statement of facts, it is absurd for Mexico to allege as a pretext for commencing hostilities against the United States, that Texas is still a part of her territory.

But there are those who, conceding all this to be true, assume the ground that the western boundary of Texas is the Nueces, insterd of the Rio Grande; and that, therefore, in marching our army to the east bank of the latter river, we passed the Texan line, and invaded the territory of Mexico. A simple statement of facts, known to exist, will conclusively refute such an assumption. Texas, as ceded to the United States by France in 1803, has been always claimed as extending west to the Rio Grande, or Rio Bravo. This fact is established by that authority of our most eminent statesmen at a period when the question was as well if not better understood than it is at present. During Mr. Jefferson's administration, Messrs. Monroe and Pickney, who had been sent on a special mission to Madrid, charged among other things, with the adjustment of boundary between the two countries, in a note addressed to the Spanish Minister of Foreign Affairs, under date of the 28th of January, 1805, assert that the boundaries of Louisianna, as ceded to the United States by France, "are the river Perdido on the east, and the river Bravo on the west;" and they add that "the facts and principles which justify this conclusion are so satisfactory to our government as to convince it that the United States have not a better right to the island of New Orleans, under the cession referred to, than they have to the whole district of territory which is above described."

Down to the conclusion of the Florida treaty, in February, 1819, by which this territory was ceded to Spain, the United States asserted and maintained their territorial rights to this extent. In the month of June, 1818, during Mr. Monroe's administration, information having been received that a number of foreign adventurers had landed at Galveston, with the avowed purpose of forming a settlemeut in that vicinity, a special messenger was despatched by the government of the United States, with instructions from the Secretary of State to warn them to desist, should they be found there "or any other place north of the Rio Bravo and within the territory claimed by the United States."—He was instructed, should they be found in the country north of that river, to make known to them "the surprise with which the President has seen possession thus taken, without authority from the United States, of a place within their territorial limits, and upon which no lawful settlemeut can be made without their sanction." He was instructed to call upon them to "avow under what national authority they profess to act," and to give them due warning "that the place is within the United States, who will suffer no permanent settlement to be made there, under any authority other than their own." As late as the eighth of July, 1842, the Secretary of State of the United States, in a note addressed to our minister in Mexico, maintains that, by the Florida treaty of 1819, the territory as far west as the Rio Grande was confirmed to Spain. In that note he states that, "by the treaty of the twenty-second of February, 1819, between the United States and Spain, the Sabine was adopted as the line of boundary between the two Powers. Up to that period, no considerable colonization had been effected in Texas; but the territory between the Sabine and the Rio Grande being confirmed to Spain by the treaty, applications were made to that Power for grants of land, and such grants, or permissions of settlement, were in fact made by the Spanish authorities in favor of citizens of the United States proposing to emigrate to Texas in numerous families, before the declaration of independence by Mexico."

The Texas which was ceded to Spain by the Florida treaty of 1819, embracing all the country now claimed by the State of Texas between the Nueces and the Rio Grande. The republic of Texas always claimed this river as her western boundary, and in her treaty, made with Santa Anna in May, 1836, he recognized it as such. By the constitution which Texas adopted in March, 1836, senatorial and representative districts were organized extending west of the Nueces.

The Congress of Texas, on the 19th of December, 1836, passed "An act to define the boundaries of the republic of Texas," in which they declared the Rio Grande from its mouth to its source to be their boundary, and by the said act they extended their "civil and political jurisdiction" over the country up to that boundary.—During a period of more than nine years which intervened between the adoption of her constitution and her annexation as one of the States of our Union, Texas assented and exercised many acts of sovereignty and jurisdiction over the territory and inhabitants west of the Nueces. She organized and defined the limits of counties extending to the Rio Grande. She established courts of justice and extended her judicial system over the territory. She established a custom-house, and collected duties, and also post offices and post roads, in it. She established a land office, and issued numerous grants for land, within its limits. A Senator and a Representative residing in it were elected to the Congress of this republic, and served as such before the act of annexation took place. In both the Congress and Convention of Texas which gave their assent to the terms of annexation to the United States, proposed by our Congress, were representatives residing west of the Nueces, which took part in the act of annexation itself.

This was the Texas which by the act of our Congress of the twenty-ninth December, 1845, was admitted as one of the states of our Union. That the Congress of the United States understood the state of Texas which they admitted into the Union to extend beyond the Nueces is apparent from the fact, that on the thirty-first of December, 1845, only two days after the act of admission, they passed a law "to established a collection district in the State of Texas," by which they created a port of delivery at Corpus Christi, situated west of the Nueces, and being the same point at which the Texas custom-house, under the laws of that Republic, had been located, and directed that a surveyor to collect the revenue should be appointed for that port by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. A surveyor was accordingly nominated and confirmed by the Senate, and has been ever since in the performance of his duties. All these acts of the Republic of Texas, and of our Congress, preceded the orders for the advance of our army to the east bank of the Rio Grande. Subsequently, Congress passed an act "establishing certain post routes," extending west of the Nueces. The country west of that river now constitutes a part of one of the Congressional Districts of Texas, and is represented in the House of Representatives. The Senators from that State were chosen by a legislature in which the country west of that river was represented. In view of all these facts, it is difficult to conceive upon what ground it can be maintained that, in occupying the country west of the Nueces with our army, with a view solely to its security and defence, we invaded the territory of Mexico. But it would have been still more difficult to justify the Executive, whose duty it is to see that the laws be faithfully executed, if in the face of all these proceedings, both of the Congress of Texas and of the United States, he had assumed the responsibility of yielding up the territory west of the Nueces to Mexico, or of refusing to protect and defend this territory and its inhabitants, including Corpus Christi, as well as the remainder of Texas, against the threatened Mexican invasion.

But Mexico herself has never placed the war which she has waged upon the ground that our army occupied the intermediate territory between the Nueces and the Rio Grande Her refuted pretention that Texas was not in fact an independent State, but a rebellious province, was obstinately persevered in; and her avowed purpose in commencing a war with the United States to reconquer Texas, and to restore Mexican authority over the whole territory—not to the Nueces only, but to the Sabine. In view of the proclamed menaces of Mexico to this effect, I deemed it my duty, as a measure of precaution and defence, to order our army to occupy a position on our frontier as a military post, from which our troops could best resist and repel any attempted invasion which Mexico might make.

Our army had occupied a position at Corpus Christi, west of the Nueces, as early as August, 1845, without complaint from any quarter. Had the Nueces been regarded as the true western boundary of Texas, that boundry had been passed by our army many months before it advanced to the eastern bank of the Rio Grande In my annual message of December last I informed Congress, that upon the invitation of both the Congress and Convention of Texas, I had deemed it proper to order a strong squadron to the coasts of Mexico, and to concentrate an efficient military force on the western frontier of Texas, to protect and defend the inhabitants against the menaced invasion of Mexico. In that message I informed Congress that the moment the terms of annexation offered by the United States were accepted by Texas, the latter became so far a part of our own country as to make it our duty to afford such protection and defence; and that for that purpose our squadron had been ordered to the Gulf, and our army to "take a position between the Nueces and the Del Norte," or Rio Grande, and "to repel any invasion of the Texan territory which might be attempted by the Mexican forces."

It was deemed proper to issue this order, because, soon after the President of Texas, in April 1845, had issued his proclamation convening the Congress of that republic, for the purpose of submitting to that body the terms of annexation proposed by the United States, the government of Mexico made serious threats of invading the Texan territory. These threats became more imposing as it became more apparent, in the progress of the question, that the people of Texas would decide in favor of accepting the terms of annexation; an, finally, they had assumed such a formidable character as indueed both the Congress and Convention of Texas to request that a military force should be sent by the United States into her territory for the purpose of protecting and defending her against the threatened invasion. It would have been a violation of good faith towards the people of Texas to have refused to afford the aid which they desired against a threatened invasion, to which they had been exposed by their free determination to annex themselves to our Union, in compliance with the overture made to them by the joint resolution of our Congress.

Accordingly, a portion of the army was ordered to advance into Texas. Corpus Christi was the position selected by Gen. Taplor. He encamped at that place in August, 1845, and the army remained in that position until the eleventh of March, 1846, when it moved westward, and on the twenty-eighth of that month reached the east bank of the Rio Grande opposite to Matamoras. Mhis movement was made in pursuance of orders from the War Department, issued on the thirteenth of January, 1846. Before the orders were issued, the despatch of our minister in Mexico, transmitting the decision of the Council of Government of Mexico, advising that he should not be received, and also the despatch of our Consul residing in the city of Mexico---the former bearing date on the seventeenth and the latter on the eighteenth of December, 1845, copies of both of which accompanied my message to Congress of the eleventh of May last---were received at the Department of State.

These communications rendered it highly probable, if not absolutely certain, that our minister would not be received by the government of Gen. Herrera. It was also well known that but little hope could be entertained af a different result from Gen. Paredes in case the revolutionary movement which he was prosecuting should prove successful, as was highly probable. The partisans of Paredes, as our minister, in the despatch referred to, states, breathed the fiercest hostility against the United States, denounced the proposed negociation as treason, and openly called upon the troops and the peo le to put down the government of Herrera by force. The reconquest of Texas, and war with the United States, were openly threatened. These were the circumstances existing, when it was deemed proper to order the army under command of Gen. Taylor to advance to the western frontier of Texas, and occupy a position on or near the Rio Grande.

The apprehensions of a contemplated Mexican invasion have been since fully justified by the event. The determination of Mexico to rush into hostilities with the United States was afterwards manifested by the whole tenor of the note of the Mexican Minister of Foreign Affairs to our minister, bearing date on the twelfth of March, 1846. Paredes had then revolutionized the government, and his minister, after referring to the resolution for the annexation of Texas, which had been adopted by our Congress in March, 1845, proceeds to declare that "a fact such at this, or, to speak with greater exactness, so notable an act of usurpation, created an imperious necessity that Mexico, for her own honor, should repel it with proper firmness and dignity. The Supreme Government had beforehand declared that it would look upon such an act as a casus belli; and as a consequence of this declaration, negociation was, by its very nature, at an end, and war was the only recourse of the Mexican government."

It appears, also, that on the fourth of April following, General Paredes, through his minister of war, issued orders to the Mexican general in command on the Texan frontier to "attack" our army "by every means which war permits." To this General Paredes had been pledged to the army and people of Mexico during the military revolution which had brought him into power On the 18th of April, 1846, General Paredes addressed a letter to the commander on that frontier, in which he stated to him "at the present date I suppose you at the head of that valliant army, either fighting already, or preparing for the operations of a campaign;" and "supposing you already on the theatre of operations, and with all the forces assembled, it is indispensable that hostilities be commenced, yourself taking the initiative against the enemy."

The movement of our army to the Rio Grande was made by the commanding general general under positive orders to abstain from all acts towards Mexico or Mexican citizens, and to regard the relations between the two countries as peaceful, unless Mexico should declare war, or commit acts of hostility indicative of a state of war; and these orders he faithfully executed. Whilst occupying his position on the east bank of the Rio Grande, within the limits of Texas, then recently admitted as one of the States of our Union, the commanding general of the Mexican forces, who, in pursuance of the orders of his government, had collected a large army on the opposite shore of the Rio Grande, crossed the river, invaded our territory, and commenced hostilities by attacking our forces.

Thus after all the injuries which we had received and borne from Mexico, and after she had insultingly rejected a minister sent to her on a mission of peace, and when she had solemnly agreed to receive, she consummated her long course of outrage against our country by commencing an offensive war and shedding the blood of our citizens in our own soil.

The United States never attempted to acquire Texas by conquest. On the contrary, at an early period after the people of Texas had achieved their independence, they sought to be annexed to the United States. At a general election in September, 1836, they decided with great unanimity in favor of "annexation," and in November following, the Congress of the republic authorized the appointment of a minister, to bear their request to this government.—This government, however, having remained neutral between Texas and Mexico during the war between them, and considering it due to the honor of our country, and our fair fame among the nations of the earth, that we should not at this early period consent to annexation nor until it should be manifest to the whole world that the re-conquest of Texas by Mexico was impossible, refused to accede to the overtures made by Texas. On the 12th April, 1844, and after more than 7 years had elapsed since Texas had established her independence a treaty was concluded for the annexation of that republic to the United States, which was rejected by the Senate.

Finally, on the first of March, 1845, Congress passed a joint resolution for annexing her to the United States, upon certain preliminary conditions to which her assent was required. The solemnities which characterized the deliberations and conduct of the government and people of Texas, on the deeply interesting questions presented by these resolutions, are known to the world. The Congress, the Executive, and the people of Texas, in a convention elected for the purpose, accepted with great unanimity the proposed terms of annexation; and thus consummated, on her part, the great act of restoring to our federal Union a vast territory which had been ceded to Spain by the Florida treaty more than a quarter of a century before.

After the joint resolution for the annexation of Texas to the United States had been passed by our Congress, the Mexican Minister at Washington addressed a note to the Secretary of State, bearing date on the sixth of March, 1845, protesting against it as "an act of aggression the most unjust which can be found recorded in the annals of modern history; namely, that of despoiling a friendly nation, like Mexico, of a considerable portion of her territory;" and protesting against the resolution of annexation, being an act "whereby the province of Texas, an integral portion of the Mexican territory, is agreed and admitted to the American Union, and he announced that, as a consequence, his mission to the United States had terminated, and demanded his passports, which were granted. It was upon the absurd pretense made by Mexico, (herself indebted independence to a successful revolu-

,) that the Republic of Texas still tinued to be, notwithstanding all that passed, a province of Mexico, that step was taken by the Mexican min-hat I have acted sn the spirit of this assure, will appear from the events which have e occurred. Notwithstanding Mexico had uptly terminated all diplomatic intercourse h the United States, and ought, therefore, to e been the first to ask for its resumption, yet iving all ceremony, I embraced the earliest orable opportunity "to ascertain from the ixican government whether they would reve an envoy from the United States intrustwith full power to adjust all the questions dispute between the two governments." In ptember, 1845, I believed the propitious mont for such an overture had arrived. Texas the enthusiastic and almost unanimous will her people, had pronounced in favor of an-xation. Mexico herself had agreed to acowledge the independence of Texas, subject a condition, it is true, which she had no ght to impose and no power to enforce. The st lingering hope of Mexico, if she still could ve retained any, that Texas would ever again come one of her provinces, must have been andoned.

The consul of the United States at the ty of Mexico was therefore, instructed the Secretary of State on the fifteenth September 1845, to make the inquiry the Mexican government. The inquiwas made. and on the fifteenth of Oc-ber, 1845, the Minister of Foreign Af-irs of the Mexican government, in a ote addressed to our consul, gave a faorable response, requesting, at the same ime, that our naval force might be with-rawn from Vera Cruz while negotiations hould be pending. Upon the receipt of his note, our naval force was promptly ithdrawn from Vera Cruz. A minister as immediately appointed, and departed o Mexico. Every thing bore a promis-ng aspect for a speedy and peaceful ad-ustment of all our difficulties. At the ate of my annual message to Congress, n December last, no doubt was enterained that he would be received by the Mexican government, and the hope was herished that all cause of misunderstanding between the two countries would be peedily removed.---In the confident ope that such would be the result of his ission, I informed Congress that I fore-ore at that time to recommend such ulterior measures of redress for wrongs nd injuries we had so long borne, as it would have been proper to make, had no such negotiations been instituted." To my surprise and regret, the Mexican government, though solemnly pledged to do so, upon the arrival of our minister at Mexico, refused to receive and accredit him.---When he reached Vera Cruz, on the thirtieth of November, 1845, he found that the aspect of affairs had undergone an unhappy change. The government of General Herrara, who was at that time
President of the republic, was tottering to its fall.

General Paredes(a military leader)who had manifested his determination to overthrow the government of Herrera, by a military revolution, and one of the prin cipal means which he employed to effect his purpose, and render the government of Herrera odious to the army and people of Mexico, was by loudly condemning its determination to receive a minister of peace from the United States, alleging that it was the intention of Herrera, by a treaty with the United States, to dismember the territory of Mexico, by ceding away the department of Texas. The government of Herrera is believed to have been well disposed to a pacific adjustment of existing difficulties; but probably alarmed for its own security, and in order to ward off the danger of the revolution led by Paredes, violated its solemn agreement, and refused to receive or accredit our minister; and this, although informed that he had been invested in full power to adjust all questions in dispute between the two governments. Among the frivolous pre-texts for this refusal, the principal one was, that our minister had not gone upon a special mission, confined to the question of Texas alone, leaving all the outrages upon our flag and our citizens unredressed. The Mexican government well knew that both our national honor and the protection due to our citizens imperatively required that the two questions of boundary and indemnity should be treated of together, as na turally and inseparably blended, and they ought to have seen that this course was best calculated to enable the U. States to extend to them the most liberal justice.
On the thirtieth of December, 1845, General Herrera resigned the presidency, and yielded up the government to Gen. Paredes without a struggle. Thus a revolution was accomplished solely by the army commanded by Paredes, & the supreme power in Mexico passed into the hands of a military usurper, who was known to be bitterly hostile to the United States.

Although the prospect of a pacific adjustment with the new government was unpromising, from the known hostility of its head to the United States, yet, determined that nothing should be left undone on our part to restore friendly relations between the two countries, our minister was instructed to present his credentials to the new government, and ask to be accredited by it in the diplomatic character in which he had been commissioned. These instructions he executed by his note on first of March, 1846, addressed to the Mexican Minister, of Foreign Affairs, but his request was insultingly refused by that minister in his answer of the twelfth of the same month. No alternative remained for our minister but to demand his passports, and return to the United States.

Thus was the extraordinary spectable presented to the civilized world, of a government, in violation of its own express agreement, having twice rejected a minister of peace, invested with full powers to adjust all the existing difference between the two counties in a manner just and honorable to both. I am not aware that modern history presents a parallel case, in which, in time of peace, one nation has refused even to hear propositions from another for terminating existing difficulties between them.

Scarcely a hope of adjusting our difficulties a remote day, a hope [illegible]

with Mexico, could be cherished while Paredes remained at the head of the government. He had acquired the supreme power by a military revolution, and upon the most solemn pledges to wage war against the United States, and to reconquer Texas, which he claimed as a revolted province of Mexico. He had denounced as guilty of treason all those Mexicans who consider Texas as no longer constituting a part of the territory of Mexico, and who were friendly to the cause of peace. The duration of the war which he waged against the United States was indefinite, because the end which he proposed, of the reconquest of Texas, was hopeless. Besides there was good reason to believe, from all his conduct, that it was his intention to convert the republic of Mexico into a monarchy and to call a foreign European prince to the throne. Preparatory to this end, he had, during his short rule, destroyed the liberty of the press, tolerating that portion of it only which openly advocated the establishment of a monarchy. The better to secure the success of his ultimate designs, he had, by an arbitrary decree, convoked a Congress—not to be elected by the free voice of the people, but to be chosen in a manner to make them subservient to his will, and to give him absolute control over their deliberations.

Under all these circumstances, it was believed that any revolution in Mexico founded upon opposition to the ambitious projects of Paredes, would tend to promote the cause of peace, as well as prevent any attempted European interference in the affairs of the North American continent—both objects of deep interest to the United States. Any such foreign interference, if attempted, must have been resisted by the United States. My views upon that subject were fully communicated to Congress in my last annual message. In any event, it was certain that no change whatever in the government of Mexico which would deprive Paredes of power could be for the worse, so far as the United States was concerned, whilst it was highly probable any change must be for the better.

This was the state of affairs existing when Congress, on the 13th of May last, recognized the existence of the war which had been commenced by the government of Paredes; and it became an object of much importance, with a view to a speedy settlement of our difficulties and the restoration of an honorable peace, that Paredes should not retain power in Mexico.

Before that time there were symptoms of a revolution in Mexico, favored, as it was understood to be, by the more liberal party, and especially by those who were opposed to foreign interference, and to the monarchial form of government. Santa Anna was then an exile in Havanna, having been expelled from power and banished from his country by a revolution which occurred in December. 1844; but it was known that he had still a considerable party in his favor in Mexico. It was also equally well known that no vigilance which could be exerted by our squadron would, in all probability have prevented him from effecting a landing somewhere on the extensive gulf coast of Mexico, if he had desired to return to his country. He had openly professed an entire change of policy; had expressed his regret that he had subverted the federal constitution of 1824, and avowed that he was now in favor of its restoration. He had publicly declared his hostility, in the strongest term to the establishment of a monarchy, and to European interference in the affairs of his country. Information to this effect had been received from sources believed to be reliable, at the date of the recognition of the existence of the war by Congress, and was afterwards fully confirmed by the receipt of the despatch of our consul in the city of Mexico, with the accompanying documents, which are herewith transmitted. Besides, it was reasonable to suppose that he must see the ruinous consequences to Mexico of a war with the United States, and that it would be his interest to favor peace.

It was under these circumstances and upon these considerations that it was deemed expedient not to obstruct his return to Mexico, should he attempt to do so. Our object was the restoration of peace; and with that view, no reason was perceived why we should take part with Paredes, and aid him, by means of our blockade, in preventing the return of his rival to Mexico. On the contrary, it was believed that the intestine divisions which ordinary sagacity could not but anticipate as the fruit of Santa Anna's return to Mexico, and his contest with Paredes, might strongly tend to produce a disposition with both parties to restore and preserve peace with the United States. Paredes was a soldier by profession, and a monarchist in principle. He had but recently before been successful in a military revolution, b which he had obtained power He was the sworn enemy of the United States with which he had involved his country in the existing war. Santa Anna, who had been expelled from power by the army, was known to be in open hostility to Paredes, and publicly pledged against foreign intervention and the restoration of monarchy in Mexico. In view of these facts and circumstances, it was, that when orders were issued to the commander of our naval forces in the Gulf, on the fifteenth day of May last, only two days after the existence of the war had been recognised by Congress, to place the coasts of Mexico under blockade, he was directed not to obstruct the passage of Santa Anna to Mexico, should he attempt to return.

A revolution took place in Mexico in the early part of August following, by which the power of Paredes was over thrown, and he has since been banished from the country, and is now in exile. Shortly afterwards, Santa Anna returned. It remains to be seen whether his return may not yet prove to be favorable to a pacific adjustment of the existing difficulties, it being manifestly his interest not to persevere in the prosecution of a war commenced by Paredes, to accomplish a purpose so absurd as the reconquering of Texas to the Sabine. Had Paredes remained in power, it is morally certain that any pacific adjustment would have been hopeless.

Upon the commencement of hostilities by Mexico against the United States, the indignant spirit of the nation was at once aroused. Congress promptly esponded to the expectations of the country and, by the act of the thirteenth of May last, recognized the fact that war existed by the act of Mexico; between the United States and that republic, and granted the means necessary for its vigorous prosecution. Being involved in a war thus commenced by Mexico, and for the justice of which, on our part, we may confidently appeal to the whole world, I resolved to prosecute it with the utmost vigor. Accordingly the ports of Mexico, on the Gulf and on the Pacific have been placed under blockade, and her territory invaded at several important points. The reports from the Departments of War and the Navy will inform you, more in detail, of the measures adopted in the emergency in which our country was placed, and of the gratifying results which have been accomplished.

The various columns of the army have performed their duty under great disadvantages, with the most distinguished skill and courage. The victories of Palo Alto, and Resaca de la Palma, and of Monterey, won against greatly superior numbers, and against most decided advantages in other respects on the part of the enemy, were brilliant in their execution, and entitle our brave officers and soldiers to the grateful thanks of their country. The nation deplores the loss of the brave officers and men who have gallantly fallen while vindicating and defending their country's rights and honor.

It is a subject of pride and satisfaction that our volunteer citizen soldiers, who so promptly responded to their country's call, with an experience of the discipline of a camp of only a few weeks, have borne their part in the hard fought battle of Monterey with a constancy and courage equal to that of veteran troops, and worthy of the highest admiration. The privations of long morches through the enemy's country, and through a wilderness, have been borne without a murmur. By rapid movemenis the province of New Mexico, with Santa Fe, its capital, has been captured without bloodshed.

The navy has co-operated with the army, and rendered important services: if not so brilliant, it is because the enemy had no force to meet them on their own element, and because of the defences which nature has interposed in the difficulties of the navigation on the Mexican coast. Our squadron in the Pacific, with the co-operation of a gallant officer of the army, and a small force hastily collected in that distant country, have acquired bloodless possession of the Californias, and the American flag has been raised at every important point in that province.

I congratulate you on the success which has thus attended our military and naval operation. In less than seven moths after Mexico commenced hostilities, at a time selected by herself, we have taken possession of many of her principal ports, driven back and pursued her invading army, and acquired military possession of the Mexican provinces of New Mexico New Leon, Coahuila, Tamaulipas, and Californias, a territory larger in extent than that embraced in the original thirteen States of the Union, inhabited by a considerable population, and much of it more than a thousand miles from the points at which we had to collect our forces and commence our movements: By the blockade, the import and export trade of the enemy has been cut off.

Well may the American people be proud of the energy and gallantry of our regular and volunteer officers and soldiers. The events of these few months afford a gratifying proof that our country can, under any emergency, confidently rely for the maintenance of her honor, and the defence of her rights, on an effective force, ready at all times voluntarily to relinquish the comforts of home for the perils and privations of the camp.

And though such a force may be for the time extensive, it is in the end economical, as the ability to command it removes the necessity of employing a large standing army in time of peace and proves that our people love their institutions, and are ever ready to defend and protect them.

Whilst the war was in a course of vigorous and successful prosecution, being still auxious to arrest its evils, and considering that, after the brilliant victories of our arms on the eight and ninth of May last, the national honor could not be compromitted by it, another overture was made to Mexico, by my direction, on the twenty seventh of July last, to terminate hostilities by a peace just and honorable to both countries. On the thirty-first of August following, the Mexican government declined to accept this friendly overture, but referred it to the decision of a Mexican Congress, to be assembled in the early part of the present month. I communicate to you, herewith, a copy of the letter of the Secretary of State proposing to re-open negotiations, of the answer of the Mexican government, and of the reply thereto of the Secretary of State.

The war will continued to be prosecuted with vigor, as the best means of securing peace. It is hoped that the decision of the Mexican Congress, to which our last overture has been refered, may result in a speedy and honorable peace. With our experience, however, of the unreasonable course of the Mexican authorities it is the part of wisdom not to relax in the energy of our military operations until the result is made known. In this view, it is deemed important to hold military possession of all the provinces which have been taken, until a definite treaty of peace shall have been concluded and ratified by the two countries.

The war has not been waged with a view to conquest; but having been commenced by Mexico, it has been carried into the enimy's country, and will be vigorously prosecuted there with a view to obtain an honorable peace, and thereby secure ample indemnity for the expenses of the war, as well as of our much injured citizens, who hold large pecuniary demands against Mexico.

By the laws of nations a conquerred territories, subject to be governed by the conqueror during his military possession, and until there is either a treaty of peace, or he shall voluntarily withdraw from it. The old civil government being necessarily superseded, it is the right and duty of the conqueror to secure his conquest, and provide for maintenance of civil order and the rights of the inhabitants. This right has been exercised, and this duty performed, by our military and naval commandments, by the establishment of temporary governments in some of the conquered provinces in Mexico, assimilating them as far as practicable to the free institutions of our own country. In the provinces of New Mexico, and of the Californias, little if any further resistence is apprehended from the inhabitants to the temporary governments which have thus, from the necessity of the case, and according to the laws of war, been established. It may be proper to provide for the security of these important conquests by making an adequate appropriation for the purpose of erecting fortifications and defraying the expenses necessarily incident to the maintenance of our possession and authority over them.

Near the close of your last session, for reasons communicated to Congress, I deemed it important, as a measure for securing a speedy peace with Mexico, that a sum of money should be appropriated and placed in the power of the Executive, similar to that which had been made upon two former occasions, during the administration of President Jefferson.

On the twenty-sixth of Febuary, 1803, an appropriation of two millions of dollars was made, and placed at the disposa of the President. Its object is well known if was at that time in contemplation to acquire Louisiana from France, and it was intended to be applied as a part of this consideration which might be paid for that territory. On the thirtenth of February, 1806, the same sum was in like manner appropriated, with a view to the purchsse of the Floridas from Spain.

These appropriations were made to facilitate negotiations, and as a means to enable the President to accomplish the important objects in view. Though it did not become necessary for the President to use these appropriations, yet a state of things might have arisen in which it would have been highly important for him to do so, and the wisdom of making them cannot be doubted. It is believed that the measure recommended at your last session met with the approbation ndecided majorities in both Houses of Congress. Indeed, in different forms, a bill making an appropriation of two millions of dollars passed each House, and it is much to be regretted that it did not become a law. The reasons which induced me to recommend the measure at that time still exist; and I again submit the subject for your consideration, and suggest the importance of early action upon it. Should the appropriation be made, and be not needed, it will remain in the treasury; should it be deemed proper to apply it in whole or in part, it will be accounted for as other public expenditures.

Immediately after Congress had recognized the existence of the war with Mexico, my attention was directed to the danger that privateers might be fitted out in the ports of Cuba and Porto Rico to prey upon the commerce of the United States, and I invited the special attenion of the Spanish government to the fourteenth article of our treaty with that power of the twentieth of October, 1795, under which the citizens and subjects of either nation who shall take commissions or letters of marque to act as privateers against the other "shall be punished as pirates."

It affords me pleasure to inform you that I have received assurances from the Spanish government, that this article of the treaty shall be faithfully observed on its part. Orders for his purpose were immediately transmitted from that government to the authorities of Cuba and Porto Rico to exert their utmost vigilance in preventing any attempts to fit our privateers in those islands against the United States. From the good faith of Spain I am fully satisfied that this treaty will be executed in its spirit as well as its oetter; whilst the United States will, on their part, faithfully perform all the obligations which it imposes in them.

Information has been recently received at the Department of State that the Mexican government has sent to Havana blank commissions to privateers, and blank certificates of naturalization, signad by Gen. Salas, the present head of the Mexican government. There is also reason to apprehend that similar documents have been sent to other parts of the world.—Copies of these papers, in translation, are herewith transmitted.

As the preliminaries required by the practice of Nations for commissioning privateers and regulating their conduct, appear not to have been observed, and as these commissions are in the blank to be filled up with the names of citizens and subjects of all nations, who will be willing to purchase them, the whole proceeding can only be construed as an invitation to all the freebooters on earth, who are will to pay for the privilege of cruzing against American commerce.—It will be for our courts of justice to decide whether, under such circumstances, these Mexican letters of marque and reprisal shall protect those who accept them, and commit robberies upon the high seas, from the pains and penalties of piracy.

If the certificates of naturalization thus granted, be intended by Mexico to shield Spanish subjects from the guilt and punishment of piracy, under our treaty with Spain; they will certainly prove unavailing. Such a subterfuge would be but a weak device to defeat the provisions of a solemn treaty.

I recommend that Congress should immediately provide for trial ank punishment as pirates of Spanish subjects, who escaping the vigilance of their sovereign, shall be found guilty of privateering against the U. S. Our navy will be constantly on the alert to protect ourcommerce.

Besides, in case prizes should be made of American vessels, the utmost vigilance will be exerted by our blockading squadron to prevent the captors from taking them into Mexican ports, and it is not apprehended that any nation will violate its neutrality by suffering such prizes to be condemned and sold within its jurisdiction.

I recommend that Congress should immediately provide by law for granting letters of marque and reprisal against vessels under the Mexican flag. It is true that there are but few, if any, commercial vessels of Mexico upon the high seas; and it is therefore not probable that many American privateers would be fitted out in case a law should pass authorizing this mode of warfare. It is, notwithstanding, certain that such privateers may render good service to the commercial interests of the country, by recapturing our merchant ships, should any be taken by armed vessels under the Mexican flag, as well as capturing these vessels themselves. Every means within our power should be rendered available for the protection of our commerce.

The annual report of the Sec. of the Treasury will exhibit a detailed statement of the condition of the finances The imports for the fiscal year ending on the thirtieth of June last, were of the value of one hundred and twenty-one million six hundred and ninety-nine thousand seven hundred and ninety seven dollars: of which the amount exported was eleven million three hundred and forty-six thousand six hundred and twenty-three dollars; leaving the amount remaining in the country for domestic consumption one hundred and ten million three hundred and forty-five thousand one hundred and seventy four dollars. The value of the exports for the same period was one hundred and thirteen million four hundred and eighty-eight thousand five hundred and sixteen dollars: of which one hundred and two million one hundred and forty one thousand eight hundred and ninety-three dollars consisted of domestic productions, and eleven million three hundred and forty-six thousand six hundred and twenty three dollars of foreign articles.

The receipts into the treasury for the same year were twenty-nine million four hundred and nenety-nine thousand two hundred and forty-seven dollars and six cents; of which there were derived from customs twenty-six million seven hundred and twelve thousand six hundred and sixty-seven dollars and eighty seven cents; from sales of public lands two million six hundred and ninety-four thousand four hundred and fifty-two dollars and forty eight cents and from incidental and miscellaneous sources ninety two thousand one hundred and twenty-six dollars and seventy one cents. The expenditures for the same period were twenty-eight million thirty-one thousand one hundred and fourteen dollars and twenty cents, and the balance in the treasury on the first day of July last was nine million one hundred and twenty-six thousand four hundred and thirty-nine dollars and eight cents.

The amont of the public debt, including treasury notes on the first of the present month was twenty fourmillion two hundred and fifty six thousand one hundred and ninety four dollars and sixty two cents; of which the sum of seventeen millions seven hundred and eighty-eight thousand seven hundred and ninety-nine dollars and sixty-two cents outstanding on the fourth o March, 1845, leaving the amount incurred since that time six millions four hundred and sixty-seven thousand six hundred and ninety four dollar, and ninety-eight cents.

In order that to prosecute the war with Mexico with vigor and energy, as the best means of bringing it to a speedy and honorable termination, a further loan will be necessary, to meet the expenditures for the present and the next fiscal year, and if the war should be continued until the thirtieth of June 1842—being the end of the next fiscal year—it is estimated that an additional loan of twenty three millions of dollars will be required. This estimate is made upon the assumption that it will be necessary to retain constantly in the treasury four millions of dollars to guard against contingencies If such surplus were not required to be retained then a loan of nineteen millions of dollars would be sufficient. If however, Congress should at the present session, impose a revenue duty on the principal articles now embraced in the free list it is estimated that an additional annual revenue of about two millions and a half, amounting it is estimated on the thirtieth of June, 1848, to four millions of dollars, would be derived from that source and the loan required would be reduced by that amount.

It is estimated, also, that should Congress graduate and reduce the price of such of the public lands as have been long in the market, the additional revenue derived from that source would be annually for several years to come, between half a million and a million of dollars; and the loan required may be reduced by that amount also. Should these measures be adopted, the loan required would not probably exceed eighteen or nineteen millions of dollars—leaving in the treasury a constant surplus of four millions of dollars. The loan proposed, it is estimated will be sufficient to cover the necessary expenditures both for the war and for all other purposes, up to the thirtieth of June, 1848; and an amount of this loan not exceeding one half, may be required during the present fiscal year, and the greater part of the remainder during the first half of the fiscal year succeeding.

In order that timely notice may be given, and proper measures taken to effect the loan, or such portion of it as may be required, it is important that the authority of Congress to make it be given at an early period of your present session. It is suggested that the loan should be contracted for a period of twenty years, with authority to purchase the stock and pay it off at an early period, at its market value, out of any surplus which may at any time be in the treasury applicable to that purpose. After the establishment of peace with Mexico, it is supposed that a considerable surplus will exist, and that the debt may be extinguished in a much shorter period than that for which it may be contracted. The period of twenty years as that for which it may be contracted, in preference to a shorter period, is suggested, because all experience, both at home and abroad, has shown that loans are effected upon much better terms upon a long time, than when they are reimbursable at short dates.

Necessary as this measure is, to sustain the honor and the interests of the country engaged in a foreign war, it is not doubt-but that Congress will promptly authrize it.

The balance in the treasury on the first of July last exceeded nine millions of dollars, notwithstanding considerable expenditures had been made for the war during the months of May and June preceding. But for the war, the whole public debt could and would have been extinguished within a short period; and it it was a part of my settled policy to do so, and thus relieve the people from its burden, and place the government in a position which would enable it to reduce the public expenditures to that economical standard which is most consistent with the general welfare, and the pure and wholesome progress of our institutions.

Among our just causes of complaint against Mexico, arising out of her refusal to treat for peace, as well before as since the war so unjustly commenced on her part, are the extraordinary expenditures in which we have been involved. Justice to our own people will make it proper that Mexico should be held responsible for these expenditures.

Economy in the public expenditures is at all times a high duty which all public functionaries of the government owe to the people. This duty becomes the more imperative in a period of war, when large and extraordinary expenditures become unavoidable.—During the existence of the war with Mexico all our resources should be husbanded, and no appropriations made except such as are absolutely necessary for its vigorous prosecution and the due administration of the government. Objects of appropriation, which in peace may be deemed useful or proper, but which are not indispensable for the public service, may, when the country is engaged in a foreign war, be well postponed to a future period. By the observance of this policy at your present session, large amounts may be saved in the treasury, and be applied to objects of pressing and urgent necessity, and thus the creation of a corresponding amount of public debt may be avioded.

It is not meant to recommend that the ordinary and necessary appropriations for the support of government should be withheld, but is well known that at every session of Congress appropriations are proposed for numerous objects which may or may not be made without materially affecting the public interests; and these it is recommended should not be granted.

The act passed at your last session "reducing the duties on imports" not having gone into operation until the first of the present month, there has not been time for its practical effect upon the revenue, and the business of the country, to be developed. Is it not doubted, however, that the just policy which adopts will add largely to our foreign trade, and promote the general prosperity. Although it cannot be certainly foreseen what amount of revenue it will yield, it is estimated that it will exceed that produced by the act of 1842, which it superseded. The leading principles established by it are, to levy taxes with a view to raise revenue, and to impose them upon the articles imported according to their actual value.

The act of 1842, by the excessive rates of duty which it imposed on many articles, either totally excluded them from importation, or greatly reduced the amount imported, and thus diminished instead of producing revenue. By it the taxes were imposed, not for the legitimate purpose of raising revenue, but to afford advantages to favored classes, at the expense of a large majority of their fellow-citizens. Those employed in agriculture, mechanical pursuits, commerce and navigation, were compelled to contribute from their substance to swell the profits and overgrown wealth of the comparatively few who had invested their capital in manufactures.

The taxes were not levied in proportion to the value of the articles upon which they were imposed; but, widely departing from this just rule, the lighter taxes were, in many cases, levied upon articles of luxury and high price, and the heavy taxes on those of necessity and low price, consumed by the great mass of the people. It was a system, the inevitable effect of which was to relieve favored classes and the wealthy few from contributing their just proportion for the support of government, and to lay the burden on the labor of the many, engaged in other pursuits than manufactures.

A system so unequal and unjust has been superceded by the existing law, which imposes duties, not for the benefit or injury of classes or pursuits, but distributes, and, as far as practicable, equalizes the public burdens among all classes and occupations. The favored classes, who, under the unequal and unjust system which has been repealed, have heretofore realized large profits, and many of them amassed large fortunes, at the expense of the many who have been made tributary to them, will have no reason to complain if they shall be required to bear their just proportion of the taxes necessary for the support of government. So far from it, it will be perceived, by an examination of the existing law, that discriminations in the rates of duty imposed, within the revenue principle, have been retained in their favor.

The incidental aid against foreign competition which they still enjoy, gives them an advantage which no other pursuits possess, but of this none others will complain, because the duties levied are necessary for revenue. These revenue duties, including freights and charges, which the importer must pay before he can come in competition with the home manufacturer in our markets, amount, on nearly all our leading branches of manufacture, to more than one third of the value of the imported article, and in some cases to almost one-half its value. With such advantages, it is not doubted that our domestic manufacturers will continue to prosper, realizing in well conducted establishments even greater profits than can be derived from any other regular business. Indeed, so far from requiring the protection of even incidental revenue duties, our manufacturers in several leading branches are extending their business, giving evidence of great ingenuity and skill, and of their ability to compete, with increased prospect of success, for the open market of the world. Domestic manufactures, to the value of several millions of dollars, which cannot find a market at home, are annually exported to foreign countries. With such rates of duty as these, established by the existing law, the system will probably be permanent; and capitalists, who have made, or shall hereafter make, their investments in manufactures, will know upon what to rely.

The country will be satisfied with these rates, because the advantages which the manufacturers still enjoy result necessarily from the collection of revenue for the support of government. High protective duties, from their unjust operation upon the masses of the people, cannot fail to give rise to extensive dissatisfaction and complaint, and to constant efforts to change or repeal them, rendering all investments in manufactures uncertain and precarious. Lower and more permanent rates of duty, at the same time that they will yield to the manufacturer fair and remunerating profits will secure him against the danger of frequent changes in the system, which cannot fail to ruinously affect his interests.

Simultaneously with the relaxation of the restrictive policy by the United States, Great Britain, from whose example we derived the system, has relaxed hers. She has modified her corn laws, and reduced many other duties to moderate revenue rates. After ages of experience, the statesmen of that country have been constrained by a stern necessity, and by a public opinion having its deep foundation in the sufferings and wants of the impoverished millions, to abandon a system, the effects of which were to build up immense fortunes in the hands of the few, and to reduce the laboring millions to pauperism and misery. Nearly in the same ratio that labor was depressed, capital was increased and concentrated by the British protective policy.

The evils of the system in Great Britain were at length rendered intolerable, and it has been abandoned, but not without a severe struggle on the part of the protected and favored classes to retain the unjust advantages which they have so long enjoyed. It was to be expected that a similar struggle would be made by the same classes in the United States, whenever an attempt was made to modify or abolish the same unjust system here. The protective policy had been in operation in the United States for a much shorter period, and its pernicious effects were not, therefore, so clearly perceived and felt. Enough, however, was known of these effects to induce its repeal.

It would be strange if, in the face of the example of Great Britain, our principal foreign customer, and of the evils of a system rendered manifest in that country by long and painful experience, and in the face of the immense advantages which, under a more liberal commercial policy we are already deriving, and must continue to derive, by supplying her starving population with food, the United States should restore a policy whice she has been compelled to abandon, and thus diminish her ability to purchase from us the food and other articles which she so much needs, and we so much desire to sell.

By the simultaneous abandonment of the protective policy by Great Britain and the United States, new and important markets have already been opened for our agricultural and their products; commerce and navigation have received a new impulse; labor and trade have been released from the artificial trammels which have so long fettered them; and to a great extent reciprocity, in the exchange of commodities, has been introduced at the same time by both countries and greatly for the benefit of both. Great Britain has been forced, by the pressure of circumstances at home, to abandon a policy which has been upheld for ages, and to open her markets for the immense surplus of bread-stuffs; and it is confidently believed that other powers of Europe will ultimately see the wisdom, if they be not compelled by the pauperism and suffering of their crowded population, to pursue a similar policy.

Our farmers are more deeply interested in maintaining the just and liberal policy of the existing law than any other class of our citizens. They constitute a large majority of our population, and it is well known that when they prosper, all other pursuits prosper also. They have therefore not only received none of the bounties or favors of government, but, by the unequal operations of the protective policy, have been made, by the bundens of taxation which it imposed, to contribute to the bounties which have enriched others.

When a foreign as well as a home market is opened to them, they must receive as they are now receiving, increased prices for their pridects. They will find a readier sale, and at better prices, for their wheat flour, rice, Indian corn, beef, pork, lard, butter, cheese, and other articles, which they produce. The home market alone is inadequate to enable them to dispose of the immense surplus of food and other articles which they are capable of producing, even at the most reduced prices, for the manifest reason that they cannot be consumed in the country. The United States can, from their immense surplus, supply nor only the home demand, but the deficiencies of food required by the whole world.

That the reduced production of some of the chief articles of food in Great Britain, and other parts of Europe; may have contributed to increase the demand for our breadstuffs and provisions, is not doubted: but that the great and efficient cause of this increased demand, and of increased prices, consists in the removal of artificial restrictions heretofore imposed, is deemed to be equally certain: That our exports or food, already increased and increasing beyond former example, under the more liberal policy which has been adopted, will be still vastly enlarged, unless they be checked or prevented by a restoration of the protective policy, cannot be doubted. That our commercial and navigating interests will be enlarged it a corresponding ratio with the increase of our trade is equally certain; while our manufacturing interests will still be the favored interests of the country, and receive the incidental protection afforded them by revenue duties; and more than this they cannot justly demand.

In my annual message of December last, a tariff of revenue duties based upon the principles of the existing law was recommended, and I have seen no reason to change the opinions then expressed.—In view of the probable beneficial effects of that law, I recommend that the policy established by it be maintained. It has but just commenced to operate: and to abandon or modify it without giving it a fair trial, would be inexpedient and unwise. Should defects in any of its details be ascertained by actual experience to exist, these may be hereafter corrected; but until such defects shall become manifest, the act should be fairly tested.

It is submitted for your consideration whether it may not be proper, as a war measure, to impose revenue duties on some of the articles now embraced in the free list. Should it be deemed proper to impose such duties, with a view to raise revenue to meet the expenses of the war with Mexico, or to avoid to that extent the creation of a public debt, they may be repealed when the emergency which gave rise to them shall cease to exist, and constitute no part of the permanent policy of the country.

The act of the sixth of August last, to provide for the better organization of the treasury, and for the collection, safe-keeping, transfer, and disbursement of the public revenue," has been carried into execution as rapidly as the delay necessarily arising out of the appointment of new officers, taking and approving their bonds, and preparing and securing proper places for the safe-keeping of the public money, would permit. It is not proposed to depart in any respect from the principles or policy on which this great measure is founded.

There are, however, defects in the details of the measure, developed by its practical operation, which are fully set forth in the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, to which the attention of Congress is invited. These defects would inpair to some extent the successful operation of the law at all times, but are especially embsrrassing when the country is engaged in a war, when the expenditures are greatly increased, when loans are to be effected, and the disbursements are to be made at points many hundred miles distant, in some cases, from any depository, and a large portion of them in a foreign country. The modifications suggested in the report of the Secretary of the Treasury are recommended to your favorable consideration.

In connection with this subject, I invite your attention to the importance of establishing a branch mint of the United States at New York. Two thirds of the revenue derived from customs being collected at that point, the demand for specie to pay the duties will be large; and a branch mint, where foreign coin and bullion could be immediately converted into American coin, would greatly facilitate the transaction of the public business, enlarge the circulation of gold and silver and be, at the same time, a safe depository of the public money.

The importance of graduating and reducing the price of such of the public lands as have been long offered in the market, at the minimum rate authorized by existing laws, and remain unsold, induces me again to recommend the subject to your favorable consideration. Many millions of acres have been offered in the market for more than thirty years, and larger quantities for more than ten or twenty years; and being of an inferior quality they must remain unsaleable for an indefinite period, unless the price at which they may be purchased shall be reduced. To place a price upon them above their real value is not only to prevent their sale, and thereby deprive the Treasury of any income from that source, but is unjust to the States in which they lie, because it retards their growth and increase of population, and because they have no power to levy a tax upon them as upon other lands within their limits, held by other proprietors than the United States, for the support of their local government.

The beneficial effects of the graduation principle have been realized by some of the States owning the Lands within their limits, in which it has been adopted. They have been demonstrated also by the United States acting as the trustee of the Chicknasaw tribe of Indians in the sale of their lands lying within the States of Mississippi and Alabama. The Chickasaw lads, which would not command in the market the minimum price established by the laws of the United States for the sale of their lands were, in pursuance of the treaty of 1834 with that tribe, subsequently offered for sale at graduated and reduced rates for limited periods. The result was, that large quantities of these lands were purchased, which would otherwise have remained unsold. The lands were disposed of at their real value, and many persons of limited means were enabled to purchase small tracts, upon which they have settled with their families. That similar results would be produced by the adoption of the graduation policy by the United States, in all the States in which they are the owners of large bodies of lands which have been long in the market cannot be, doubted. It cannot be a sound policy to withhold large quantities of the public lands from the use and occupation of our citizens, by fixing upon them prices which experience has shown they will not command.

On the contrary, it is a wise policy to afford facilities to our citizens to become the owners, at low and moderate rates, of freeholds of their own, instead of being the tenants and dependants of others.—If it be apprehended that these lands, if reduced in price, would be secured in large quantities by speculators or capitalists, the sales may be restricted, in limited quantities, to actual settlers or persons purchasing for purposes of cultivation.

In my last annual message, I submitted for the consideration of Congress the present system of managing the mineral lands in the U. S., and recommended that they should be brough into market and sold, upon such terms and under such restriction as Congress might prescribe. By the act of the 14th of July last, 'the reserved lead mines and contiguous lands in the State of Illinois and Arkansas and the territories of Wisconsin and Iowa,' were authorized to be sold----The act is confined in its operations to 'lead mines and contiguous lands.'

A large portion of the public lands containing copper and other ores is represented to be ver valuable, and I recommend that provision be made authorizing the conditions as their supposed value may, in the judgment of Congress he deemed advisable, having due regard to the interest of such of our citizens as may be located upon them.

The report of the Secretary of War contains detailed information relative to the several branches of the public service connected with that department. The operations of the arms have been of a satisfactory and highly gratifying character.

I recommend to your early and favorable consideration the measures proposed by the Secretary of War for speedily filling up the rank and file of the regular army, for its greater effieiency in the field and for raising an additional force to serve during the war with Mexico.

Embarrassment is likely to arise from want of legal provision authorizing compensation to be made to the agents employed in the several States and territories to pay to the revolutionary and other pensioners the amounts allowed them by law. Your attention is invited to the recommendations of the Secretary of War on this subject.

Our relations with the various Indian tribes continue to be of a pacific character. The unhappy dissensions which have existed among the Cherokees for many years past have been healed. Since my last annual message, important treaties have been negotiated with some of the tribes, by which the Indian title to large tracts of valuable land, within the limits of the States and territories have been extinguished and arrangements made for removing them to the country west of the Mississippi. Between three and four thousand, of different tribes, have been removed to the country provided for them by treaty stipulations, and arrangements have been made for others to follow.

In our intercourse with the several tribes, particular attention has been given to the subject of education. The number of schools established among them, has been increased and additional means provided, not only for teaching them the rudiments of education, but instructing them in agriculture and the mechanical arts.

I refer you to the report of the Secretary of Navy for a satisfactory view of the operations of the department under his charge during the past year. It is gratifying to perceive, that while the war with Mexico has rendered it necessary to employ an unusual number of our armed vessels on her coast, the protection due to our commerce in other quarters of the world has not prved insufficient. No means will be spared to give efficiency to the navy service in the prosecution of the war; and I am happy to know that the officers and men anxiously desire to devote themselves to the service of their country in any enterprise, however difficult of execution.

I recommend to your favorable consideration the propositon to add to each of our foreign squadrons an efficient sea steamer, and, as especially demanding attention,

POETRY.

SPEAK NO ILL.

BY CHARLES SWAIN.

Nay, speak no ill! a kindly word
Can never leave a sting behind,
And, oh! to breathe each tale we've heard
Is far beneath a noble mind,
Full oft a better seed is sown
By choosing thus the kinder plan;
For if but little good be known,
Still, let us speak the best we can.

Give me the heart that fain would hide—
Would fain another's fault efface;
How can it pleasure human pride
To prove humility but base?
No: let us reach a higher mood,
A noble estimate of man;
Be earnest in the search of good,
And speak of all the best we can.

Then speak no ill—but lenient be
To others' failings as your own;
If you're the first the fault to see,
Be not the first to make it known;
For life is but a passing day,
No lip may tell how brief its span,
Then, oh! the little time we stay,
Let's speak of all the best we can.

[BY REQUEST.]

THE GOSPEL SHIP.

The gospel ship along is sailing,
Bound for Canaan's peaceful shore;
All who wish to sail for glory,
Come and welcome,—rich and poor.

Glory, glory, hallelujah,
All the sailors loudly cry;
See the blissful ports of glory
Open to each wishful eye.

Thousands she has safely landed
Far beyond this mortal shore;
Thousands more are sailing on her,
And there's room for thousands more.
Glory, &c.

Waft along this noble vessel,
All ye gales of gospel grace;
Carrying all your faithful sailors
To the heavenly landing place.
Glory, &c.

Ye need not fear, this ship won't founder,
Though the raging billows roar;
Jesus Christ will safely guide her
To her distant happy shore.
Glory, &c.

Foes have tried to overturn her,
But their efforts proved in vain;
Guided by so great a Captain
Sail she must across the main.
Glory, &c.

Her sails are filled, and heavenly breezes
Swiftly waft this ship along;
All the sailors are rejoicing,
Glory bursts from every tongue.
Glory, &c.

Come poor sinners, get converted,
Sail with us o'er life's rough sea;
There with us you will be happy
Through a long eternity.
Glory &c.

THE GENERAL CONFERENCE AND SLAVERY.

NO. II.

Rev. Sir: If the General Conference of the Methodist Protestant Church should pass any resolution not authorized by the Constitution, or publish any decree unsupported by proof drawn from scripture or reason, ought the church receive its decision without examination, and implicitly submit to its authority? This, surely, is a very important question. As for myself I will say, it ought not. To say it ought, would be to act contrary to the principles upon which we, reformers as we were called, acted at the beginning—it would be to make the constitution of the new church a nullity—to abandon the exercise of reason—to reject the authority of the holy scriptures—to sacrifice the right of private judgment to a criminal submissiveness—and to open the door for the introduction of the most dangerous errors with which the ignorance, the prejudices, or the vices of men can deluge the church of Christ. It would be to place human authority above divine authority and exalt human beings, with all the weakness, ignorance and corruption of depraved human nature, "in the temple of God" as supreme in matters of religion. It is vain to set up the plea that, the General Conference never will act in such an unjust and unjustifiable manner as this: they have done so already, by passing a decree, which for literary philosophical, and theological errors, can not be surpassed by any author who advocates the authority of the church of Rome: "Keep it before the people." Keep it before the church. Never let it be forgotten till the Mississippi, the Father of rivers, drinks up all the springs by which its mighty stream is now supplied, that in less than 20 years since the organization of the Methodist Protestant Church, her General Conference has passed the following resolution.

"Resolved, That in the judgment of this General Conference the holding of slaves is under many circumstances a sin against God, and in such circumstances should be condemned by the Methodist Protestant Church: nevertheless, it is our opinion, that under some circumstances it is not sinful."

Were this resolution remarkable only for its vagueness, absurdity, and contradiction, faults which in a school boys' composition would be unpardonable, it should receive no notice from me: but it is remarkable for other qualities as involving principles of the most dangerous kind, and it is against these principles I solemnly protest. I protest against the resolution then because it brings us back to Romanism, and establishes the doctrine of tradition as the rule of the church.—It abolishes the distinction between right and wrong, just and unjust by making these qualities depend upon "circumstances." It supersedes the authority of God's word by placing the "opinion" of the General Conference in its stead. And it subjects the dissenters from this "opinion" to all the pains and penalties of persecution which the abolitionists can inflict on those who "hold slaves." Let us examine these points in order.

At the organization of this church in 1830, it assumed the name of the Methodist Protestant Church as being particularly expressive of its origin and its principles. By taking this name, the convention wished to perpetuate the history of the fact, that many of the leading men in her communion were expelled from the Methodist Episcopal church, for objecting against her government, and endeavoring to procure for the laity of that denomination a representative form of government. Being expelled for this cause, and not for immorality, the convention wished it to be known and remembered by generations yet unborn, that they thought that a church, which could excommunicate from her fellowship some of her most distinguished ministers and members merely for desiring a change in her government, was essentially tyrannical, and was justly comparable to the church of Rome in her sanguinary proceedings against those whom she called heretics. They are Protestants then in a double sense. They are Protestants in common with others who have borne that name since 1529 when those who adhered to the doctrine of Luther protested against a decree of the Emperor Charles V and the Diet of Spiers: and they are Methodist Protestants, because they have protested against the government of the Methodist Episcopal church as having any right to expel her ministers and members for desiring to obtain "representation."

But there is no magic in a name which will preserve from error; nor is it often there is consistency in those who assume it. Little did I think when, in the year 1824, under the signature of Martin Luther, I instituted a parallel between the government of the Methodist Episcopal Church and that of the Church of Rome, which parallel was published in the "Wesleyan Repository" vol. III, that I should have occasion, in a few years, to protest against an act of the G. C. of the Methodist Protestant Church, for giving an "opinion" on a subject that they had no right to meddle with; which opinion was not characterized by wisdom, justice or truth; which was pronounced without a particle of proof; published in the church paper; and if not intended, will unquestionably be appealed to, as the law of the church to regulate domestic slavery; and will be offered as authority to punish slaveholders.

The propensity of mankind to run into idolatry and superstition, and be governed by tradition in preference to the divine law, has been most awfully exemplified in the history of the chosen people of God. It is not, however, my intention to account for this propensity; I merely state the fact, and shall confine myself to the last particular as having a relation to the subject under consideration. "The Jews," says an author whose statement I presume will not be questioned, "own a two fold law; the first, the written law, which is recorded in the holy scriptures; and the second the oral law, which they have only by the tradition of their elders. And both these they say were given them by Moses form Mt. Sinai; of which the former was committed to writing, and the other delivered down to them from generation to generation by the tradition of the elders. And therefore holding them to be both of the same authority, as having both of them the same divine original, they think themselves to be bound as much by the latter as the former, or rather much more; for the written law is, they say, in many places obscure, scanty, and defective, and could be no perfect rule to them without the oral law; which according to them is a full, complete, and perfect interpretation of all that is written in the other, and supplies all the defects, and solves all the difficulties of it. And therefore they observe the written law no otherwise than according as it is expounded and interpreted by their oral law. And therefore they do in a manner lay aside the former to make room for the latter, and resolve their whole religion into their traditions, in the same manner as the Romanists do theirs, having no farther regard to the written word of God than as it agrees with their traditionary explications of it; but always prefering them thereto though in many particulars they are quite contrary to it; which is a corruption that had grown to a great height among them even in our Saviour's time; for he chargeth them with it (Mark VII. 13) that, "they made the word of God of none effect through their traditions." Prideaux's Connections. Vol. II. p. 94.

To the same point is the testimony of Father Calmet. He says:—"Jesus Christ in the gospel, often declared against the false traditions of the Pharisees. He reproached them for preferring these traditions to the law itself; for the observation of which they even violated the commandments of God: Mark VII. 7—10. Matt. XV. 1—4. For laying aside the commandment of God, ye hold the tradition of men.—Full well ye reject the commandment of God that ye may keep your own tradition. He gives several examples of their falsifications of the law, of their superstitious adherence to vain observances, while they neglected essential things. However the Pharisees and Jews have not abated their supercilious zeal for the traditions of their fathers; and those who have not a blind respect for them, or do not pay unlimited submission to them are looked upon as heretics. "Calmets' Dic." Art: Tradition.

The latter author, who was a distinguished member of the Romish Church, seems to plead for tradition when he says:—"The Christians also had their traditions, which they received from Jesus Christ, or his apostles. St. Paul 2. Thess. 11. 15. says: Therefore, brethren, stand fast, and hold the traditions which ye have been taught, whether by word or by our epistle. The ancient fathers acknowledged the truth and authority of the apostolical traditions, as well written as not. But they have not pretended that we must blindly receive as apostolical traditions all that may be put upon us as such. Reason and discretion teach us to distinguish the true from the false: we are obliged to admit of none but such as are approved of and authorised by general consent of the church." Ibid.

So then Father, "we are obliged to admit such as are approved of, and authorised by general consent of the church," are we? Assuredly, says the Roman Doctor. And who are the church? "The chief pastors either collected or dispersed," says the Romanist. "The divinely authorised expounders of God's word and administrators of discipline," says the Episcopal Methodist. The General Conference of the Methodist Protestant Church, says the resolution. For if it was not intended that all the members should be governed by its decision, for what purpose did the General Conference pronounce its solemn judgment."? The resolution, it is true, may differ a little in its phraseology from the language used by the Romanist, and from that of the Episcopal Methodist, but it is essentially the same with both. They all go to invest the priesthood with authority to judge for, and dictate to the members of the church; and having assumed this authority, the next step is to make those suffer who would dare to challenge their claim, or disobey their dictation. And what follows this assumed authority to judge and dictate? Hear it, and ponder it well in your hearts.

"The religion of Rome, which the pontiffs are so desirous of imposing upon the faith of all that bear the Christian name, is derived according to the unanimous accounts of its doctors, from two sources, the written word of God, and the unwritten, or in other words, from scripture and tradition. But as the most eminent divines of that church are far from being agreed concerning the person or persons who are authorized to interpret the declarations of these two oracles, and to determine their sense; so it may be asserted with truth, that there is, as yet, no possibility of knowing with certainty what are the real doctrines of the church of Rome, nor where in that communion, the judge of religious controversies is to be found. . . . The council of Trent was assembled, as was pretended, to correct, illustrate, and fix with perspicuity, the doctrine of the church, to restore the vigor of its discipline, and to reform the lives of ministers. But in the opinion of these who examine things with impartiality, this assembly, instead of reforming ancient abuses, rather gave rise to new enormities; and many transactions of this council have excited the just complaints of the wisest men in both communions. They complain that in any of the opinions of the scholastic doctrines in intricate points (that had formerly been left undecided, and had been wisely permitted as subjects of free debate,) were by this council, absurdly adopted as articles of faith, and recommended as such, nay imposed with violence upon the conscince of the people, under pain of excommunication." (How closely did the late General Conference of the Methodist Protestant Church imitate the proceedings of the council of Trent, in passing their resolution on domestic slavery. In the moment of excitement.) "While the tide of resentment ran high, they forgot themselves," says the historian, "in the most unaccountable manner. They permited their champions to indulge themselves openly in reflections injurious to the dignity of the sacred writings, and by an excess of blaspheming almost incredible (if the passions of men did not render them capable of the greatest enormities,) to declare publicly that the edicts of the pontiffs, and the words of oral tradition, were superior, in point of authority, to the express language of the holy scriptures." Mosheim's Eccl. His. Vol IV. pa. 202.

Another historian observes that at the first session of the Council of Trent the first thing to be determined was the authority of the holy scriptures. He says:—"In the first place, (for every thing was done very systematically,) the discussion turned on revelation itself, and the sources from which the knowledge of it is to be derived. Even at this early stage of the proceedings some voices were raised of a Protestant cast. The bishop Nachianti, of Chrossa, would hear of nothing but scripture: according to him, every thing was written in the Gospel that was necessary to salvation. But he had an enormous majority against him. The resolution was passed, that the unwritten traditions received from the mouth of Christ Himself, and propagated through succeeding times down to the most recent, under the protection of the Holy Spirit, were to be received with like reverence as holy writ." Ranke's His. of the Popes, p. 56.

It may not have been the intention of the late General Conference, in passing this obnoxious resolution to plunge into Romanism; but I appeal to every Protestant reader if they have not done it, by establishing this resolution as the rule by which the church is to be governed in its decisions on domestic slavery. This being the case, we have now two rules, the written and unwritten; or the scriptures and tradition for our government nor can we entertain a doubt for a moment to which of these two the greater deference will be paid.—History has already determined this matter, as the extracts abundantly prove. For centuries before the coming of Christ, the Jews regarded tradition as of more binding force than the commandments of God; and for their rigid attachment to their traditions, He frequently, when on earth, reproached their nation. In the Roman Church also, tradition is considered as of greater obligation than the scriptures; or rather, the one is observed as being of paramount authority, and the other as having, of itself, no authority at all. Let our church then protest against the decision of the late General Conference on the subject of domestic slavery; or let them renounce the name of Methodist Protestant and assume a more appropriate name.

[Br. Thomas, whose letter we publish below, has been one of the warmest friends, and most liberal supporters of the Methodist Protestant Church, from its first organization. For many years we have enjoyed his society, and our soul has been knit to his, as the soul of Jonathan to the soul of David. Our sentiments and feelings have concurred upon almost every subject. In the present instance however, we have not been led to the same conclusions, or convictions of duty with our brother. But we have an undiminished assurance of his sincerity and honesty of purpose. We differ from our brother here, but we publish his article because he slanders or reproaches no man,—and because he is still as he has been from the first, an advance paying subscriber for the Western Recorder, and an efficient agent too, without receiving ought for his agency. LETTER FROM BR. JOHN H. THOMAS.

Br. Bassett. Having to remit some money to you for myself and others, I request a little space in your paper, (in as much as you have declared it a free press,) to give my convictions on the doings of the church, as regards its action on slavery.—The M. P. Church has existed, and been in active operation, for at least sixteen years; and ten or twelve years of that time, the church in her Annual Conferences, as well as General, has been laboring either really or designedly, (and perhaps both) for a proper adjustment of the question of Slavery. Its removal has been sought for, as an evil above all others, either national, or religious, and which is condemned by Wesley: Clark and others in the church: and Lafayette, Washington, Franklin, Jefferson, and others in the State. I say Slavery!! And particularly American Slavery!! That system which reduces a human being to property, thereby bringing him on a level with a brute; subject to be sold in the shambles, and torn from each others embraces, Father, Mother, children, brothers, sisters, friends, feelings disregarded. Now the church is a unit, though divided into geographical or sectional parts, having for its centre of action a Gen. Conference, and it is now ascertained, satisfactorily at least to some, that slavery is so interwoven into the constitution of the church, that there is no other way in the bounds of probability, to get clear, or regulate that matter only in the Gen. Conference; the pretended powers vested with the respective Annual Conferences to the contrary notwithstanding. Of this there is abundant proof, as latterly manifested by the action of the late Annual Conferences.—Has not the church in the North anticipated, yea, has she not been promised by brethren, (and I trust sincerely too) from one General Conference to another, that this difficulty would be adjusted? Brethren have been induced to hold on in the church, with a pleasing expectation, that all would be right.—You know my brother this to be the case, and if I mistake not, you were amongst those very men: but it looks very much, and I think a comparable case with the following: a sinner when convinced of his condition and of his duty, puts off his return to God, and discharge of duty from time to time, he finally becomes careless, and his first convictions wear off or become weaker, till finally he gives out the idea entirely at least for the present, of reforming: So it is with that Slavery question. Brethren, many of them heretofore, have felt the fire of liberty burning in their bones, and have been to all appearance much ahead of your correspondent in the slavery matter that now finds such a jewel, such a connective virtue in slavery, that they cannot bear to be separated from it, and although they may pass resolutions in the Annual Conferences as they please, virtually dissolving all fellowship with the South on this subject, as is the case of the Wabash Annual Conference, and others, (for if annual conference should pass an act conflicting with that of the Gen. Conference, the said Gen. Conference can disannual it) they the an. con. can say, 'You naughty slaveholding brethren, you cannot join our church North, you cannot preach in our pulpits, we cannot receive the sacrament from your hands, in a word we cannot fellowship you here in our churches, but we cannot leave you, we will meet you in General Conference, we will sit with you there, we can fellowship you there, but we cannot at home, therefore saying in a word, if there is any virtue in such a course at home, that virtue is lost, by the act of going abroad. Now as long as you go no farther than this, but stick to their skirts in a Gen. Con. it will all be well. O! my brethren where is our consistency? May God have mercy upon us. Well, I have remarked that, there is no other way to adjust the principle of Slavery as it exists in the M. P. Church, only in the General Conference, and this the brethren in the South know very well, and they know that the resolution offered by Br. Reese and passed in the late Gen. Conference was good for nothing, (as was remarked by one to the other) only to throw dust in the eyes of the Northern brethren for the present: of this we are well aware. Our Northern brethren have discovered this, and rather than part with the Southern portion of the church, take for choice to hold on to her connection with slavery. The Gen. Conference has refused to have anything to do with it, (Slavery) the An. Conferences find they cannot do anything to get clear of it in any other way, but to withdraw, and this they cannot consent to do, hence the anti-slavery brethren are left to the only alternative, to remain with, and in connection with a slaveholding church or withdraw, and do the best they can. Well brethren, I have been a member of the M. P. Church since 1831—organized at Br. T. Fall's, five of us there united under the administration of Br. McGuire, the only class known of Methodist Protestants in all this region West of the Great Miami River, and though I may have been an unworthy member, the church has elevated me to where I was not (as an official member) when I united with her. I have labored for her in mind, time, body, and money. I have labored to organize classes, to receive members to the body, and the conversion of souls, and when after becoming acquainted how the church was connected with Slavery, (that which is one amongst the vilest evils under the bright luminary of day) I have labored with all my little stock of talent, for the respect I had for the church, the honor of God's cause, and the peace of the brotherhood, to have the evil removed from us; but now my hope is gone, forever gone, of having the matter adjusted in the church, unless driven by necessity, and then who thanks her? God loves, yes, he requireth a free will offering. I trust the church will not be so presumptuous as to continue to say, wait brethren until another Gen. Conference, for so far as that is concerned, the question is settled: well wait till our next An. Conference, then something no doubt will be done.—This wont do, we have had enough of such inducements.—The church is like, as was said of old, Ephraim is joined to his Idols, let him alone: Or Ichabod is written on her forehead. I do trust the church will arouse, before it is too late, and not be found chuckling to the principle of slavery.—In concluding, I would just say to the brethren on Twin creek Circuit, that I decline acting in any official capacity on said circuit, and at the earliest opportunity I expect to take my leave of them, though we have lived together for some years, I trust in all good conscience. Some have been discouraged, and detered from separating from the slavery portion of the church, on account, as they say of having to fight the battle of liberty over again. I would say to such an one, you have stopped the fight before you came off victors, and inasmuch as you cannot prevail in the ranks in which you have been battling: I would have you take a new tack on the enemy, perhaps through grace you may yet conquer, but it requires patience, and a willingness to be little.—Although I have been fighting for about fifteen years. Yet I expect to make a vigorous, and renewed attack on all sin, slavery, intemperance, offensive war &c. God being my helper, and I trust, through grace to clear my own skirts, and endeavor not willingly to participate, in any known and acknowledged evil, so that I may be clear, when the Lord cometh.— Come ye anti-slavery brethren, and do likewise. IMPROVE YOUR STOCK.

Br. Bassett: I have been often led to enquire why the farmers of this section of Ohio do not pay more attention to improving their breed of cattle? I think I might safely say with the same trouble and expense, double the amount of money might be realized with the right breed.

I will make a statement of facts that came under my observation to prove the above assertion.

A few days ago I had an apparently small heifer butchered. She was crossed with the Durham breed, 2 years old last June. She had no feed but what she found by running at large. Better beef I never saw, the quarters weighed 533 lbs.; hide 68; rough tallow 50 lbs.; which at a moderate price would amount to $19,19. I was offered by several cattle buyers 8 dollars for the heifer, they considering it an extra price. So much for the breed. Beat Delaware county if you can. Keep good stock on your farms, and they will demand a good price and ready sale.

Yours &c., S. Thompson.

Bennington, O. Nov. 28, 1846.

A Story, but no Fiction.

In the year 18. ., a few young ladies, in the town of———, were desirous of forming a society to aid in clothing and educating the indigent children whom they every day witnessed in their streets, ignorant, vicious, and unemployed. Accordingly, they appointed a committee to solicit subscriptions, with the view to the formation of such a society. The individual members of the committee took different directions. Miss A. went into a part of the town with which she was not much acquainted, and therefore called on Deacon W., in order to obtain from him a list of names of those who would probably be disposed to aid her object. The Deacon received her kindly, applauded her purpose, and promised her all the assistance in his power. He took out his pencil and began to put down the names of several who, had said, would not hesitate to co-operate heart and hand in the good work. They have piety, modesty, and zeal, and will do much without appearing to be busy, or attempting to be conspicuous. The following dialogue ensued.

Miss A. And are these all whom you can name in your vicinity?

Deacon W. Realy, my friend, I cannot recollect any others who would be of any permanent service to you.

Miss A. Would Mrs. K. receive a proposition of this kind favorably?

Deacon W. She might, possibly, but she would wish all the credit of originating the project, and of the management of its concerns. If you make her an officer, where the honor will be something and the duties nothing, she will subscribe.

Miss A. I find many such persons. They will give five or ten dollars, if their names be seen in the newspapers, as officers of a benevolent society, but not a shilling to be private members.

Deacon W. Yes, and you will generally see that societies are too frequently disposed to honor such individuals. However unfit they may be for office, still, if they will continue their subscription, they are sure of elevation.

Miss A. How should I succeed with Miss L? She is very constant at church.

Deacon W. As your plan is a new one she may be disposed to patronize it for a season.—But you must not expect her to continue her subscription more than six months, and that is five longer than her benevolence usually lasts. Mrs. M. and N. are very similar, and if you wish for friends to remain such all times, I should counsel not to go near their doors.

Miss A. What do you think of Mr. O's family?

Deacon W. If you can get the names of some of our great folks, such as Judge H., Col. P., and Hon. Mr. D., then they too will do something; otherwise nothing.

Miss A. Would it avail anything to call on the Misses F?

Deacon W. Yes. if you call on them first.—But should they see the names of Miss B. and Miss C. on your book before theirs, they will beg to be excused.

Miss A. Well, Deacon, can you name one more who would aid me?

Deacon W. There is Miss P.; she would subscribe liberally, but never pay. I have her name attached to several subscriptions, but have never been able to secure a penny. Mrs. D. will applaud your object, but propose some different method of accomplishing it—such as was generally pursued with unexampled success in———, when she lived there. Miss E. will probably make you a donation of a few cents, but will not give her name for permanent encouragement. Miss G.—

Here the conversation was interrupted by the intrusion of a neighbor.—Columbian Star.

The Horrors of War—A Sad Case.—There are few persons who will be able to read the following brief sketch, without feeling a sensation of pain and sorrow at the horrors of war, and its many touching and heart-rending incidents. The account is given in a letter, dated Monterey, October 7th, addressed to the Louisville Courier:

"While I was stationed with our left wing in one of our forts on the evening of the 21st, I saw a Mexican woman busily engaged in carrying bread and water to wounded men of both armies. I saw this ministering angel raise the head of a wounded man, give him water and food, and then carefully bind up his ghastly wound with a handkerchief from her own head. After having exhausted her supplies she went back to her house to get more bread and water for others. As she was returning on her mission of mercy, to comfort other wounded persons, I heard the report of a gun, and saw the poor innocent creature fall dead! I think it was an accidental shot that struck her. I would not be willing to think otherwise: It made me sick at heart, and turning from the scene, I involuntarily raised my eyes towards heaven, and thought great God! and is this war? Passing the spot the next day, I saw her body still lying there, with bread by her side, and the broken gourd, with a few drops of water still in it—emblems of her errand. We buried her, and while we were digging her grave, cannon balls flew around us like hail."

Great Mortality.—A letter from one of the Albany volunteers, to the editor of the Montgomery Journal, dated at Camargo as long ago as September 29, says:

"From actual calculating, more than one thousand men have died upon the banks of Rio del Norte, to say nothing of the immense numbers that have been discharged and sent home in a lingering condition, many of whom will undoubtedly never recover. The Alabama regiment alone lost one hundred men, which is one in ten, and all this to in about three weeks. I think these unfortunate men should be held in as patriotic and kind remembrance by their countrymen at home as if they had fallen in battle, which would on many accounts have been far preferable. * * Most of our regiments are cut down from three to five hundred men, when all started with more than nine hundred.—Southern Whig.

Consolidation of English Colonies.—The British government have a plan under consideration for uniting all the possessions in North America under one government, with a Vice Roy at its head; governors to be appointed at Toronto, Fredericton, Halifax, St. John, and Charlottetown, the seat of the Viceroy to be at Quebec.—It is further contemplated to erect all the British West India Islands into a similar consolidated government, Jamaica being the seat of the Vice Roy. It will be more convenient for business and greatly relieve the pressure of duty in the English Colonial department; but as to any political advantages, we can perceive none, although the territories themselves may be gainers from something approaching to independence, without reference in all cases to the mother country.—N. Y. Sun.

Tremendous Crash and Loss of Life.—The stone wall in rear of the Bazaar, built for the purpose of preserving the level of Third street, in the yard of the premises, gave way this morning about half past nine o'clock, knocking in the lower walls of a new three story brick building recently erected by James Goodloe, as part of his iron works, and precipitating the whole mass into a pile of ruins. One man, we regret to learn, was mortally wounded by the fracture of his skull, and perhaps others, as there is a large number employed about the work, many of whom must necessarily have been about the spot.—Cin. Times, 1st. inst.

The National Road.—The Cumberland Md., Civilian learns from an intelligent gentleman engaged in the forwarding business in that place, that the number of wagons on the National road will be much greater this season than during the last. The Civilian adds:—Wagons are already accumulating at Cumberland. The land carriage to Pittsburgh via Brownsville, is 58 miles less than to Wheeling by land. The large number of wagons on the National road justifies the belief that the rates of carriage will be moderate during the entire season. The present cost for transporting merchandize from Cumberland to Brownsville, is 50 cts. per 100, and from Brownsville to Pittsburgh, 10 cts per 100.—Pitts. Gaz.

The new Capitol of Iowa occupies a favorable site in Iowa city. It is built of marble at a cost already of $80,000, and will require $20,000 more to finish it.

SKETCHES IN THE WESTERN WOODS.

NO. III.

After enjoying the hospitality of my old friend J. R. Bark (who is practicing medicine in Michigan town) and trying to preach to the people once on Sunday, early on Monday morning again struck for the woods. After traveling about six miles left the Michigan road and taking the Honey Creek road proceeded in an easterly direction and was soon on that part of the Reserve called the seven mile strip—given to the State for the construction of the Wabash and Erie canal. It is seven miles wide and twenty five long and is nearly all sold at appraised prices. This part of the Reserve I should have said in my former sketches is surveyed as is also another strip on the north which was also mostly sold as canal land. Including these strips the Reserve is said to be 36 miles long and 30 wide. These strips were purchased of the Indians previous to the purchase of the main body of the Reserve.

The land along the road through the 7 mile strip is of the best quality. And the inhabitants who are settled in at the rate of a family for near every 80 acres are rapidly and substantially improving it.

After crossing the seven mile strip we entered the "new purchase" or unsurveyed part. Here the country presents a more wild and uncultivated aspect though the land is still very fertile. Occasionally a cabin peered from out the dense forest surrounded mostly by more or less of an opening and not unfrequently swarming with those little flaxen haired boys and girls, whom Andrew Kenedy, styles "the product of the American multiplication table." "God bless them" says he, and so say I.

We had not journeyed far when we began to experience the "glorious uncertainty" of travelling in an unsurveyed country. Every one seems to form his own estimate of distances. How far to Kokamo? we enquired of a settler about the middle of the day, whilst feeding and taking a check. "Ten miles was the reply. With the full expectation of reaching the place before night we again set forward. And after driving all the afternoon along a narrow track abounding in Zig-Zags, when we halted, after sundown, we were greeted with the consoling intelligence that it was only 8 miles to Kokamo.

Well by starting early and driving constantly the next day we got to Foster's mill on "Big Wild Cat" by 12 o'clock and thought ourselves fortunate in getting within 1 mile of Kokamo at last. Here we again halted and by the persuasion of Mr. Grant the miller were induced to leave our waggons and loading with him and explore the country on horseback. Accordingly after dinner—ungeared and (five in number) started on a tour of observation up Kokamo Creek, a beautiful little stream running N. W. into Wild Cat.

The country up this Creek as far as we went (about 5 miles) is delightful, dry, undulating, rich, abounding in springs and covered with a luxuriant growth of Walnut, Buckeye Blue-Ash Beech and Sugar. The claims are about all taken along the Creek. But back from the Creek we were told there was good land not occupied. And up the creek about 1½ mile farther we were informed there is a region surpassing what we had seen for beauty—fertility, timber and springs, nearly entirely unoccupied. We were all anxious to see this good region but the approach of night warned us to return to our wagons.

Next morning started by sun rise to make further discoveries in the direction of Pipe Creek the place of my destination. Two of our company having never seen an Indian were importunate that we should turn a little out of our intended route, to visit Shappadoshe's village where as we were informed some of these natives of the forest were still remaining. (The most of them—having been removed westward since my former visit to the Reserve.) To gratify their curiosity we consented and taking the Indian trail soon arrived at a field on the banks of Deer Creek. The fence and crop of which bore evidence to their former owners. The fence was plentifully ornamented with bush and the crop was that drawf species of corn known as the squaw corn. On the farther side of this enclosure stood 4 or 5 cabins. The first inhabited one we came to was occupied bs a white family who had moved in since the departure of its Red inmates. Being directed to the cabin where 7 or 8 squaws one red man 3 things having the shape and appearance of white men resided, two of our company (one carrying a rifle gun) started in a gallop for the cabin whereupon those things aforesaid thinking perhaps that they were about to receive the fate they deserved, shut to the door. The old squaws outside looked frightened almost to death. After awhile we persuaded those appearances of white men to open the door a little and show their heads. But it was in vain that we requested to be admitted inside to warm at the fire or to see the Red man who was lying sick within, so after our companions had satisfied their curiosity as far as they had opportunity we left them and took the road to Finimore's mill.

Between Wild Cat and Deer Creek the land is rich but rather swampy, so that the road is very bad in places, the track being narrow and much traveled. One of our company remarked that it was his opinion that the bottom was tramped out in several places. Along Deer Creek the land is excellent and sufficiently dry. In some places the timber is almost exclusively black Walnut, Blue Ash, and Buckeye. Other tracts are covered with lofty Hickory, Poplar, Beach, White Ash, and Maple. S. W. Widney.

CHURCH DIVISION.

THINGS TO BE CONSIDERED.

NO I.

Mr. Editor: From the published minutes of some of the northern Conferences of the Meth. Protestant Church, I perceive that the question of dividing the church, North from the South, is being agitated and interesting the attention of our people somewhat extensively. The professed object of this movement is, to escape from the responsibilities of an ecclesiastical relation with the South, where slavery exists. And it appears to be prompted by a desire to withdraw all countenance of that system of complicated wrongs; and under the impression that while such connection continues, the North is implicated in the crime of slavery as its abetors.

That slavery is wrong, admits of no dispute with us. And that Christians should not lend their influence to sanction, or justify oppression is equally true. But that the connection existing between the northern and southern Conferences of the M. P. Church, is such as to make the South responsible for the errors and follies of the North; and the North, for those of the South, is extremely doubtful. Do we not read somewhere respecting the sinner, that "He alone shall bear it"—That is, the consequences of his sin? Encouraged by your kind intimation, I will avail myself of the privilege of presenting a few reflections, through your columns, to my worthy brethren of the North, upon this important subject, for the consideration of their enlightened and more mature judgments; noping that they may be of some utility in awakening thought, and lead to beneficial results.

Dear brethren of the M. P. Church: Without assuming to dictate, or aiming to control the action of your superior wisdom, but as an humble, priveleged member of your connection, permitted to express the convictions of his own mind, allow me to remind you that the position which you occupy, places in your hands the means for exerting an influence that will be extensively felt for good, or for evil, both in the political and the ecclesiastical world. To your action, many are looking with deep interest, and fearful apprehensions. While others are indulging in the keenest scrutiny upon your movements, of which they are capable. And the consequences of your ultimate action upon this subject, whatever that action may be, will not be be confined merely to the circle of our own denomination—they will expand the world over, and terminate only with eternity! The act of sundering the ligaments which unite a christian people in fraternal association, and mutual effort in the great work of evangelizing the world, is of no trival character; lightly as it may be regarded by those who think only of the gratification of present feelings, and the attainment of ardently cherished purposes.

The pulsation of such an act, will be felt at the very vitals of the piety of our church: every stone in its elemental foundation, and every pillar in the edifice will feel the shock, as the elements of change are introduced. But to what extent changes and modifications may be carried if commenced, affecting the fundamental principles of church polity, time only can determine. Will it not be becoming those called to participate in a decision so momentous in its consequences, to pause, reflect, deliberate and pray? The deed when done, can never be recalled. It will become a theme for the historian, who will transmit to coming generations, our names accompanied with the act, holding them up for public scorn and universal opprobrium; or setting them in the cycle of honorous perpetuity, as stars in the ecclesiastical firmament, to be admired, venerated and imitated in future ages. What that history shall be, remains to be determined. Soon it will be impossible to control the truth-telling record.

With these preliminary remarks, I shall proceed in my next, to notice some of the many things, to be encountered ineffecting the division contemplated. E. A. W.

GOVERNOR'S MESSAGE.

Gentlemen of the Senate and House of Representatives:

Assembled together as the representatives of the people, to consider the condition of public affairs, your attention is first properly directed to those pleasing circumstances which evince the goodness of an overruling Providence, to whose favor we are indebted for all we enjoy. We are thus reminded, too, of the large measure of gratitude we owe for unnumbered blessings and benefits. A year, crowded with events of interest, has been added to the past, since I last addressed your honorable body.—Abundance has crowned the labors of the husbandman in that period. Commerce and domestic industry flourish and increase. Sickness prevailed to extent in various parts of the state, during the months of August and September, yet its fatality has been inconsiderable. Tranquility and order have been maintained within our borders. The supremacy of the laws is still acknowledged, and the advancement of our people in virtue, morality, and all the elements of national greatness, has been unabated.

The duties of the different branches of the State Government have been discharged, during the past year, with promptness and fidelity, giving ample guaranty, continually, that rights of community, have been objects of high regard. The reports of the heads of the several departments, which will, in due time, be laid before you, will furnish you with a detailed statement of their condition and operation.

The cause of education, combining both moral and intellectual culture, has been a matter of primary interest in Ohio since the first foundation of the State Government; and no subject can be of more lasting and vital importance to a free people. A system of education has been very properly looked upon as not merely an ornament of our political edifice, but also as the foundation on which it rests, and the rock of its future safety. The importance of the subject, however, and the zeal with which it has been espoused, have not fully overcome, as yet, the deep-rooted prejudices of some portions of our people against the measures necessary for the improvement of the system. It is to be lamented that our school system is yet so inefficient in its operations, and that our Common School Fund, that source of just pride to the people of the state, is expended every year with less than half the advantages to the youth of the state which ought to be derived from it. There is a general want of energy, efficiency, and discipline in the system. In a former communication, I had occasion to urge upon the General Assembly the means deemed essential for the further improvement of this system of education, to which I respectfully refer you.

The following statement shows the condition of the School Fund for the year 1846:

Common School Fund received, being proceeds of taxes,	$69,582 39
Auction duties and pedler's license,	5,812 11
Tax on lawyers and physicians,,	4,909 21
Banks, Insurances, and Bridge companies,	28,344 15

Balance in the Treasury on the 15th Nov.; 1846,	31,775 56½
Total,	$232,292 24
Balance of Common School Fund in the Treasury, Nov. 15, 1846,	32,292 24
Paid out and distributed among the counties of the state,	200,000 00
Interest paid upon the Virginia and United States Military School Fund, Western Reserve School Fund, Ministerial Fund, and other trust funds,	88,450 79
Total amount paid out of the State Treasury for support of school and religious purposes.	$288,450 79

Since the last session of the General Assembly, the people of the United States have become involved in a sanguinary war with the Republic of Mexico, attended with a loss of life and treasure and the train of calamities incident to a war with a foreign nation. The unfortunate events which have led to this conflict, it is not my purpose to discuss, or even to notice, in this communication. It is a subject of regret that this collision of arms with the people of a sister Republic has occurred; occupying with us, as they do, the soil of the new world, and in whose protracted and arduous struggle for their liberties, on the principles of our own government, we have heretofore felt a deep interest. The enlightened friends of liberty and humanity had, for some years, indulged the hope that they had found in the liberal and free institutions of America, a fabric of civil government, capable of being conducted on the most enlighened and elevated principles of philanthropy and christianity; securing a safe protection to the rights and liberty of citizen, and affording an asylum, a place of refuge, for the unfortunate of other countries, from the oppressions and devastating wars resulting from their political systems. The belief was entertained that the humane and enlightened public sentiment of this age would conduce to the amicable adjustment of all the disputes and controversies of nations, consistent even with the most refined sense of honor, through the intervention of arbitrations and international adjudications; that those restless elements of ambition and jealousy which have so long kept mankind in a state of hostile commotion, might be overcome and brough into submission by an elevated tone of moral sentiment, without a resort to the cruelties of warfare. But existing circumstances threaten disappointment to these hopes and anticipations of the philanthropist. It is evident that we are now approximating great and important events, which may exercise a controling influence over the future destiny of our country. It becomes the true friends of civil liberty, and the improvement of the condition of man, to look with a vigilant and scrutinizing eye to the consequences and enduring influence of the great events which are beginning to open upon us.

On the 20th day of May last, I received through the War Department, a requisition from the President of the United States, for three regiments of volunteer infantry or riflemen; for the service of United States, in the pending war with the Republic of Mexico. This call of the President was made in obedience to the act of the 13th of May, 1846, which had passed both branches of of Congress, by an almost unanimous vote. The standing forces of the United States then engaged in the war, were believed to be in imminent peril; and the national defence near the seat of war, was supposed to require immediate assistance from the volunteer militia of the States. Under the high responsibilities imposed on me, I did not feel myself at liberty to disregard this call upon the patriotism of the State. However much the existence of the war may be deplored, and however great the difference of opinion about the unfortunate events which led to it, when the State was duly called upon, under the authority of the constitution and laws of the United States, for military aid, the solemn injunctions of duty imposed upon me as the Executive officer of the state as well as every dictate of patriotism, imperatively demanded, as I considered, prompt and energetic action on my part to comply with the call, in the true meaning and spirit of the constitution. If, when a war be actually existing between the United States and a foreign nation and duly recognized by a law of Congress, a State, when called upon by the national authorities, be at liberty to disregard the injunctions of the constitution and judge for itself, as to the necessity and expediency of the war, either to withhold its assistance from the Untted States, or to afford only a faltering, unwilling, and ineffectual aid, the supremacy of our system of government must soon be at an end, and the constitutional muniments of our national defence prove unavailing. When the emergency of a war with a foreign nation is actually existing, no superficial considerations of temporary inconvenience or pecuniary sacrifice, should prevent the performance of those high duties of patriotism which each state of the national confederacy, as well as every citizen of the republic, owes to the country and to the cause of civil liberty.

Upon the receipt of this call made by the President, prompt and efficient measures were taken to raise the volunteer military force required from this State; and on the 17th day of June, 1846, I delivered over the authority of the United States, under the command of Brig. Gen. Wool, of the United States Army, three regiments of volunteer troops, duly organized as required by law. These three regiments consisted of thirty full companies, composed chiefly of young men of high promise, whose public spirit and patriotic devotion to the cause of their country is a just ground of pride and gratification to every citizen of the State. They have, upon a sudden call of their country, separated themselves from their homes, their business and their friends, and gone into a distant country to face all the casualties and hardships of a military campaign, in an unfavorable climate and against an enemy long inured to warfare. In every emergency of the service, the Ohio Volunteers will fully sustain the honor of the State, and, I doubt not, be found capable of the noblest feats of valor and enterprise.

The collecting and embodying these troops, in subsisting and transporting them to the place of general rendezvous at Cincinnati, and in furnishing them with some essential materials for tents, camp equipage, &c., a very considerable expenditure of money was necessarily incurred. A prompt and faithful compliance with the call of the National Government for volunteers, made this expenditure unavoidable. The call was sudden, and the people of the State had not in anticipation prepared themselves for the emergencies of military life. It was not practicable to collect and organize the volunteer companies and transport them to the general encampment near Cincinnati, without the payment of their necessary incidental expenses; and even then, the volunteers who were separating themselves from their private pursuits and all the attachments of home, were subjected to inconveniences and difficulties, before they reached Cincinnati, to which our people are but little accustomed.

The Government of the United States has failed thus far to perform its duty in paying this expenditure or refunding the money advanced. The subsistence alone of the thirty companies which were received into the service of the United States, after the time of their arrival at the place of general rendezvous, is all, or nearly all of the expenditures which has been refunded as yet by the General Government.

The Adjutant General of the State is now at Washington, engaged in the settlement of this business with the War Department; and in a short time a special communication will be made, which will bring the subject of these expenditures and the matters connected therewith, fully before you.

The army of the United States is now in possession, by means of conquest, of five of the provinces of Mexico—Tamaulipas, New Leon, Chihuahua, New Mexico and California. The military commander who headed the forces which took possession of New Mexico, has affected to make a formal annexation of this province to the United States, has proclaimed himself Governor of the province, assumed the exercise of civil authority over the people of that country and actually required some of them to take an oath of allegiance to the United States.

If the object of the President of the United States, in sending an army into the interior of Mexico, be solely to compel the government of that country to the terms of a speedy and honorable peace, such proceedings may, perhaps, be excusable, if not entirely justifiable. But if the purpose and effect of this invasion of Mexico, by our armies, be the acquisition of territory, and the annexation of the subjugated provinces to our national confederacy, I have no hesitation in pronouncing it a violation of the fundamental principles of our government and of the spirit and true intent of our national constitution. The Government of the United States has no right to engage in a war of aggression and conquest. The very introduction to the Constitution, expressive of its whole object and intent, most explicitly declares the sole design of our Government to be 'to form a more perfect union, establish justice, insure domestic tranquility, provide for the common defence, promote the general welfare, and secure the blessings of liberty to ourselves and our posterity.' And the whole context and spirit of the Constitution clearly repels the idea, that the United States can engage in any war, except when necessary for the common defence and to insure the international tranquility of the country. Our national confederacy is one of limited powers, and clearly gives no authority to annex the provinces of a foreign nation by mere conquest, without the authority even of a law of Congress and without the consent of a people of the country to which those foreign provinces belong. Whether the gross usurpatian of civil authority, committed by the military commander who has subjugated the province of New Mexico, will receive the treatment it merits at the hands of the national government, remains to be determined. There is no rule of the jus belli established by the practice of nations, which can authorize a disregard of the Constitution and of the limited purposes and legitimate designs of our national compact. Let justice be done and the great principles of our Constitution maintained, whatever consequences may follow.

One of the first principles in the theory of our republican form of government is, that the people of every country, for the purpose of protecting their rights and liberties and securing their independence, have an inalienable right to select and establish a government for themselves; and at all times a complete power, for the purposes aforesaid, to alter, reform, or abolish the same, whenever they may deem necessary. So important was this principle thought to be, we find it embodied in the first section of the Bill of Rights in the Constitution of Ohio. Without a palpable violation of this fundamental principle in all civil governments, we cannot acquire by conquest, and annex to our national Union, by the force of arms, the inhabited territory and organized provinces of a foreign nation. Even supposing it to be one of the constitutional objects of our national confederacy to extend our country, those subjugated Mexican provinces could not be annexed to our national Union without the consent of constitutional majority of the people of the United States.

Each State of the national confederacy has a deep and immediate interest in those questions which are about to arise out of the war with Mexico; and no State can overlook them, with a due regard for the safety of the Union and the maintenance of the principles of the Constitution.

The fact that our army sent into the interior of Mexico has not been vanquished, but on the contrary has been victorious on every battle-field, and has fully sustained the character of our country for military powers, is a very natural and a very proper subject of national pride and congratulation. The bonfires, illuminations and rejoicings, upon the receipt of the first news of such events, show the patriotic ardor of our people, and devotion and attachment to their government. But the ardor of public feeling should not be allowed to lead judgment astray or induce a forgetfulness of the duty of our country and its high position in regard to the great and immutable principles of justice and the rights of man. A thirst for military fame and conquest, and an over weening spirit of aggrandizement, have been fatal to republics in ages past. When the republican institutions of this country were established it was admitted by the most enlightened throughout the civilized world, that a great advance was made in the science of government—that the rights of man and the true objects of government were more clearly understood, more forcibly promulgated and more correctly and justly established, than at any former period of the world.

It was hoped and believed that the great fundamental principles established by our government, had created barriers against the spirit of conquest, which cupidity and rapacity could not overleap. To secure the blessings of liberty, protect our people in the pursuit of happiness, elevate them in the grace of humility, and advance them in all the improvements and arts of civilized life, are objects of higher, far higher import and utility than to dazzle and delude them by the glare and splendar of military renown, and lead them on in the bloody track of conquest. Founded on a sacred regard for the rights of man, and resting on the intelligence and public virtue of the people for its security, our government occupies an elevated position before the civilized world.—The intercourse of our country with foreign nations, as well as the administration of our internal affairs, should be marked by a high regard for justice and the rights of mankind, under all circumstances; and if it be the object of our people to extend the influence of free institutions to other nations of the world, far more can be done by the moral influence of example than by conquest and force of victorious arms.

I respectfully call your attention to the laws now in force for the regulation of the militia.—They were originally designed to operate in a time of peace, but are defective and inefficient even then. In time of war they are wholly incompetent. The salaries now paid to the Adjutant and Quartermaster Generals are also inadequate to secure men of military talents, such as are indispensible in raising and organizing troops for the service of the country. The present incumbents, during the last six months; have served their country with a degree of skill and fidelity which will commend them to your favorable consideration.

The unhappy controversy between the authorities of Virginia and Ohio, in regard to jurisdiction, which arose in 1845, has not as yet been satisfactorily and definitely adjusted. The citizens taken forcibly from this state to be tried in Virginia, have been discharged on nominal bonds, and the question of jurisdiction which arose in the prosecution was carried to the General Court of Virginia. But a division of opinion in that tribunal on the question has prevented a final adjudication of the controversy. The authorities of Virgivia have not yet authorized the arrest and surrender of the persons demanded as fugitives from the justice of this state, on the charge of abduction. The facts connected with this dificulty were fully laid before the General Assembly at the last session. I again commend the subject to your special attention.

I can only repeat the recommendations made in my former communications to the General Assembly, in favor of the repeal of the laws imposing useless and unjust restrictions and disabilities on the colored population in this state.—These laws have no tendency to limit the emigration and settlement of this kind of population within Ohio, and they are at variance with the humane spirit of the age, and inconsistant with the character of our people. The colored population already located in our state, should be treated with humanity and justice. Their rights are entitled to the protection of our laws, although their settlement in Ohio may be unfortunate for themselves. Their farther emigration to the State ought not to be encouraged; and it may be discouraged, if it become necessary, in a manner not inconsistent with humanity and justice.

The question of the Banks and Currency, which has occasioned much strife and controversy in this state for many years, is now, it is hoped, definitely settled. The new banking system which has been established has, thus far, been successful in accomplishing the beneficial purposes of its creation. The currency of the state has been restored, and is now in a more safe and sound condition than at any former period. Want of confidence and alarm are no longer felt among those who are engaged in commercial affairs in this State, and the banks have afforded, so far as a prudent regard for public interest would permit, those accommodations which the business of the country required. No action of the General Assembly is believed to be necessary on this subject at the present time. The safety and utility of this new system of banking has been tested, and during the two years past, no subject has been made more prominent in the political controversies before the people of the State than this. Twice, already, have the people at the ballot box pronounced in its favor.—No longer can public sentiment on the subject be misunderstood. The currency of the State is in the hands of almost every citizen, and is, necessarily, intimately connected with the whole business of the country. A political war, therefore, upon it, is a war upon the business and interests of the people. A proper respect for the will of the majority, as well as a due regard for the interests of the country, as I humbly conceive, dictate that this question be no longer made a subject of political controversy in Ohio.

There are now twenty-six banks in operation under the new system, of which seventeen are branches of the State Bank, and nine are Independent. The aggregate amount of capital of the Branches of the State Bank is $1,496,767 44; and the amount of their circulation on the 2d day of November, 1846, was $2,655,346 00.—The aggregate amount of capital of the Independent Banks is $376,170; and their circulation at the period last mentioned, was $612,465. There are yet eight banks doing business under charters granted under the old banking system in this state, whose aggregate capital, at the time of the last reports, on the 2d day of November, 1846, was $3,953,750: and circulation, $2.406,958. The whole amount of banking capital, therefore, employed in the State at this time, by the thirty-four banks, amounts to $5,826,777 44; and the whole circulation is $5,674,769.

The public improvements undertaken by the State are now fully completed. They constitute and must remain monuments of the early wisdom, enterprise and public spirit of the people of Ohio. They have contributed to the development of the resources of the country, and to them may be ascribed, to a considerable extent, the unexampled growth of the State in population, wealth and prosperity. These public works constructed by the State, traverse an extent of nearly eight hundred miles, connecting the Ohio River and Lake Erie at two different points; connecting the interior with the extreme points of the State in various directions; and through the Wabash and Erie Canal, communicating with the interior of Indiana and Illinois. Besides the public works constructed by the State, the numerous turnpikes, canal, railroads, and other works constructed in this State, by private companies, have created extensive facilities for communication with almost all parts of the State. And there are yet many other public improvements in progress of construction, by companies, in different directions through the State, some of which are magnificent in their conceptions and in the objects contemplated. Within another year a railroad communication between Cincinnati and Lake Erie will be completed. With these vast facilities for commerce, embracing an extent of country unsurpassed in richness and fertility, and occupied by two millions of people distinguished for industry, enterprise, and energy of character, it is evident that a high destiny awaits our State.

Those great public works in the interior of our State, are intimately connected in business with the commerce on the Lakes, and on the Ohio and Mississippi rivers. Lake Erie, on our north, communicating with our public works at several different points, forms a link in the chain of direct and easy communication from Green Bay to the Atlantic cities. The Ohio river, on our southeast, in like manner connected with the channels of communication running into the interior of the State, forms a link in the chain of navigable water, extending from the Gulf of Mexico to the interior of Pennsylvania. Business on the various public works, extending in all directions over the interior of the State, will be productive and prosperous in proportion as trade on the great thoroughfares on our northern and southern limits is cherished or depressed. Immense loss of life and property is every year sustained for want of the improvement of harbors at proper points on the Lakes and on the Ohio and Mississippi rivers. The duty of improving these harbors appropriately belongs to the national government. Since the formation of the government, a large proportion of its expenditures have been made in the improvement of the harbors and other works along the sea coast. These appropriations have been made on the powers given to Congress "to provide for the common defence and general welfare of the United States, and to regulate commerce with foreign nations and between the several States." To accomplish the same great purposes of the national government, the improvment of the Ohio and Mississippi rivers and the inland seas of our country, is as essential as the improvement of the sea coast. Lake Erie constitutes a boundary between the United States and the most powerful commercial nations of the southeast, in like manner connected with the channels of communication running into the interior world. The commerce of the lakes and rivers, although not so extensive, has as direct a connection with the foreign commerce of the country as that of the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans. After the immense expenditure which has been made on the Atlantic coast for the improvements of harbors, &c., a constitutional objection to similar appropriations for the same kind of works on the great inland seas of the country, is not to be sustained by an intelligent people. The interest of the several Western States, and the honor of the Union, alike demand that this improvidence and partiality of the General Government be met by an energetic and effective remonstrance from every legitimate authority.

I deem it proper to call your especial attention to an enterprise which is propesed, of a great national character, magnificent in its object, and having a direct bearing upon the future commerce of Ohio, as well as that of the entire Union and probably of the whole world. Mr. Asa Whitney, a gentleman of intelligence, of practical business capacity, extraordinary energy of character, has suggested the means and submitted to Congress a proposition for the construction of a national railroad from Lake Michigan to the Pacific ocean, near the mouth of the Columbia river. This projected public improvement would complete a chain of communication by means of railroad and navigable waters between the Atlantic cities and the Pacific ocean, crossing the State of Ohio in its course. It would connect together the vast interests of our extensive country, make the commerce of the Pacific tributary to the United States, and open to us an immediate, easy and direct communication with China and other countries of Asia, the Eastern Archipeligo and other islands in the Pacific, as well as with the countries on the western coasts of North America. Such a chain of commnnication across our continent, being on the nearest and most direct rout, and furnishing by far the safest, easiest and most speedy medium of communication between the commercial nations of Europe and the countries of Asia, would be crowded by the merchants, the traveler and the curious from all quarters of the world. It would produce results in commercial, moral and political points of view, vastly beyond our limited capacity of conception at this time.

The feasibility of Mr. Whitney's proposition is susceptible of easy and plain demonstration.—To pronounce it visionary on account of the magnitude of the project, would evince a forgetfulness of the vast achievments of the age, and a prevalence of the benighted prejudice which clouded the prospects of the enterprising benefactors of mankind in ages gone by. The work proposed is one that will cost the United States nothing in a case of a failure, and it is wholy unobjectionable, even the most cautious, in relation to the grant of special privilieges by the government.

I, therefore, submit to your consideration the expediency of aiding this most magnificient project of the age, directly connected as it is with the future prospects and interest of Ohio, by every legitimate influence and authority.

The public debt of Ohio is intimately blended with considerations of deep interest bearing on its character and welfare, and therefore should command the most careful attention of the Legislature. Under all the depressions in business and commercial revulsions in the country, the State of Ohio has fulfilled her engagements with scrupulous integrity, and paid the interest on her public debt with promptness and regularity. It is a justifiable subject of State pride that the faith of the State has been preserved without a blemish. A character and public credit, such as Ohio has maintained, should be cherished and guarded with the most scrupulous care, not only from a rigid honesty of principle and a high sense of honor, but also from profound considerations af State policy. Nothing can exalt the character of commercial people more than a high sense of integrity and honor in all their engagements. The example of the government exercises a vast influence in the formation of the characteristics of a people. A violation of solemn engagements by a government, not only tarnishes the national honor, but is used to palliate acts of bad faith in private individuals.—Whereas, a government which requires a fidelity to all engagements be held sacred, is an indispensible virtue, will, by its example, establish a high standard of commercial morality, and elevate the character of its people.

The time has arrived when the public debt of Ohio has reached its highest point. No occasion can exist for its further increase. The people of the State can now look forward to the time when the debt shall be discharged and the burden of taxation be removed. The ample resources and rapid growth and prosperity of the State, are sufficient to remove all apprehensions of difficulty in regard to the ability of our people to discharge the liabilities as they fall due. The following statement will exhibit the amount of the State debt, and the interest, &c., paid thereon during the last fiscal year:

Total amount of foreign debt,		$16,964,292 50
Amount of domestic debt,		765,136 12
School and trust fund,		1,482,632 68
Total am't of State debt, Nov. 15, 1845		$19,212,111 30
In't on foreign debt paid in New York,	$1,027,356 95
In't on domestic bonds,	45,908 16
In't on school and trust, funds,	88,450 79
Total amount of interest paid in year ending Nov. 15, 1846,		$1,161,715 90
Amount paid for exchange, interest and temporary loans, and expenses,		30,252 36
Total am't of in't, exchange, and expenses, during the year ending 15th Nov. 1846		$1,191,998 26

The domestic debt is redeemable at the pleasure of the State, and the school and trust fund, constitute a permament loan to the canal funds the interest being annually appropriated for the benefit of those funds. Of the foreign debt, the sum af $5,918,668 76 will full due in the year 1850; the sum of $3,365,779 24 in the year 1856; the sum of $7,012,781 in the year 1860, and the sum of $667,063 50 in the year 1870.

The time has arrived when decisive and effectual measures should be adopted to raise the means for the discharge of the debt which will fall due in 1850. I earnestly commend this subject to your special attention.

The system of taxation heretofore existing in the State was defective, and in many particulars unequal in its operations. A revision of the tax laws had become necessary. The new system of taxation adopted at the last session of the Legislature, although complicated in its details, is just in principle, and has obviated many of the deficiencies in the former laws. This system, however, is not, as I consider, without objections in some points. It would scarcely be expected that an entire change in so difficult a subject as that of the revenue law, could be made free from objection.

The valuation of property, under this new system, has brought a large amount of property on the duplicate, which formerly entirely escaped taxation. But the largest addition to the valuation of property on the grand duplicate, has been made by the valuation of all the improvements and fixtures on real estate. The valuation of property for taxation, on the grand duplicate, in the year 1845, was as follows:—Lands, $85,916,169; Real Estates in cities and towns, $22,269,575; Chattels, Money at Interest, &c., $35,974,725; total valuation, $144,160,469. The valuation brought upon the duplicate, under the new system, is as follows, viz: Lands, $259,093,645; Real Estate in cities and towns, $65,302,373; Chattels, Money at Interest, &c., $79,177,484; total valuation on the grand duplicate, $403,673,488. The increase in the total valuation of real estate for the purpose of taxation, is $216,319,269; and the increase in the total valuation of chattels and money at interest, &c., is $43,202,759.

The revenue system is connected with the interest of the government. It is essential that this part of our political system be permanent and uniform, as well as just and equitable in its operations. It should not, therefore, be permitted to become a matter of controversy between the political parties in the State, nor a ground for a struggle between the holders of digerent classes of property.

As Ohio is peculiarly adapted to the pursuits of agriculture, and as the productions of the soil constitute the principal part of the products of our labor, this branch of industry is entitled to the careful and most favorable attention of the Legislature. The fostering hand of government is capable of adding much in the future in developing the agricultural resources of the State, and in advancing the prosperity of agricultural pursuits. I had occasion to submit my views on this subject in my last communication to the General Assembly, to which I respectfully call your attention.

The Benevolent Institutions of the State consisting of the Asylum for the Insane, the Asylum for the Education of the Deaf and Dumb, and the Asylum for the Education of the Blind, have, during the past year, been conducted with that skill and success which have heretofore characterized them. The several annual reports of the Superintendents of these institutions, which will in due time be laid before you, will contain matter of much interest, and will furnish you with the details of their business and condition.

The Penitentiary of the State has been managed during the past year with the usual ability and success. The following is a brief statement of its condition.

The products of labor during the year ending 30th November, 1846, are about	$44,000 00
The expenditures during the same period were	27,000 00
Leaving a balance in favor of the institution of		$17,000 00
Number of convicts incarcerated on the 30th November, 1845,		482
Number received during the past year,		251
		633
Discharges during the year—

Being about to retire from a participation in the public affairs of the State, I avail myself of this occasion to express grateful acknowledgments to the great body of my fellow citizens for the kindness and marks of confidence I have received at their hands. My own destiny became connected with that of the people of Ohio at an early period in the settlement of the State; and with a deep interest have I witnessed its unparalleled advance in population and improvemen Within, comparatively, a few years, have I beheld a population of two hundred and fifty thousand augmented to two millions. Within a short time, an almost unbroken wilderness between the Ohio river and Lake Erie has been transformed into cultivated fields, towns and cities. I look forward with emotions, to express which language is inadequate, in anticipation of the high destiny which awaits the people of Ohio. In the humble part which I have taken in the public affairs of the State I have been directed by an earnest desire to subserve the welfare of the people, and I am consoled by the persuasion, that whatever errors have been committed will find a corrective in the ability and patriotism of those who succeed me. In common with all who feel a deep interest in our public affairs, I shall not cease to invoke that Almighty Ruler of nations, to whose providence we are already so signally indebted for the continuation of His blessings to us as a people.

Pittsburgh, Dec. 8. 1746.

Br. Bassett: We have just closed our first quarterly meeting. We had no ministerial assistance to preach a sermon for us, but the Lord was evidently with us. Congregation on Sunday morning very good, a solemn season at the sacrament, and an excellent love-feast yesterday evening. Members are encouraged; and, I hope, are advancing in the way of holiness. During the meeting six persons all of whom had belonged to church elsewhere, gave us their names, and some of them their certificates. I confess we are "too prosaic," as a good brother recently said, but I do think we had some "poetry" in our love feast yesterday evening. The celebrated Dr. Vinet, that great Christian philosopher of Switzerland, says, "the love of God is virtue." And is there no poetry in love? He says also that man "derives from his conscience only some virtues; he cannot derive from it virtue." And may we not say again that true christian love is the true poetry? derived only from God. Once more. The same author further adds, that He "plants that one gem in the very centre of the soul." And is not the renewed heart the very centre of the poetry of heaven? Still it must be confessed that we are too prosaic; we need more of the love of God, and then we should be more poetic. O that we may be a holy people, zealous of good works, then shall we be a happy and a useful people. and the church will prosper. W. Reeves.

Waynesburg, Pa., Dec. 9, 1846.

Br. Bassett: By your permission, I wish to say a few things through the Recorder, to our worthy president (Br. G. Brown,) and the friends of our infant Zion, relative to the Waynesburg Circuit.

Our first protracted meeting for this conference year, was held at the Round School house —here we had a few valuable female members, but it appeared as though the males could not be reached—the brethren who have formerly traveled this circuit here bestowed much labour at this appointment apparently to no purpose. No doubt they will rejoice to learn that the Lord is reviving his work at this point, and that we are now receiving some males to travel to Heaven with those sisters. Our meeting continued one week, three added to the church during the meeting—three have since joined. Here our prospects are flattering, we are looking for others to come out; those who have given us their names are heads of families, and respectable citizens. During this meeting we were favored with the efficient labors of Brs. John, Joseph, and Ed. Fordyce all of whom did us good service. May the good Lord bless these brethren for their labors of love.

Second protracted meeting was held at Loars' School house, on Whiteby Creek. Our church was in a low condition. Previous variances between brethren, were reconciled. There is nothing like the love of Jesus to bring those who are at a distance together. It destroyes the enmity in the heart, and makes us brethren in Christ. They are going on heart and hand to the heavenly country; keeping up their class and prayer meetings. For two years past they could raise neither, now family altars have been erected where prayer was not heard before. This meeting continued five days,—four or five conversions,—four joined M. P. Church. A glorious meeting. We had the zealous labors of the same unstationed brethren as before.

Third meeting was our first Quarterly meeting which was held at the Rinehart School house, this was also a very interesting meeting. One or two conversions, five gave us their names as probationers. Here our unstationed brethren as at the meetings above named, came up to the help of the Lord against the mighty—and labored faithfully in the vineyard of their master. We have a good Society here, all they want is a meeting house, hope they will raise one soon, they have the ability. May the good Lord help them to build him a house.

Our fourth meeting was held at Rodgersville—here Br. Simpson, and myself were left to do all the labor ourselves, so far as the preaching was concerned,—had a good meeting all things taken into the account. The church in this place, had become quite lukewarm. Many who once made a profession of religion have gone back into the wilderness of sin. We however received six names during our stay—three of whom were heads of families. We have some valuable members at this appointment; Br. Rodgers we might name for one who does not stop under twenty dollars a year. Would to God that we had more such liberal souls. He is not like a brother that I heard spoken of not long since. The good brother in speaking of those narrowly contracted souls, supposed that it would take a Microscope to find his soul in the great day. The church here was much revived.

Our fifth meeting was held at Br. Barne's school house, which was our Presidential visit. Here we continued five days; had a good meeting; one joined the church. Br. Brown preached us nine sermons during his stay upon the circuit;—he labored with more than his usual zeal. The brethren say that they never saw him so energetic. I am sure I never did. He appears like a young man,—his voice is much clearer than it has been since I first heard him preach. Lord bless the old soldier in his toils. Our church at this appointment numbers but few members, but they are of the right kind. Many of the brethren are acquainted with Br. James Barnes and family. Their hospitality and liberality is known to all who ever travelled the circuit. These brethren and sisters all take up their cross and pray in public from the youngest to the oldest. The good Lord will prosper this people—"his eyes are upon the righteous and his ears are open to their cries."

As yet I have said nothing concerning Br. J. L. Simpson my colleague. I feel myself greatly blessed, he is one of the most agreeable companions and fellow laborers that I have ever had the pleasure of laboring with. He is at all times at his post and willing to do his part, labors very zealously, too much so for his strength. I contemplate a very happy and agreeable year with the young brother.

We have received into church fellowship twenty-two this conference year. To God be all the glory, and we are looking, praying, and laboring for a much greater ingathering. O, Lord send prosperity. Brethren pray for us.

Yours, W. A. Porter, Sup't.

"Not all lost that is in danger."

Br. Bassett: I thank God that I can say like Father Potter, that I am at my post. And also that we are going to live, for the church is revived up; the brethren have again taken their harps from the willows, and tuned them anew; and I can say to you they play skilfully. Therefore I can say all is going well. Shout ye inhabitants of Zion for the Lord is doing a great work. And whilst the brethren are engaged in praying, for sinners; and that God would give their Preachers souls for their hire; I tell you they do not like some professed christians, close up their purse strings, and lock up their houses and barns; thinking if the good Lord hear their prayers and give the preachers souls, his family and horse can live. You may ask why they do not so here, the reasons may be these. This part of the world is occupied by yankee people noted for inventions, and they have ascertained that preachers and their family and horse cannot learn to eat souls. * Seeing then that the Preachers and family cannot subsist on souls, in this world they impart to them that which he and his family need of the "meat that perisheth." I am not suffered to lack a supply of flour, or meat, or oats or corn. We have had some accessions to the church and are looking for many more. Pray for us.

Wm. Hatfield.

*Not a bad notion. Ed.

Bucyrus, O. Dec. 7th, 1846.

Br. Bassett: Br. Robinson is laboring very zealously in the cause of his Master. He is received with warm hearts, and is beloved by all and his labors have been blessed in some degree. May the God of all grace stand by him and give him souls for his hire. He has held 2 protracted meetings since quarterly meeting; one at Everhart's school house where the Great Head of the church made manifest his saving power. Sinners were led to bow to the mild sceptre of king Emmanuel while his people were enabled to rejoice. The church is being awakened up out of her lethargy, and crying mightily to God for an out pouring of the Holy Spirit.

On the 28—29th we had a protracted meeting at Searys meeting house, on the Tiffin Road. It was a good time but no conversions took place.

I would state that an unfortunate error must have occurred in the return of members to the Annual Conference. On examination of the different classes, but 150 are found, including removals, instead of 200, as stated in the Report of Conference. Simon Halm.

OHIO DISTRICT.

Xenia Circuit O. Dec. 10, 1846.

Dear Br. Bassett: My lot, this year, has fallen among a kind hearted sympathetic people, who are firmly and unwaveringly attached to the principles they have espoused, notwithstanding severe discouragements arising from abuse of confidence reposed.

Our first Quarterly Meeting was held at Bellbrook commencing Nov. 7 and continued three days. It was a "time of refreshing from the presence of the Lord" to the church. On sabbath morning especially, in our love feast, while the membership were prompt in speaking freely and fully of their christian experience; the Divine presence was abundantly manifest in our midst, enabling us to rejoice together in hope of that eternal "feast of love," which the faithful disciple of Christ shall ere long be permitted to enjoy. On extending an invitation for members five persons came forward and united with us in church fellowship, Brethren R. M. Dalbey and R. Rose came promptly to our aid, and labored faithfully and acceptably during the meeting.

Our Presidential Meeting was held at Xenia commencing Nov. 21st. At this meeting we were favored with the labors of Br. Young, our President and Br. Kezerta. Serious impressions were made, which we trust will result in good. Increased attention to spiritual duties, ardent desire and prayer for revival influence, with a seeming determination of one of old, who said," "Mine integrity I will hold it fast and will not let it go" gives indication of prosperity.

Our prospects, which were at first so discouraging, at present seem much more favorable, than when I wrote you last, and notwithstanding in Xenia our church is small and has to contend with large and popular churches, yet I find our congregations are increasing and hope we may yet see good days. Yours,

Joseph White.

WESTERN RECORDER.

PUTNAM, OHIO.

SATURDAY, DECEMBER 19, 1846.

Soule Chapel—M. E. Ch. South in Cincinnati.—A year ago, the organization of a southern Church in Cincinnati, was quite a novelty. When we announced Bishop Andrew's official recognition of it, with its ministers, Rev. Messrs, Sehon, Maley, and Latta, as associated with the Kentucky Conference, we were moved to express ourself, rather prophetically, in this wise: "Who knows, but this said Kentucky Conference, will ere long hold a session in Cincinnati, bishop Andrew presiding." We little thought that our presumption would so soon be half verified. A late number of the Nashville C. Advocate brings us an interesting letter from Br. Sehon, Preacher in Charge at Soule Capel, Cincinnati, giving some particulars respecting the late session of the Kentucky Conference, at Covington, opposite Cincinnati. During the session of the Conference, preaching was had by its members, every night at Soule Chapel. And on the Sabbath, after preaching by Prs. Bascom and Early, Bishop Soule performed the ordinations. Br. Sehon, speaks of it as a "strange transition from the scene of but twelve months before, when he was rudely expelled from the presidency of an Annual Conference, (Ohio) to behold him now in the very same city, in the full exercise of his episcopal powers." He further speaks in more laudatory terms of the bishop, than would some of his and our cotemporaries: 'that man, who has done more than any other now living, to advance and support Methodism on this continent, —the aged, faithful, dignified, useful and venerable Joshua Soule." Bishop Andrew was too unwell to officiate during the Conference, but on the following Sabbath, Br. S. sates that he "preached in Soule Chapel to an immense crowd of deeply attentive hearers." The congregation was said to be "pleased, delighted, and deeply effected."

We give the above, among the passing events of the day, for our readers will be interested with us, to know "what a changing world we live in."

An Anti Slavery Church in Kentucky.—After we have given some account of a Southern Church in Ohio, in juxtaposition, our readers will be interested to hear of an Anti-Slavery Church in Kentucky. A late number of the Watchman of the Valley states that the Rev. John G. Fee, a native of Kentucky, but a graduate of Lane Seminary, and for some time connected with the Cincinnati (N. S.) Presbytery, is now settled in Lewis county Ky. and has a church under his care, "established on anti Slavery principles, which has adopted a rule, to receive no slaveholders except they repent of that sin." The Watchman further says, "Mr. Fee is a straight out, consistent anti Slavery man, in deed as well as word—anti Slavery in principle, as well as in sentiment, and in practice as well as in principle, and that he has fearlessly maintained his principles before his congregation, and applied them to practice." He delivered a course of Anti Slavery lectures before his people. This "stirred up a breeze around him, but" says the Watchman, "it was only a breeze which had no force against the weight of conscience and honest conviction that opposed it. He rode out the storm, and is now enjoying, we trust, the fruits of his dauntless honesty and fidelity—the growing prevalence of anti Slavery principles around him."

It seems however that the Synod of Kentucky disapproved of the institution of an anti Slavery test of membership in the church of Mr. Fee, and adopted a resolution "affectionately requesting and exhorting him to review his course in this matter, and to desist from the exercise of the objectionable rule referred to." The Synod further refused to recommend Mr. Fee for the aid of the American Home Missionary Society. Yet that society subsequently reappointed him and he is still laboring under its patronage. Extracts from the "Constitution" are given in the "Watchman," showing that the rule of admission adopted by Mr. F. and and his church, was no infringement. "Every Christian Church &c. is entitled to declare the terms of admission into its communion." Again, "the officers of the church are the judges of the qualifications of those to be admitted to sealing ordinances."

Graham's Magazine.—The number for Jan. 1847, has been received, and is a brilliant affair. One mezzotint, and two elegant line engravings, with illustrations of American Game Birds, are among its embellishments. It contains a Prize story by C. J. Peterson, for which was awarded a premium of $200. Mr. Graham commences now his 30th volume, with an extensive circulation. Terms, $3 per annum, in advance. Two copies for $5. Five copies for $10. For 5 new subscribers and the pay, an extra copy will be given, or a copy of 'the Fountain,' an elegant annual for 1847. Address, G. R. Graham, Chesnut St. Philad.

Peterson's Ladies' National Magazine.—The January number has been laid upon our table. It contains a larger amount of reading matter than previous numbers, and more embellishments than usual. Of these, are two mezzotint engravings, and a colored fashion plate. Illustrations are given also, of fashions in 1776. The publisher promises for the ensuing volume, Historical Pictures, Scriptural Scenes, and a Floral Department. Terms, $2 per year, in advance. Three copies for $5. Seven copies for $10 Address, C. J. Peterson, Chesnut St Philad.

Braithwaite's Retrospect, of Practical Medicine and Surgery.—By politeness of the American publisher, D. Adee, N. York, we have, received through the mail the first part of this valuable work, containing 156 pages with an index. As Mr. Adee devotes himself to the publication of works of the useful sort, any thing heretofore received from his publishing house has received a welcome, and a recommendation. The 'Retrospect' is a republication of the work of Mr. Braithwaite, a celebrated Professor of Surgery at Leeds, Eng. and contains 'a retrospective view of every discovery and practical improvement in the Medical Sciences.' It is a Half Yearly Journal, furnished at $1 per annum in advance. The first part, which we have received. contains numerous papers on Practical Medicine, Surgery, Midwifery, Anatomy and Physiology. From our examination of it, we find many articles, we should judge useful, not only to the profession, but to private families. We see that the work of Mr. Braithwaite is highly recommended by numerous medical journals. Address, Daniel Adee, Fulton St. N. York.

Illustrated Botany.—The November number of this valuable work has just come to hand. We have had our fears that the monthly publications of Mr. Wellman, do not receive the amount of patronage which they justly merit, and that this has occasioned the delay of their issue for a month or two past. The 'Emporium' and the 'Young Peoples' have been missed from our table since September. But the appearance of the 'Illustrated' again, cheers us with the hope that all will be forthcoming soon. There are four most charming colored plates in this number. Every lover of Botanicla Science ought to have the Illustrated Botany; Terms, $3 a year, Two copies for $5 in advance, Address, J. K. Wellman, Nassau St. N. Y.

American Pulpit.—The December number has beeen received, containing three sermons by eminent ministers of different denominations. We still hope that we shall find space soon, to give our readers an occasional sermon from this work. We have two or three choice ones in reserve, for this purpose. The American Pulpit, is a very neat and useful Monthly publication, and is not of a denominational character, Terms $1 per year. Address, Sam'l. E. Chism, Worcester, Mass.

Monthly Reporter.—No. 4, for November, has come to hand. It contains an interesting account of the re-opening of the Frst M. P Chapel, Philadelphia, and the sermon by the Pastor. The contents of the number are exclusively from the pen of the Editor, Rev. T. H. Stockton. We are happy to learn from his own statement, that his health is somewhat improved, and his 'resources a little enlarged,' Engagements, 'occasional and regular, private and pastoral, with the state of his health, spirit and funds,' have conspired to delay a while the publication. The remaining two numbers of the 'Reporter' are to be issued soon, and the further designs of the Editor, will be found stated in a prospectus which we give in another column.

Sacred Melodeon.—We have on hand fifty copies of this excellent collection of Spiritual Songs, compiled and published at Cincinnati, by Brethren J. Dalbey, Jr. and J. B. Peat, both of the Ohio Conference. Prices—single copy, 30 cents. Wholesale, $23 per hundred. The publishers offer the following proposition: Any travelling minister or preacher who will take 50 copies, by paying half the amount down, can have until Conference to pay the remainder. We have heretofore recommended this work to the patronage of our friends, and wish it may meet with a liberal patronage. We will be pleased to sell copies at this office, single or by the dozen.

Saturday Evening Post.—This is one of the largest and best of our eastern weekly newspapers. We esteem it one of our most valuable exchanges. Its recent achievement in procuring the suppression of a demoralizing publication, of which we have heretofore apprised our readers, will still further commend the work to the friends of virtue. We of course; esteem it the more highly, and wish that it may still go forward successfully in the work of literary reform. The 'Post' has reached its 27th volume, and its extensive circulation is still enlarging. Terms, $3 in advance. Three copies for $5. Eight copies for $10. All payments in advance, and post paid. Address, S. D. Patterson & Co., Chestnut St. Phila.

Foreign Arrival.—The Caledonia arrived at Boston on the 5th inst., fifteen days & sixteen hours from Liverpool. She brought word that the grain markets in England, were down, whilst the money market remained in statu quo. Feee trade is progressing throughout Europe. Hon. G. Bancroft has taken his residence at 90 Eaton Square, London. The distress in Ireland continues, though great efforts are made for relief of the poor. The losses by the inundations in France are enormous. It is said it will take sixty five millions of francs to repair the bridges alone, not including private property. Great numbers it is stated are about emigrating from Germany to the United States, especially to Texas. Dr. Habler of Vienna, has prepared gun tow, which proves a more powerful explosive than cotton. An English newspaper has been established at Rome, called the "Roman Advertiser." The cholera is raging at Bagdad. It is said that one hundred victims perish daily.

Rev. E. Y. Reese, Editor of Meth. Protestant.—We have observed repeated intimations in the True Wesleyan, that this brother is a slaveholder, calculated if not designed to injure his standing in the north. We see that the Baltimore Saturday Visitor, (which by the by is an Anti Slavery paper and printed we believe in the same office with the M. Protestant,) has rebuked this insinuation, as unsupported by facts. The Wesleyan, last number has done itself the credit to 'correct the error.' Br. Reese has also given in his paper, his disclaimer. We know the Editor of the M. Protestant, and from full conversation upon the subject, we know that he hates slavery as do we.

Church Division.—The series of articles under the head, are from the pen of an itinerant minister of the Genesee Conference, and who has been a frequent contributor to the columns of the Methodist Protestant.

Disciplines.—We have received from the Book Agent, Baltimore, twelve dozen copies, Discipline, M. P. Church, new edition, 1846. We shall be pleased to supply our friends of surrounding circuits, at wholesale or retail. We have not yet received a supply of Hymn Books.

Ohio Legislature.

The Senate convened, Monday, Dec. 7th and being called to order by Dowty Utter, proceeded to the election of its officers. E. B. Olds was elected Speaker, J. G. Breslin, Clerk, and R. Mullen Sergeat-at-Arms.

Same day, the House was called to order by Mr. Kaler. The oath was administered to the members by Justice Martin. Wm. P. Cutler was elected Speaker, E. G. Squier, Clerk, and J. W. Jones, Seargeant-at-Arms. A resolution was adopted, authorizing payment out of the State Treasury, of the postage of members and clerks of both houses on all letters and documents on public business, not weighing over 6 ounces, and also on all letters and public documents, they may see proper to frank. The resolution was concurred in by the Senate. On motion of Mr. Bennett, of Tuscarawas, it was agreed that the Speaker be instructed to request clergyman of the several denominations to attend and open the morning sessions with prayer.

Tuesday, 8th. The Message of the Governor was received and read in both houses, this forenoon. A resolution was offered in the Senate, in the afternoon by Mr. Ford, authorizing the resident clergy, to be invited to open the session with prayer. The resolution was warmly opposed by Mr. Reemlen, of Hamilton, in a lengthy speech. He objected to public prayer, in tolo, and read from the New Testament "enter into thy closet" &c. Yet the resolution was adopted, yeas, 24; nays, 9.

Wed. 9. In the House, the Report of the officers of the Lunatic Assylum was received, and an order passed for printing five thousand copies in English, and two thousand in German.

Thu. 10. In Senate. The standing Committees were announced, 25 in number.

In the House, a bill was introduced by Mr. Blake for repeal of certain acts, "regulating black and molatto persons." In the afternoon, the Senate convaned in joint session with the House, to count the votes for Governor. The result was, Bebb, (Whig) 118,857. Tod, (Dem.) 116,489. Lewis (Liberty) 10,799. No returns from Mercer and Wyandott. William Bebb was declared duly elected. Joint Committees were appointed to wait on the Governor elect.

Fri. 11. House. The Speaker announced the names of twenty six Standing Committees.

Sat. 12. At eleven o'clock the Senators repaired to the Hall of the House, where in joint session, the ceremonies of the inauguration of Gov. Bebb, were attended to. The ceremonies and Address occupied about one hour.

Mon. 14. In Senate. The death of Mr. Horr, Senator from Delaware, was announced, and after the usual resolutions of respect and sympathy, the Senate adjourned.

House. Mr. Truesdale introduced a preamble and resolutions deprecating the annexation of Texas, the existing war with Mexico, and protesting against the admission of any more slave States into the Union. Mr. Vallandingham, introduced resolutions approving the existing war with Mexico, as justifiable, necessary, and constitutional.

PRESIDENT'S MESSAGE.—We undertook to give the lengthy document entire in our inside form this week. After it was all in type, finding it could not go in, we had two columns of long primer taken down, and reset in minion type, for the purpose of compressing it within our limits and after all we were obliged to omit one paragraph of the Message, respecting Oregon, which we now insert. By the by, does'nt the President say Mexico a heap of times in that Message?—more than two hundred times! Some of the printers think they nearly run out of x's and capital M's. Here is the passage omitted last week.

"It will be important, during your present session, to establish a territorial government and to extend the jurisdiction and laws of the United States over the Territory of Oregon.—Our laws regulating trade and intercourse with the Indian tribes east of the Rocky mountains should be extended to the Pacific Ocean; and for the purpose of executing them, and preserving friendly relations with the Indian tribes within our limits an additional number of Indian agencies will be required, and should be authorized by law. The establishment of custom-houses, and of post offices and post roads, and provision for the transportation of the mail on such routes as the public convenience will suggest, require legislative authority. It will be proper, also, to establish a surveyor general's office in that Territory, and to make the necessary provision for surveying the public lands, and bringing them into market. Our citizens who now reside in that distant region have been subjected to many hardships, privations, and sacrifices in their emigration, and in their improvements have enhanced the value of the public lands in the neighborhood of their settlements, it is recommended that liberal grants be made to them of such portions of these lands as they may occupy, and that similar grants or rights of pre-emption be made to all who may emigrate thither within a limited period, to be prescribed by law.

The kind letter of Br. J. B. Peat, so far from 'presuming upon our good nature,' has brought us under obligations to him, and we desire him ever to use the like freedom in writing to us.

THE MARKETS.

Wheat is selling in Zanesville and Putnam at 90 cts. per bushel; Flour $3,25; Pork, $2,25 @ $2,50.

The Chronicle of the 12th inst. gives the following account of the price of flour and pork in Cincinnati:—

Flour—Sales and receipts are both reported moderate for the past week—extremes $3,40 to $3,45.

Hogs—Sales seem to be well sustained, as per sales 230 lbs. average weight at $3.40—200 lbs. average weight at $2,95—220 lbs. average weight at $2,90, and so on for heavy hogs, which always command an extra price for eastern packers. The last we note is a lot of 870 head, average weight 230 lbs. at $3,00.

NARRATIVE.

TOO GOOD TO BE LOST.

During a former session of Congress, Messrs. Corwin of Ohio, and Jenifer of Maryland, were very intimate. The latter, like all Marylanders believes the "Eastern shore" is the paradise of the world, and he was in the habit, as often as opportunities afforded, of "poking fun" at Corwin about the "Buckeyes" and the State of Ohio generally. Corwin bore this persecution patiently for a while, usually, however, returning shot for shot; until one day while dining at the President's Jenifer came down upon him so hard, that Corwin resolved to silence him forever, so rising from his seat he remarked, that he was not in the vein for story telling, but he would relate an incident that occurred during the early part of his professional career, in a court house in the interior of the State of Ohio.

He said that the Judge had taken his seat, upon the bench, and a cause was about to be commenced, when a very white-haired old gentleman came tottering into the court room, upon a cane in either hand. The old man was a soldier of the revolution, and had come in to procure a lawyer to prepare his papers, that he might get his semi-annual payments. This service was always of course rendered gratis.

The papers, continued Mr. C., were handed over to him, and after asking some of the other necessary questions, he enquired the age of the pensioner.

In a tremulous, shrill voice, the old man answered, "forty-five."

"You do not understand me, old gentleman," said Mr. C. "I wish to know how old you are."

"I am forty-five, young sir."

"My dear sir, I do not wish to know how old you were when you entered it—but I want to know how old you are now."

"I told ye, forty-five."

Mr. Corwin then looked up to the Judge, (who was himself getting out of patience,) in despair, and his honor taking the matter in hand, in a peremptory manner remarked to the old gentleman, "The court cannot be detained in this way—the counsel is endeavoring to render you a gratuitous service, and you must not trifle with his time.—Answer his question direct. Now, sir, how old are you?"

"I am forty-five Judge, again shrilled out the old soldier."

"I will not bear this contempt any longer," said the Judge. "If you do not answer the question the next time it is put, you shall be committed, aged as you are. Now, sir, again I ask, how old are you?"

"I am forty-five!" the old man provokingly repeated.

"Mr. Sheriff, take him to jail, the Court will see whether that will do him any good."

The old gentleman was led away, but just as he was going out the door, he raised up his head, and partly turning around on his sticks, toward the Court, said:

"Judge, the first thirty-seven years of my life, I lived on the Eastern shore of Maryland? You surely don't think God will count them against me.

Mr. Jenifer has not been heard to say 'Ohio' since.—Cin. Gaz.

The body of the Rev. Mr. Towler, a missionary of the Primitive Methodist Church, was interred in Greenwood Cemetry on Sunday afternoon. He died in this city, of congestion of the brain on Friday last, and his loss is keenly felt.—N. Y. Sun.

MR ADAMS.—The Physicians of Ex-President Adams declare that he is too ill to take his seat in Congress during the present session. He is evidently improving, but the excitement of debate would be too hazardous to encounter.—N. Y. Sun.

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

LATER FROM THE ARMY.

Monclova and Chihuahua taken—Expedition against Victoria—March of American Forces upon Saltillo.

By the arrival last evening of the steam-ship McKim, from Brazos Santiago, which left on the morning of the 22d inst. we are placed in possession of interesting items of intelligence from the army. The McKim brought a great number of passengers. To Captain G. T. M. Davis, of the Illinois volunteers, aid-de-camp to Gen. Shields, and who is bearer of dispatches from Wool to Washington, we are indebted for whatever of interest we give to the public to-day from the army.

On the 26th October, Gen. Wool's column, almost 2600 strong, being within four days march of Monclova, was waited upon by the Mexican Governor, Lopez, with an escort, who solemnly protested against the forces of the United States entering the town of Monclova, and contended that the course of Gen. Wool was in violation of the armistice agreed upon at Montery. Gen. Wool was not moved by the protest, or by the naming of the armistice, but assured the Governor he would enter the city, and take possession of it. This he did on the 30th October. The Governor then told Gen. Wool that he had protested against his movements to satisfy his Government, but his army would be treated as friends, and the best houses in the city were offered to Gen. Wool for his quarters. When Captain Davis left, the army was in quiet possession of the place, and the best of beef, mutton, wheat, corn, &c., &c., were furnished them by the Mexicans at very reasonable prices.

Gen. Wool had heard unofficially of the capture of Chihuahua by Col. Kearney, and the General had consequently determined to remain in Monclova until further advices were received.

Capt. Davis travelled from Monclova to Monterey, distance 266 miles, in six days. He left Monclova 2d November, reached Montery on the 8th, and left the latter place on the 11th for Camarga. He passed from Monclova to Monterey without an escort, save two Mexican guides. The troops of Gen. Wool's column are in excellent health. At Monterey there was some sickness.

Gen. Taylor and his staff, accompanied by General Worth and his brigade, started on the morning of the 15th from Montery, to make a reconnoissance with a view of taking Saltillo, which is, no doubt, ere this, in our possession.

Gen. Patterson had left Camargo with about 2000 men en route for Tampico.

From the African Colonies.

By the arrival of the schooner Boston, Capt. Luddington, 38 days from Monrovia, The New York Sun has received newspapers from Monrovia (Liberia) to the 12th of October. First in importance by this arrival, is the following proclamation, ordering an election, preparatory to the establishment of the Republic of Liberia as an independent nation:

Proclamation.

Whereas, certain documents, from the Board of Directors of the American Colonization Society, touching the independence of Liberia,—having been submitted to the consideration of the Legislature at its extra session in July last; the following preamable and resolution were unanimously adopted:—

"Whereas, the resolutions sent out from America, by the American Colonization Society, which are now before the Legislature, and by which the Society hath dissolved the political relations which hitherto have subsisted between them and the people of these colonies; and formed them into one body politic: and, whereas the action which the people of these colonies will be called upon to take upon them, is of the most weighty and responsible character; therefore, in order to afford sufficient time for the people to act with the wisdom and caution which so solemn an act demands: Therefore, Resolved, That the Governor be instructed to command the people by proclamation issued in reasonable time, to meet in the different towns and villages in this commonwealth, at such time as he may deem proper, to make such disposition of said resolutions, and to take such farther action in the premises as in their collective wisdom they deem proper."

Now, therefore, to the end that the said preamble and resolution may be carried into effect: I, Joseph J. Roberts, Governor of the Commonwealth of Liberia, do, by this my proclamation, appoint Tuesday, the 27th of October next ensuing, as the day on which the people of this Commonwealth will assemble in their respective towns and villages, and hy a solemn vote determine, whether they will, or will not, adopt the recommendations submitted by the Board of Directors of the American Colonization society, touching the independence of Liberia; those voting in the affirmative, will signify on their tickets, whether the Legislature at its annual session in January next, shall draft a constitution to be submitted to the people for their adoption or whether a convention shall be ordered for that purpose. The sheriffs of the different counties are hereby required to cause the polls to be opened in the various towns and villages throughout this Commonwealth, on the Tuesday aforesaid, and the voting conducted, and returns made, according to the rules and regulatrons prescribed by law for holding general elections. The judges and clerks appointed by the Court of Quarter sessions, to serve at the annual election to be held in October next, will attend at the polls, in their respective capacities, on the day, and for the purpose herein named. Done at Monrovia, this 10th day of September, A. D. 1846.

J. J. ROBERTS.

JOHN N. LEWIS, Col. Sec.

There was not the least doubt of the result of the election; all classes were in favor of assuming the position of an independent nation. The other colonies will doubtless unite with Liberia, and form a union of African Republics, as the United States of Africa, under one constitutional head, like our own confederation. What an era in the history of poor Africa. That once benighted land, now rising by the energy of her own sons to claim a position among the enlightened nations of the earth! Well may our country rejoice over this other triumph of her benevolence and missionary zeal, the counterpart of that glorious achievement in the Pacific ocean. Within the brief period of twenty-five years, American missionaries and benevolence have founded the kingdom of the Sandwich Islands on this Hemisphere, and laid a sure, and we hope a lasting foundation for the Republic of the United States of Africa on the Eastern Hemisphere. Liberia is becoming free in reality, as she is in name, and with a continent as vast as our own, but more densely populated by native tribes, we hope her national career will reflect the progress of those from whom she draws her religion, politics, science and art. Long may Liberia and her sisters live to enlighten Africa, and develope the resources of that great and fertile continent.—N. Y. Sun.

OHIO MAGNETIC TELEGRAPH.

The plan is devised, and the means if not provided already, undoubtedly will be in a short time, for extending a line of magnetic telegraph from Pittsburgh, through Weeling, Zanesville, Columbus, Dayton and Cincinnati, to Louisville. This branch of the great system of magnetic telegraphs, is to be designated the Ohio Magnetic Telegraph. At Pittsburgh, it is to connet with the telegraphic lines communicating with Philadelphia, New York, &c; and at Louisville, to connect with another line, communicating with St. Louis, and New Orleans. Mr. HUGH DOWNING, the agent and temporary President of the Ohio Magnetic Telegraph line, made a sort of flying visit to our City on yesterday, and laid the plans of the association before a number of our citizens, with the view of affording them the opportunity of cooperating in the enterprise. According to the plan which he submitted, but three thousand dollars of the stock necessary for the completion of the work, is assigned to Columbus—and it is left optional with the citizens whether to take that amount or not. If not taken here, there were those elsewhere who stand ready to take the requisite amount. The association contemplate having their work in successful operation from Pittsburgh to Cincinnati within six months.—O. S. Journal.

MORE LOSS OF LIFE.—The Journal of Commerce furnishes the following additional record of life by the gale.

The schooner Direct, Briggs, before reported lost at Egg Island Bar. The captain, mate and cook, perished, and were buried by the three hands that were saved. Richard Doughty, Ethan Prior, and John Davis, were taken off by a Virginia potato boat, which blew out to sea, and were picked up by the New Jersey pilot boat Sylph, and towed into New London, where the Sylph now lies.—Doughty and Prior left New London with two of the pilots of the Sylph, in the Virginia schooner for New York, and the vessel was lost. Scott, one of the pilots, was drowned; Davis, the other hand, came to New York on the Long Island Rail Road last night. Captain Bacon, of the steamer New Haven, gave him a free passage to Greenport, and paid his passage to New York, in the Long Island train.

THE STEAMBOAT DISASTER.—A notice in the New York Tribune of the wreck of the Atlantic steamer, from one who seems to well understand his subject, concludes as follows:

"Peace be to the bold sailor; but let it not be concealed, but rather most earnestly urged on the public and on the press, that that sad accident was caused mainly by the fool-hardy daring, engendered, nourished, and encouraged by the puffs of the papers, and the reckless and restless urging of the travelling community. The Governor, an excllent sea boat, in that respect probably superior to the Atlantic, but having a prudent captain, did not venture out, in spite of the promptings of her passengers, who were, however, well content the next morning when they saw the general effects of the past night. The press, and they alone, can correct these evils. Let them see to it, for on them rests a fearful responsibility."

THE GREAT RAILROAD TO THE PACIFIC.—The project of A. Whitney, Esq., for the construction of a Railroad from Lake Michigan to the Pacific Ocean, has found favor with the New York Chamber of Commerce, that body having adopted the following resolution, without dissent:—

Resolved, That the plan proposed by A. Whitney of a Railroad to connect the waters of Lake Michigan and those of the Pacific—however gigantic in proportion, and costly in the accomplishment—is one to which this Chamber would respectfully invite the attention of Congress, under the conviction that great national objects are at stake upon the issue, and that through the instrumentality of the National Domain only, can they be successfully attained.

THE SMITHSONIAN INSTITUTE.—The Regents of the Smithsonian fund have performed all important business before them and adjourned. The question in regard to the Professorships and Lectures has been postponed for the present. For the nucleus of the Library, however, the sum of $20,000 was voted. The salary of the Secretary was fixed at $3,500, and when the buildings are completed a house will be added. Prof. Henry, will of course, accept the office. Mr. Jewett, of Brown University, Providence, will be the Librarian. The Secretary has the appointment of the office, but the Regents have indicated their choice. His salary will be $3000. The President of the United States gave his ready assent to the application of the Regents for the appropriation of the whole of the large reservation of land called the Mall, in Washington City, to the purposes of the Institution.—Alex. Mess.

DROWNED.—On Thursday night a man was drowned at Wellsville. He is believed to have been a German Lutheran Preacher, as he had passed through Wellsville on Saturday, as he said, to preach in the German Luthern Church at New Lisbon. There were two names on the way bill from N. L. namely, RISER and FLICK, and as one of the passengers had gone down the river, it is not known certainly which of them was drowned. He was near sighted and wore spectacles, and in stepping he mistoook the distance of the steamer from the wharf boat and fell in, it being about 9 o'clock at night. Nothing but his hat was saved. It is believed he belonged to Pittsburgh.—Pitts. C. Adv.

REV. DR. ARMSTRONG LOST.—Among the passengers lost in the Atlantic, was the Rev. Dr. Armstrong, for many years the Corresponding Secretary of the American Board of Foreign Missions of New York. He left Boston on Wednesday evening, took the Atlantic near Norwich, and expected to reach home on Thursday morning. He spent the day of Thursday during the gale, in preaching to the passengers and praying with them, inspiring them with calmness and hope while all were looking forward to a speedy wreck, and a grave in the deep. When the steamboat struck ground, the passengers leaped overboard, to make for shore part were borne by the waves to land, and others, among whom was our friend were caught by the return waves, dashed among the rocks, and were lost.

John Quincy Adams has written the following letter to a gentleman of Alexandria, in reference to the retrocession of that town to the State of Virginia:

QUINCY, Mass., Nov. 9, 1846.

SIR:—In answer to your letter of the 3d inst., I have no hesitation to say that I hold the Act retroceding the county of Alexandria to the State of Virginia as unconstitutional and void. How the Supreme Court of the United States would consider it, I cannot undertake to judge, nor how they would carry it into execution should they determine their act unconstitutional. The Constitution of the United States—

Stat magna nominis umbra.

I am, very respectfully, &c., your obedient servant. JOHN QUINCY ADAMS.

Senator McDuffie has sent his resignation to the Governor of South Carolina. His health will not justify him in holding his seat.

DESTRUCTIVE FIRE AT NEW ALBANY.—We regret to hear that the extensive foundry establishment of Messrs. Lent, Shipman & South, of New Albany, was entirely consumed by fire on Thursday night last. A large and spacious new building, which had just been erected by them, and in which they were about moving, was also very materially injured, although only a portion of it was burnt. The loss, as we hear, amounts to from $10,000 to $20,000—in insurance. All the patterns, and four engines nearly finished were destroyed. Messrs. Lent, Shipman & South, are interprising and active young men, and their loss is also regarded as a great loss to this city. The New Albany Insurance Company with a liberality deserving of all praise, tendered the firm the loan of $1000, for three years, without interest. The citizens also held a meeting at the Court House yesterday evening, at which $5000 additional was raised, and offered them on the same terms. They are making arrangements to commence their business immediately, with renewed energy and vigor. We doubt not they will soon entirely recover from this unfortunate shock. The fire is believed to have been the result of accident.—Louisville Courier.

The train of cars which left this city yesterday morning for Cumberland, ran off the track about four miles this side of the Point of Rocks, and a passengers named Hugh Haughey, of Ellicotts Mills, who was standing on the platform of one of the cars, was thrown under the cars, and instantly killed. The baggage car and tender were very much damaged. No injnry was sustaid by the passengers cars or the locomotive.—[Balt. paper.

BOSTON GENEROSITY.—The Boylston Insurance Company, of Roston, presented $500 to the mother of the late Orlando Pitts, Secretary of that Company, who perished in the wreck of the Atlantic.

ACCIDENTS ON THE READING RAILROAD.—On Saturday afternoon, a passenger named John Hagerty had both ancles horribly crushed by a locomotive passing over them on the track of the Reading Railroad at Richmond. It is feared that amputation of both his wounded limbs will be necessary. Martin Deranny, a brakeman on the Reading Railroad, had his hnnd dreadfully crushed between two coal cars at Mooresville, on Friday evening.

The Charleston Evening News announces the death of the Hon. Henry Deas in his 77th year. He has filled many stations of honor, and was much esteemed.

BURIED ALIVE.—Mathias Stevens lost his life at Danbury, Ct., on Tuesday week, by the caving in of a well in which he was working, thirty feet below the surface. He was 38 years of age and left a large family.

BOILER EXPLOSION.—At South Boston, Wednesday morning, the steam boiler in the machine shop of Jobez Coney, South Boston, exploded. The boiler was driven through the brick wall of the building, across an open space an entirely through a wooden building, filled with machinery, and thence over the river, a distance of nearly one eighth of a mile, where it struck against the piles of Mr. Giles's wharf, breaking one of them, and then fell into the dock. The machine shop was full of workmen at the time of the accident, but most fortunately only two were hurt, and those not very seriously.

GEN. VEGA.—This Mexican officer, before his departure from New Orleans, published a card expressive of the kindness he had received from all classes during the period he was a prisoner of war in the United States. His own demeanor, we may add, won for him the esteem of every American who had the pleasure of making his acquaintance.

SHIPWRECK.—A letter written at Quebec, states that the brig Scotsman, Jamieson, fsom Montreal for Liverpool, was driven on the rocks of Big Island, on the 20th ult., but was immediately forced off by an easterly wind and sunk. The crew, nine in number, took to the boats, but were all lost except one man.

Reasons for Quitting Tobacco Chewing.

1. It injures the teeth—causing them to decay faster than it otherwise would, and gives them a yellowish, filthy appearance, in spite of the daily application of the tooth-brush.

2. In injares the gums—corroding them in some cases so as to lay the roots of the teeth entirely bare, and thereby loosening them, and causing them, in some instances to fall out.

3. It pollutes the breath—frequently causing persons, particularly ladies, many unpleasant sensations at least, if not actual nausea, and thereby causing the tobacco chewer, if he be a gentleman, to feel deep mortification.

4. It gives the mouth a very unnatural and disagreeable taste, especially in the morning, which is removed by nothing but the quid.

5. It often subjects the chewer to great inconvenience, especially when introduced into a gentlemans parlor, where the fire-place is closed, and where no spittoons have been provided. The same mortification is frequently experienced at church and elsewhere.

6. It injures the nervous system—paralyzing by its narcotic power its sensibility, and producing a languid, listless feeling.

7. It produces a feeling of faintness and debility at the stomach, caused probably by the loss of so much saliva, which is necessary to the moistening and easily digesting of the foood, and thereby superinduces dispepsy.

8. It retards and finally stops the full and perfect development of the lungs, voice and chest, in the young; and in the old is constantly enervating them.

9. It must be a positive injury to the intellectual and moral powers, if the foregoing positions be true. For if the physical powers are constantly wasting away, the mental must suffer in consequence.

10. The money expended for this deleterious article is worse than thrown away; and if it were given to promote benevolent enterprises, would alleviate a vast amount of human suffering.

11. It contributes to sustain business, which requires a large investment of capital, money and labor, which are worse than lost; and which ought to be employed in enhancing human happinesss

12. It must be a great sin. If it be a sin to neglect the cultivation and improvement of the powers we possess, how much greater the sin to be wasting by degrees each day, our physical, intellectual and moral energies.

TO persons who are acquainted with the character and objects of the CHRISTIAN WORLD, as they have been developed during the last six years, it is only necessary to say, that as soon as one thousand paying subscribers are secured, the paper will be put to press. The Old Subseription List ought to supply this number at once.

To other persons, it is proper to remark, that the Christian World, in print, is intended to reflect the Christian World, in action—in a word, daguerreotype it: and then, for purposes of common advantage, to compare the organized and operature Religion of the Age with the Religion of the Bible.

The enlarged literary and business agencies of the Establishment, are deemed amply sufficient to assure the public of successful management. Its immediate connexion with the CHRISTIAN ATHENEUM—an Institution which is to be furnished with many of the principal organs of Church and State, both in Europe and America,—will give its conductors early access to invaluable sources of universal intelligence.

PROSPECTUS OF THE

LITERARY ATHENÆUM,

A NEW AND SPLENDID MONTHLY MAGAZINE,

TO BE EDITED BY THE

Rev. Henry D. Moore, of Philadelphia,—and Rev. Andrew A. Lipscomb, Professor of English Literature and Belle Letters, in the city of Baltimore.

ON the first of January, 1847, the subscribers intend issuing the first number of a spendid Monthly Magazine, to be called the "LITERARY ATHENÆUM," to be devoted to the interest and circulation of a mind-refining, soul-inspiring, spirit-stirring literature; such a literature, in a word, as the progressive taste of society seems to demand.

Between the magazines of the day, which are devoted almost exclusively to the circulation of Christian Literature, and those devoted to the light, and in too many instances, tasteless and corrupting literature—there is a wide and deep chasm, to fill which successfully and profitably, very few attempts have been made. To supply this void, to some extent at least, is the intention of the subscribers, in issuing the "Literary Athenæum."

The general cast and character of the contents of the proposed magazine will be fixed according to the standard of the most sterling intellect, and the most liberal appreciation of the wants of the common mind. Its pages will ever present a feast and a glow, to feed and illumine the loftiest and purest taste and spirit of the admirers and lovers of refining and exalting literary walks and research.

To secure this grand design, effectually and honorably, no pains or expenses will be spared.

The contents will be purely original; consisting of Lectures, Addresses, Essays, &c., on the most popular and exciting literary and scientific subjects, from the most able writers that can be secured—interspersed and relieved by beautiful poetic composition.

Science, Art, and government, in their almost infinite variety development and interest, will be liberay and honorably discussed in its pages.

Arrangements are in progress for an extensive and important European correspondence, which will be a feature of great interest in its varied connections.

In addition to such articles, there will be presented occasional tales of unexceptionable character and style, differing essentially from the weakish romances which fill the pages of the many magazines of the day. Writers in this connection, can be secured, whose productions are the embodiment of life, true to itself,—and which will kindle and glow with the loftiest and purest sentiment, and thrill with the beauties of morality and religion in their loveliest forms.

Each number of the Athenæum will contain four embellishments of the first artistical merit, One of them will be a portrait of some distinguished personage in this country or in Europe, accompanied with an interesting biograpical sketch. Another will be a view of the buildings and grounds, of some one of the popular Universities, in this or the old world, accompanied with a historical, biograpical and statisical sketch in this body of the work. The portraits will be fine mezzotint, and the college views, beautiful line engravings. Then will follow richly colored specimens of flowers and fruit; in connection with which, there will also be presented interesting notices—floral and botanical—of climate, habits, culture, &c. All of which cannot but secure interest and favor.

Each number will comprise sixty pages of letter-press, double column, beautifully stereotyped, and printed on fine white paper; the whole corresponding in all respects, with the character of the other departments of the work.

Such is to be the character of the work at its commencement. If it is succersful, as it ought to be, and as is hoped and believed it will be,—improvement will be made as far as possible in the different departments, as they are suggested in the progress of the work.

The subscribers take pleasure in announcing to the public, that they have concluded arrangements with the Rev. Henry D. Moore, of Philadelphia, and Rev. Andrew A Lipscomb, Professor of English Literature and Belle Letters, of Raltimore, who will co-operate as Editors the of new Magazine. Under the management of those gentleman, the subscribers flatter themselves, abundant success will be secured in behalf of the enterprise.

TO PUBLISHERS.

The subscribers would also give notice to Publishers, at home and abroad, that there will be in connection with the work, an extensive review department. This will be made a feature of excelling interest. The department will be conducted fairly and honorably, and all works sent to the office of the subscribers, will receive such notices as their character may demand.

The first number will be issued on the first of January, 1847. Its contents and the name of contributors, will be published shortly.

TERMS—Three dollars per annum, in advance.

Editors of papers, copying this Prospectus, and sending a paper with it, to the office of the "Athenæum," shall receive the numbers of the work, and the thanks of the publishers.

All letters, containing orders for the work, post-paid, and enclosing the subscription price, will receive prompt attention. To be addressed to

POETRY.

Written for the Western Recorder.

LINES

On the death of the Rev. D. H. Stephens, late President of Indiana District, M. P. Church.

The summer Sabbath's hallowed light
Was fading midst the shades of even,
Whilst aspirations wing'd their flight
From pious hearts to holy heaven.

From out the west, the silver moon
Gazed on the earth with placid mien,
And twinkling stars came, one by one,
In heaven's blue vault to gild the scene.

Upon the bed of death he lay,
The ambassador of God to man,
Who erst upon this holy day
Was wont to teach salvation's plan.

His life, as yet but in its prime,
Was sinking with the expiring day,
But to another—better clime
His soul prepared to wing its way.

His prattling babes and weeping wife
'Twas hard to leave them here below,
But grace had conquered nature's strife
And now his spirit long'd to go.

Bright scenes of happiness appear Unfolded to his ravished eyes;
"Praised be the Lord my way is clear
To the bright realms of bliss," he cries.

"Yes, tell my brethren," he exclaimed
Exulting with his latest breath
"The gospel, I so oft proclaimed
I've found a sweet support in death."

The latest—ling'ring hues of day
Had faded from the purple west,
When the glad spirit freed from clay
Joined in the chorus of the blest.

LINES.

On the death of Miss Rebecca A. Allen, who died near Cincinnati, at the residence of her Brother-in-law Mr. Samuel F. Cary Esq.

The day had closed, and night had thrown
Her sable mantle, around the evening twilight; as I sat
And watch'd alone, by her dying couch;
Marking with anxious solicitude, each trembling breath,
As on rapid wings it hurried into eternity:
Feering that the next would serve, but to sound
The death-knell, and awake untold agony, in Hearts most dear to her.

All was calm within;
Nought spoke of life, save the faint glimmerings
Of the lamp, which ever, and anon, threw a ray
Of light, across her angel form, reflecting such Heavenly sweetness, that methought, the seraphs Hovered round. How solemn, yet how glorious
Was that night; for doubtless, the Cherubs
Plumed their golden pinions, and with harps Tuned, and strung, waited the watch-word, to convey
The heaven-bound traveler to realms of unceasing glory

But day broke! and the spirit still lingered
In its clay tenement still strugling to free itself
From mortality: But ere the sun attained
His Mid-day strength; the frail house had dissolved,
And amid shouts, and loud hallelujahs,
The new fledged soul, escorted by a band of celestial Songsters, had joined the innumerable company
Close by the throne of God.
Then what music! what ecstatic joy! methinks
All Heaven resounded! And while the tall
Arch-angels clapt their wings, and shouted
"Glory to God in the highest;" the weeping
Friends on earth, echo'd back, "glory to God,"
She's home, she's home!!

And when I have drank the last cup
Of sorrow, and laid me low, in the quiet grave
To sleep; may thy soft hand Rebecca,
Conduct my triumphant spirit, to thine,
And my Father's presence.

Springfield, Ohio, Dec. 10, 1846. Anna.

Ladies' Department.

Literary Ladies.

It has so often been asserted, that by many it is received as if capable of demonstration, that a cultivated mind and a ready pen unfit a woman, of necessity, of the every-day duties of domestic life. But we have yet to learn the philosophy of this opinoin. We appeal to the candid and intelligent reader, of either sex, whether there be an essential incongruity between the love of general knowledge, and the love of homebred duties.—We appeal to the conscientious, whether the wife and mother who redeems time daily, that she may cultivate and enlarge her intellectual powers, for the purpose of imparting what she may acquire to others, will be less likely on that account to bring those powers to bear upon the comfort and welfare of her own family. Can it be that He who made woman rational and immortal, decreed that she should be severed from the world of mind, and buried up under the pressure of mechanical labor? Who will contribute most of zest to the fire-side communings? or, as the circle gather around the evening table with books or work, whose mind will come most freshly to the aid of the child at his lesson? who will select the book for the evening's pastime? nay more, who will ply the needle most chiefly—the woman whose mind has been weighed down through the day with care and trouble about many things, or she whose spirit has been refreshed and elevated by communion with the wise and good? There may be, it is true,

"Hands that will scribble when they ought to bake,"

but it is not for such that we plead, neither is it from such that we expect the wholesome sentiments of practical wisdom. Show us a woman who, when circumstances require it, will not wield a broom with as much willingness as a pen, and pride herself as truly in the excellence of a pudding as in the harmony of a couplet, and, depend upon it, you have selected one who, from some moral physical or mental obliquity, would have exhibited but a one-sided character, even though she had never opened a book. But point us to a woman endowed with good sense, solid attainments, an enlightened conscience, and a desire for knowledge, and though she may and will redeem time from indolence and sleep, and useless visits and vain amusements to acquire what she so much covets, yet it is not too much to assert that she will be the last woman in the world to sit down contented in the midst of a neglected and disorderly dwelling. A well arranged thought would be easily disconcerted by a disarranged room. Order within will be very apt to secure order around. The eye that discovers most readily the beauty of thought, will not on that account be less awake to the deformity of tattered or slovenly attire. The heart that contemplates most frequently its moral relations to the universe, will not be the last to respond to those ties by which the God of the universe has bound the family together as one. No, it is not such a house-keeper that is accustomed to complain of her duties as drugery, nor its pleasures as unwelcome cares.—Miss F. L. Smith in the Ladies' Wreath.

DOMESTIC HELP.

The following question has become a great subject for discussion at the present day, viz: What is the cause of so much difficulty in obtaining females as nurses, and to do housework?

Now I do not think this a "vexed question," neither do I deem it necessary for a person to be skilled in logic or philosopy, in order to be able to answer this question. It only needs a small share of common sense. I think the simple relation of an anecdote will throw ilght enough upon this subject to clear away all the mist that hangs over it.

A short time ago I visited your city, and during my stay, I visited an aged man, who for a number of years did a large commercial business in the city, but now has retired to his country seat in an adjoining town to spend the remainder of his days upon the fruits of his past labor. During my visit, he invited me to ride with him.—We called upon a friend of his, and after the usual salutation, the lady of the house began to tell her troubles. She was destitute of help. The girls were so unsteady now-a-days, that she could get none that would stay more than a fortnight. The old gentleman listened with all the gravity of a judge, until she got through, and then he said, "I am glad of it. I hope you will never get one until you learn how to treat your help." (The old gentleman never carries butter in his mouth to grease his words with.)

The lady exclaimed, "why Mr.———do you mean to say that I don't treat my help well?"

"Yes!" replied the old man.

"Why not?" said the lady.

"Do you let your girls sit at the table with you?" asked the old man.

"No indeed! do you suppose I would have a kitchen girl at my table?"

"Do you have them sit down with you in the parlor?"

"No!"

"Do you treat them as equals or inferiors?"

"As inferiors of course!"

"Then," replied the old man, "out of thine own mouth I will condemn thee. Now," said he, "if you will listen, I will tell you my experience I have no trouble about female help. I have one woman that has been with me thirty-three years, and another eight years. I have employed female help fifty years, and never had one leave me except they got married. Now I will tell you how to manage. I always treat them as equals, I have them sit at my table, and in my parlor when their dutses do not call them to the kitchen, or some other place. They sit with me in church, they come around the same family altar, and I trust they will spend an enternity in the same Heaven with me. I treat them with as much respect as I would you, and I require it of my children. If they are below me in any particular, I strive to elevate them to me; and if they are above me, I strive to elevate myself to them. Now if you will pursue this course, I will warrant you will have no troubleabout help.

Ministers' Department.

Advice to newly ordained Clergymen.—Make up minds deliberately, if you mean to be faithful, to lead a life wherein hardy and venturous faith will be daily tested by calls to unflinching self-denial. Your one work is to win souls to Christ; not to produce a certain general decency and amendment in the face of society around you but as God's instrument, and through the power of Christ's name, to work in living souls the mighty marvel of their true conversion. How painful soever be the thoughts which it excites, never lose sight of this truth, that your ministry has failed as to every soul entrusted to you, who is not under it converted to the Lord, or built up in his holy faith. And such a work must be full of toil and self-denial. The strong man armed will not allow you to spoil his house, and be free the while from molestation. And he is ever ready with his assaults and craft; unless you slumber he will not seem to sleep. Reckon then, first on opposition. And then secondly, remember that in all this you will have a real work to do. Let this thought be always with you. Go out to visit in your parish, not because you ought to spend so much time in visiting your people, but because they have souls; and have committed to you (feeble as you are,) the task of saving them, in Christ's strength, from everlasting burning. Be real with them, strike as one that would make a dent upon their shield of hardness, yea and smite through it to their heart of hearts. When you preach, be real. Set your people before you in their numbers, their wants their dangers, their capacities; choose a subject, not to show yourself off, but to benefit them; and then speak straight to them, as you would beg your life, or counsel your son, or call your dearest friend from a burning house—in plain, strong, earnest words. Let your sermon be your own, made up of truths learned on your knees from your Bible, in self-examination, amongst your people. Add to make them such as this, spare no pains or trouble. Deal much in the great truths which the blessed God has taught us of himself; beware of always tarrying amongst the graves and corruption of our fallen, tempted state, but rise up to God and Christ and and the Holy Ghost and bear your flock with you there. To lead them for themselves indeed, through the Spirit, to believe in the person of the Eternal Son, and so to stand before the Father, accepted in the beloved—this is life eternal.—Rev. S. Wilberforce.

Good Advice of an aged Minister.—At an evening meeting of a Baptist Association, nearly 30 years since, a young collegian, before commencing his sermon made apologies, that being young he could not preach much, would not have them look for an able discourse, etc.—After sermon another young preacher arose and made such a lengthy communication, that when he had taken his seat, he had made us twice glad.

As soon as the meeting was closed, an aged minister called the attention of the brethren and remarked in substance as follows: "My advice to you is, to make no apologies when you are going to preach. If you tell them you cannot preach much, and then should have more liberty than you expected, perhaps some will say you did not tell the truth. And if you should not preach much, the hearers will find it out without your telling them of it. Therefore, it is better to say nothing; but go forward and do the best you can, be short; lest you weary the congregation and exhaust their patience."

Let us beware of making the people twice glad in the same meeting.

Emancipation in the West Indies.

NO. VI.

I have already shown that the sugar business is prospering in Trinidad since emancipation, and that the prospects of the planter are better than ever before. An additional evidence of this is furnished by the fact that the estates generally are making improvements. The steam engine is being generally introduced in the room of the old plan of grinding with mules. The estates generally, at least in the district where I resided, are opening up new land, and extending their operations, and improvements of various kinds are being made. Such, one would suppose, would not be the case, were the business unprofitable, or were it feared that it would become so.

The increased security of society, referred to in a former number, is not only an evidence of prosperity, but itself is an essential element in it.—No community can be considered properous, where a part of the population is in continual dread of the other part. Such was the case during slavery—such is not the case now. Persons and property are as safe as in any place where I have lived. A slaveholding community is always insecure—always in dread of insurrection, and violent commotions. Emancipation removes the danger, and confers security, without which there is no foundation for prosperity.

Again, the prosperity of the colony is advanced in the increasing civilization, and moral intellectual improvement of the people. No enlightened person will say that a community is really prosperous in a state of ignorance and barbarism. But does not slavery necessarily keep the people in such a state? In Trinidad the laboring classes are yet rude and barbarous enough, it is true, but civilizing influences are now at work, and producing visible effects. In the United States, where the number of white people is far greater in proportion to the colored than in the West Indies, even the slaves pick up some of the usages, and some of the knowledge of civilization, but in these colonies, they rose very little above the condition in which they were brought from Africa during slavery. Now they begin every where to dress and live, in some measure, like white people. That they have improved in morals, has been already shown. Moral and religious instructors, and ministers of the gospel, have more free access to them, and a good number are scattered throughout the colony.

Even were no improvement in civilization and morals yet visible, this much at least could be said, that there is a prospect of such improvement. Slavery, the great barrier in the way of all such improvement, is removed, and those influences which harmonize, and moralize, and elevate man, are at work and producing their effects. As to their ineffectual improvement, many of them have already been taught to read the scriptures and other good books, and tracts have been freely distributed, and there is an increasing demand for them. Some of the colored people have been prepared to act as teachers, and the rising generation generally—at least the English part of it, is being instructed in the ordinary parts of English education.

With respect to religion, this island is certainly, owing to causes which need not be mentioned here, behind most of the other English islands.—But something, nay much has been done, since emancipation, to bring the people under the influence of the gospel. It is an excellent field for missionary labor, and there is every reason to hope that ere long, by the Divine blessing, the influence of true religion will extend from this island to other regions—even to Africa itself. The churches in Jamaica, connected with the United Secession Church of Scotland, and I believe also the Baptist Churches, have already set on foot missions to Africa, and the people are found to be quite zealous and liberal in supporting them.

These considerations certainly show that these colonies, (for this remark applies to all of them,) have been rendered incomparably more prosperous by emancipation. Can a country be prosperous in which the great bulk of the inhabitants are ignorant, degraded, and half savages? Such was the condition of the population of these islands during the time of slavery, and such it would have continued, had that system continued. Now there is a good prospect of their soon becoming an enlightened and christian people. To those who can look no higher than to the pecuniary interests of a few sugar planters, all this may be said in vain, but to those who know in what the real happiness and prosperity of a people consists, enough, I am sure, has been said to show that the true interests of these colonies have been infinitely advanced by emancipation.

At the same time, as the people advance in civilization, the interests of the planter are promoted. The complaint is that they are idle and lack industry. So far as this is true, the reason is—they are not civilized—they have not the wants of civilized life, and therefore have not the need of industry to supply these wants. The wants of the barbarian in tropical regions are few indeed. Give him a shade from the sun, and a shelter from the rain where he may lie down—few roots or plantains, which are produced almost spontaneously, to appease his hunger, and he is satisfied. But make him a civilized man, and you supply him with motives for industry—you convert him from an idle barbarian into an industrious peasant. I have already stated that the emigrants from the United States in Trinidad are quite in advance of the other colored people there in civilization. They are also superior in industry. They wish to acquire and enjoy the comforts of civilized life, and to save money. They are admitted to be the most industrious part of the laboring population.

The increase of the population of Trinidad since emancipation shows its prosperity. From the year 1824 when the importation of slaves was prohibited, the population decreased. In 1824 it was 41,120. In 1838 it was 39,328 showing a decrease in that time of almost 2,000. Since that time it has rapidly increased, and is now as near as can be ascertained over 70,000. This is accounted for partly by emigration, but the number of emigrants arrived, with their increase, will not account for the great increase that has taken place. The original population must have increased, showing that fredom is more favorable to human life and comfort than slavery. So far then as the prosperity of a country depends on the comfort of its inhabitants, and the increase of its population, the prosperity of this island has been vastly improved by emancipation.

The public improvements of the colony also show its prosperity. A railway scheme for this island has been projected—a company has been organized in the mother country—the shares were understood to be nearly all, if not quite all, taken, when I left the island, and engineers were actually at work surveying the routes. Ths fact is a very significant one. Capitalists are good judges of the prospects of a country, and are not likely to risk their funds where they see that they are not good. English capitalists would not likely invest their funds in a railway project in Trinidad, were they not convinced that the colony is in a prosperous condition.

The last fact to which I shall refer to show that emancipation has advanced the prosperity of Trinidad, and the other West India colonies, is the great fact that they are free. They enjoy Liberty, and ought not this to convince the people of the United States of all other people, that they enjoy prosperity? What do the people of this county esteem their highest privilege? Is it not their Liberty? What renders the United States prosperous above other nations? Do they not reckon their freedom the principal element in their prosperity? Should they not be the last people in the world to say that a country has become less prosperous because more free? Will it be said that the people there are unfit to enjoy liberty? It is not true. They have improved in the enjoyment of it. The people value liberty, and are grateful for it. I believe it may be said of the people of these colonies generally, what Sir Charles Metcalfe, formerly Governor of Jamaica, said of the population of that Island, in a speech to the House of Assembly: "The population are as free, as independent in their conduct as well conditioned, as much in the enjoyment of abundance, and as strongly sensible of the blessings of liberty, as any that we know of in any country."

These statements and remarks I submit to my fellow citizens. I am not conscious of any want of candor in making them, nor do I feel myself under the influence of any prejudice. True, I confess myself partial to liberty, and I thank God that my prejudices are not on the other side. But I have endeavored to look at things as they really are, and to allow every thing its due weight. I have not denied, nor kept out of view the fact, that some difficulties have been experienced since emancipation. But I hope I have shown that emancipation did not cause these difficulties—that they were produced by other circumstances, and that the imprudence of the planters themselves was no inconsiderable cause of their own difficulties.

A great difficulty has been removed from my own mind. Before I left home, I sometimes saw, in a certain class of papers, confident statements that the experiment of emancipation in the West Indies had failed—that the planters were ruined—that the people would not work, and such like. Is it possible, thought I, that such statements can be made without some real or apparent foundation in fact? The difficulty was increased, when in another class of papers, I found it asserted with equal confidence, apparently on good authority, that the measure was entirely successful, and that the colonies were prospering. But when on the ground, it required but a glance to see the true situation of matters. I saw at once that the former class had seized on the difficulties to which I have referred, and published them to the world as the only results of emancipation, while all its benefits were carefully kept out of sight. I saw at once that these statements were not made by candid men—that they were made to answer a purpose, and not to give to the world a fair and truthful account of the workings of emancipation. These difficulties, I say, were published as the only results of emancipation; while its real—its natural and proper results were carefully hiden. The truth I found to be, that while some temporary difficulties followed the measure, it produced ample and substantial benefits far overbalancing all the disadvantages. In judging of the results of a measure, the part of reason and candor surely is, to compare the advantages and disadvantages, and decide according to the preponderance of the one or the other. In this way I have endeavored to judge of the measure under consideration, and the effect upon my own mind has been a full and thorough conviction that the benefits conferred by emancipation upon these colonies infinitely overbalance all the temporary difficulties which have been experienced.

JOHN SCOTT.

Original Recipe for the cure of Catarrh.—Take one part finely pulverized salt petre, and mix with two parts white sugar reduced to flour. This is an effectual remedy in all stoppages of the head, catarrh, &c. It must be snuffed up the nose a dozen times or more a day, according to the severity of the affection. Persons frequently die from catarrh in the head, the disease becoming so bad that the mucus, instead of discharging through the nose as it should do, falls down the throat and lodges on the lungs, producing many a sore throat, the origin of which is not suspected and terminating fatally in many instances, in that most dreaded of all diseases, consumption. The disease becomes so terrible in some cases, that persons have been unable even to sleep in a bed—they were compelled to sleep and die in their chairs. The mucus from the head should never be allowed to pass down the throat. It should always pass out at the nostrils.

A man in Louisana, riding in a buggy, fell asleep. His horse wandered into the wooods so far that when the man awoke he could not find his way out. He wandered about seven days, and fell down exhausted, but was found, and saved, by some hunters. The horse died of starvation.

Sleep.—Sleep has often been mentioned as the image of death. "So like it," says Sir Thomas Brown "that I dare not trust it without prayer."

OBITUARY.

Written for the Western Recorder.

SISTER JANE McCORD.

Death has deprived us of one of our best members. Sister Jane McCord is gone to rest in Abraham's bosom. She was one of the earliest members of this church, and among its firmest and fastest friends. She embraced religion about 27 years ago, in the 17th year of her age. There had been a Camp-Meeting on Pike-run, held by the E. Methodists. And when it closed, the friends who went from town brought from the camp much of its zeal and devotion, which fitted them for a meeting at home. They went to work in the fear of God, and their labors were blessed. Our beloved sister, now departed, was among the subjects of the work in town. Conviction struck her heart under an exhortation delivered by Br Brockunier; and doubtless she will be a sparkling jewel in his crown of rejoicing in the heavenly kingdom. For she was a genuine and a thorough convert to experimental christianity. She then united with the church, and continued a worthy member thereof till the troubles which resulted in the Protestant Secession. She was a warm and decided Reformer, and reduced her principles to practice—she joined at the organization, and continued an exemplary member to the day of her death.—There was also a consistency in her liberal principles, she was prompt and cheerful in her liberality to support the good cause, to the full extent of her ability. A few days since while visiting an excellent Br. in his affliction—himself a patriarch of Protestant Methodism in this city, I mentioned the name of sister Jane McCord, and it was instantly observable that her name touched a chord of his heart. And with great pleasure, he expatiated upon her virtues. Particularly, I noticed he refered to the days of their incipiency as a church, when, as he said, they "often needed money for something or other," and sister Jane McCord, he said, was always ready to contribute, mentioning the amount she would give.

In her last illness; she was confined about 4 months, during which time she manifested much patience, and entire resignation to the will of God. Since my residence in the city, I frequently visited her, and always found her in a calm and peaceful state of mind. Never once disturbed with doubts, or distressed with fears. Not rapturous, but always serene and happy, calmly confiding in the Lord. Her aged and widowed mother told me a few days since, that during the whole period of her confinement, she never knew her the least concerned about the affairs of the family but once, and that instance speaks the goodness of her heart. Her widowed sister was taken sick of bilious fever, and then she was some troubled, fearing the cause was attributable to her waiting so constantly upon her.

The last time I visited her was on Saturday, Nov. 7th, I observed she was sinking very fast, but still peaceful and resigned. And in the evening, her mother went down to tea, but soon returned to the chamber, when the little girl, who had been left in the room, said, "poor aunt Jane was sleeping so comfortably, don't disturb her." She was silently wading the Jordan of death. Her mother approached her bed, and loudly called her name, she could not speak, but opened her eyes and as a signal that she was on solid rock, and would soon make the 'blessed shore,' she lifted up her hand in triumph. And in a few moments she was no doubt greeted by the heavenly host, upon the 'banks of deliverance,' and had an 'abundant entrance' into the kingdom of our Lord Jesus Christ. The next day, Sunday, a large concourse of people, (though the weather was unfavorable) attended the funeral of her mortal remains, among whom were a number of E. Methodists friends, and one of their stationed ministers walked with me, and performed the ceremonies at the grave.

One more fact may be mentioned, and which will evidence the fervency of her christian friendship. A beloved sister, (Mary Bulford,) of kindred spirit to sister McCord, who used to take similar interest in the welfare of the church, was an intimate companion of hers for 17 years. And like two angels of mercy, when the church, Sunday School, or other benevolent institutions connected with the Society, needed assistance, they would delightfully travel the streets for aid. About 5 years ago, sister B. deceased; and rather than her body, should be taken to another place of interment, the McCords having a family spot in the grave yard belonging to our church, sister Jane readily gave up her place for her friend, with the request that the grave might be dug deep enough to admit of her own corpse to be deposited with hers, when she died. And so, I am informed, it was. Yes, sister Jane McCord would share her loaf in life, and her grave in death.

In the evening, although it appears to be not customary in the cities to preach funerals, in general, yet the writer endeavored to improve the solemnities of the occasion. May the Lord sanctify this death and bereavement to the good of us all. W. Reeves.

NEW SERIES

OF THE

Congressional Globe and Appendix.

CONGRESS at it its last session, through the Joint Library Committee of the two Houses, having authorized a large subscription for the Congressional Globe and Appendix; and the Senate, by resolution, having directed the mode of preparing the reports of the proceedings, and authorized the Secretary of the Senate to contract with the undersigned, stipulating that the reports when written out shall be subject to the revision of the speakers, the Congressional Globe and Appendix is now offered to the public, not only as an authentic, but as an official report of the proceedings of Congress, made under the eye, and published by authority of the body.

The undersigned originated the mode of journalizing the proceedings of Congress, which, thus adopted, is to be perfected with the aid and under the supervision of Congress. Their publication was the first and only one that gave each successive step in every measure in both branches of Congress; a brief of all the debates; every important vote; and an Appendix, including at full length all the revised speeches delivered during the session.

The work, as it is now to be conducted by them, will be found a most perfect political history. The Senators from the States and the Representatives from every section of the Union bring with them into Congress a knowledge of the feelings, sentiments, and interests of their several constituencies. Public opinion and the public information, as it exists among those they represent, are embodied by them; and in the crucible of Congress the wisdom of our times is brought to its test, and is there concentrated, in directing the political movements of the whole country. The impulses thus given through Congress from every quarter react upon the nation as a whole, and all its component parts are made to move in co-operation. The press cannot be more usefully employed than in condensing and again spreading abroad the intelligence of our free country, tending to such happy results through our almost miraculously adjusted State and National institutions.

Having identified ourselves with the plan of advancing the usefulness of Congress by publishing full and impartial reports, and having a large mass of the Congressional Globe and Appendix, issued during the last twelve years, which would be impaired in value to us and utility to the public if the work were discontinued, we have a double motive to prompt us to extend it through a new series. We are resolved, if possible, to give it permanence, and hand it down to successors as a standard work worthy of being maintained and improved. We shall enter upon our new undertaking without being distracted or burdened by any associate labors of the press; and thus unencumbered, shall hope to make the new series a step in advance of the former in all points of execution. With a view to accomplish this, we shall be (one or the other) in attendance on Congress.

The reports will not be affected by our party bias. We believe every member of Congress will bear witness that our reports are full and fair.

The Congressional Globe is made up of the daily proceedings of the two Houses of Congress, and printed on superfine double royal paper, with small type, (brevier and nonpareil,) in quarto form, each number containing sixteen royal quarto pages. The speeches of the members in this first form are condensed—the full report of the prepared speeches being reserved for the Appendix. All resolutions, motions, and other proceedings, are given in the form of the Journals, with the yeas and nays on every important question.

The Appendix is made up of the President's Annual Message, the reports of the principal officers of the Government that accompany it, and all speeches of members of Congress, written out or revised by themselves. It is printed in the same form as the Congressional Globe, and usually makes about the same number of pages during a session.

During the first month or six weeks of a session, there is rarely more business done than will make two numbers a week—one of the Congressional Globe and one of the Appendix; but during the remainder of a session, there is usually sufficient matter for two or three numbers of each every week. The next session will be unusually interesting; therefore, we calculate that the Congressional Globe and Appendix together will make near 1500 large quarto pages, printed in small type—brevier and nonpareil. We furnish complete Indexes to both at the end of a session.

We have on hand the Congressional Globe and Appendix for the last fifteen sessions of Congress, making together fifteen large royal quarto volumes, which we will sell unbound, for $41; or bound with Russia backs and corners for $56. Those who want the back volumes should apply for them immediately, as they are in demand. Congress subscribed for 341 complete sets during the two last sessions. The proceedings of Congress for the last nine years cannot be procured from any other source—Gales & Seaton having stopped printing their Register of Debates in 1837.

We will endeavor to print a sufficient number of surplus copies to supply all that may be miscarried, or lost in the mails; but subscribers should be very particular to file their papers carefully, for fear that we should not be able to supply all lost numbers.

TRACT CAUSE.

ADDRESS

Of the American Tract Society, to its Patrons.

The new Tract House is completed. It has been erected by means of a loan, which, it is expected, will be paid from the annual rents of parts of the building not occupied at present by the Society. Thus, without using any portion of the contributions for the general purposes of the society, facilities are afforded for the commodious and economical transactions of its business, including its printing and binding, on its own premises.

This may be a suitable occasion for a brief review of the work already accomplished by the society; and for a rapid survey of its relations and responsibilities, as it enters on a new era of its history.

In twenty-one years, more than 1200 different publications, including 200 books, have been prepared and stereotyped, in the various languages spoken on this continent, of which more than 84,000,000 copies, or more than 1,700,000,000 pages, have been circulated. At the same time, more than 2,000 publications have been prepared and issued abroad, under the sanction of the Committee, in nearly one hundred different languages and dialects; and $292,000 have been remitted to various Foreign Missionary Stations, and to Societies and individuals on the continent of Europe, to multiply these "leaves of the tree of life for the healing of the nations." Plans for co-operating with missionary and other benevolent institutions throughout the world, in the work of God; for prosecuting systematic Tract visitation; for the volume circulation: and for reaching the destitute masses of every class of colportage, have been matured, and brought into successful operation. Great principles of benevolent action, such as those which relate to Christian union, and the responsibility of laboring personally for the conversion of souls, have been developed and illustrated. Tens of thousands of Christians have been stimulated to voluntary effort in behalf of the unevangelized; and agents and colporteurs have performed hundreds of years of self-denying toil in the wastes of the land. Thousands of redeemed souls, who, have been instructed, quickened or converted by the blessing of the Holy Spirit on the truths thus diffused, in this and other lands, will unite with the Committee in praising God for the being and usefulness of the American Tract Society, while they sing. 'Not unto us, but unto thy name be glory.'

Our limits forbid more than a glance at a single department of our work. American Colportage has become an established means of evangelization. It had its origin in a compassionate desire for reaching with evangelical truth the destitute masses of our population. As it has advanced, family by family, and county by county, in every State and Territory, until more than half a million of households have been visited, and twice that number of standard books have been placed in the hands of the people, the appalling fact has been revealed, that an average of not more than about one half of the population are habitual attendants at the sanctuary of God; that nearly one-third of the population, especially in the newly settled States, are destitute of all religious books, except the bible, while tens of thousands of families have not the Book of books.

The same motive led to the application of the system to the Foreign emigrant population: German, Irish, French, Welsh, Norwegian, and others, Papal and Protestant, among whom a much more general destitution of preaching, and of books and Bibles, has been found to exist. A prey to every error, victims of party intrigue and of individual wrong, deprived of most of the ordinary means of grace; we see not how but for some such agency as colportage, the mass of the 2,000,000 emigrants in America can be effectively brought under the influence of the Gospel—especially the Papal portion, who, notwithstanding long-cherished prejudices and priestly influence, may yet be savingly benefited by kind exhibitions of the truth at their firesides. The Committee would gladly add tenfold to their labors for this most interesting class.

Other fields for colportage are opening on every hand. Besides, our 20,000,000 population will speedily become 40,000,000, by natural increase, immigration, and other causes. To neglect the diffusion of oral and printed truth among all these millions, involves not only the hazard of eternal perdition to countless, immortals but the destruction of our happy framework of government. Evangelization or ruin must be our motto and our watchword.

One hundred and fifty-six colporteurs are now in commission, occupying parts of all the States and Territories, and every month is adding to the number. More than forty students, from sixteen Theological and Collegiate Institutions, have been employed as colporteurs during the summer vacations, and have performed much valuable labor.

While the Committee rejoice in the numbers and fitness to do good of the colporteurs already in the field, and in the cheering results of their labors as they are reported from month to month, they have the painful conviction that vastly more ought to be done in this department of effort. Does not every county or district require a year's toil to reach its destitute inhabitants, demand the labors of a self-sacrificing colporteur, as much as the districts now occupied?

In order to this, there must be a very large increase of donations to the Society's Treasury. It should be known, that the Committee are entirely dependent, under God, on the voluntary contributions of the Society's supporters and frends, from week to week and from year to year—not having any available funds from other sources. And it should be stated, that thus far the present year, the ordinary expenditures have considerably exceeded the receipts; so that with several thousands due for paper and printing, and a very inadequate stock of publications in the Depository, there is also an exhausted Treasury.

The amount of contributions necessary to meet the expenses of the year ending April 1, for Colportage, Grants of Publications, Foreign Distribution, and the indispensable increase of publications in the General Depository, cannot be less than $90,000; of which sum less than $30,000 has been received: leaving upwards of $60,000 to be raised during the next four months. This estimate does not include the amount needed for the extraordinary expenditure of this year, in presses and machinery for doing the Society's printing and binding.

It will be apparent to the friends and patrons of the Society from this statement, that prompt and liberal support must be given to this cause, if it is to be saved from embarrassment, and enabled efficiently to pursue its works of mercy. The Committee would earnestly appeal to whose eye may rest on this communication, not to all wait for an application in another form—which may never be made—but to forward without delay that portion of their worldly goods which they think the Lord would have them. If each donor of $5 the last year, would "sit down quickly and write" $10; if each church contributing $100; would enlarge their liberality to $200; if each pastor who has hitherto omitted to plead this cause would promptly present it to his people—all offering their prayers with their alms; then not a press would be stopped in its work of light; not a missionary would be heart-sick from disappointment of expected and necessary appropriations for the press; not a colporteur would be recalled, nor a family be passed by without some Gospel book; but new animation would be given to every branch of that work which enjoys the smiles of the Redeemer, and now solicits the aid of the redeemed.

By order of the Committee,
W. A. HALLOCK,
O. EASTMAN,
R. S. COOK,
Secretaries.

MISSIONARY INTELLIGENCE.

PERSIAN NESTORIANS.

LETTER FROM MR. PERKINS, AUG. 15, 1846.

Revival in Tergaver.

The diffusive character of the revival among the Nestorians, has been frequently noticed in the reports hitherto published. This work of grace, it has been already seen, is not even confined to the plain of Oroomiah; but it has extended to the mountains which touch upon the borders of Koordistan. Our brethren have been giving special attention of late to Tergaver, a district lying about thirty miles west of Oroomiah. Messrs. Stocking and Stoddard spent some time in that region, during the past summer, and they will probably communicate the result of their observations. In the mean time, however, a few extracts from a letter of Mr. Perkins, which give some new information, will be read with interest.

You have doubtless received intelligence of a very interesting state of things in Tergaver, in connection with the revival of Oroomiah. I trust that the brethren who have been there of late much more than myself, will send you an account of the good work and of their own labors in that district. I write you at this time merely to give you, in few words, my own impressions, derived from my intercourse and observation during the single Sabbath which I spent among that people.

That an exceedingly interesting work of grace is in progress in Tergaver, we have the most satisfactory evidence. The number there who hope that they have passed from death unto life, is not large; but some of these cases are very clear and striking. There is also a strong disposition to listen to the gospel among the mass of the people, in most of the villages of the district; and there is a considerable number who manifest concern for the salvation of their souls. I preached three times on the Sabbath, in two villages, to deeply attentive audiences. In one instance I addressed a large congregation, assembled in the shade of an immense haystack, that being a more comfortable place for worship, at this hot season, than the imperfectly ventilated church of the village. As I took that novel position to proclaim Christ and him crucified to a large concourse of eager listeners, my mind reverted to an event that occurred some forty years ago, in the neighborhood of Williams College, where, as it has not inappropriately been said, "the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions was prayed into being by Mills and his associates, behind a haystack." And the scene before me, taken in connection with this revival of religion among the rude Nestorians on the wild borders of Koordistan, seemed a counterpart, as legitimate as it is interesting, to that memorable prayer meeting behind the haystack, among the mountains of Berkshire!

Two of the individuals who give evidence of piety in Tergaver, are Nestorian deacons, whose cases are very interesting; for they are apparently not only themselves heirs of salvation, but instruments chosen of the Lord to make known the gospel to their people. I saw and heard a good deal of one of these deacons. His education is very limited; but having naturally a quick, discerning mind his views of gospel truth are very clear and discriminating, while his experience of that truth, in his own heart, is manifestly deep and transforming. He was formerly a notoriously troublesome, wicked man; but he is now changed from a violent, vindictive Saul into a penitent, forgiving Paul. And such is the strength and ardor of his religious affections, such his almost overwhelming sense of personal unworthiness and of obligation to the Savior who has snatched him as a brand from the burning, and such his yearning compassion for his perishing people, that he feels constrained to give himself wholly to the work of preaching the Word to them travelling from village to village and from house to house for that purpose, without the least desire, poor as he is, of receiving any other remuneration than the luxury of serving Christ and benefiting his fellow men.

Nature and grace seemed to have combined eminently to qualify this deacon for the important work in which he has so heartily embarked. Engaging in person, winning in manners, with a consciousness that he is "the chief of sinners," which is always beaming from his meek features, speaking in his subdued tones, and is often, moreover, formally reiterated in his intercourse and addresses, he effectually disarms, and even forestalls any opposition that might be raised against ordinary persons, who should thus zealously proclaim the gospel to these wild mountaineers. As though God did beseech them by him, he literally prays them in Christ's stead to be reconciled to God. All are impressed with his earnest sincerity, while many are won by the pungency and tenderness of his appeals. His own village, notorious before for the bad character of its inhabitants, is already greatly changed for the better, through the blessing of God on his labors; and his influence is strongly felt throughout the district. Of the other deacon, above named, I know less; but he also is said to be a very interesting man.

How great the amount of good which may be effected by one such pious Nestorian ecclesiastic among his people! And how vast may be the results of this revival of religion on such a remote and wild district, and, indirectly, throughout the Koordish mountains! May the churches be encouraged to continue their prayers for us and our work, in view of the great mercies which the Lord is condescending to bestow upon the Nestorians. How much more ready he is to bless, than we to ask, or even desire.—Miss. Her.

SCIENTIFIC.

CURIOSITIES OF SCIENCE.

The following passage is from an address recently delivered by Professor Mapes, before the Mechanics' Institute of N. York.

I mention these facts only in the hope of showing you, that there is a pleasure in studying the sciences, and when we come to Natural History, we shall find the study of that still more amusing. The animal and vegetable worlds are well worthy of observation. Probably you all know what is meant by a cycloid. If we make a spot on the periphery of a wheel travelling on a plane, the figure which that spot describes is a cycloid. Now, there is no figure in which a body can be moved with so much velocity and such regularity of speed, not even the straight line. Mathematicians discovered this not many years ago; but Nature's God taught it to the eagle before mathematics were invented, when the eagle pounces upon his prey, he describes the figure of a cycloid.

A globe placed in water, or in air, in moving, meets with resistance, and its velocity will be retarded. If you alter the globe to the form of an egg, there will be less resistance. And then there is a form called the solid of the least resistance, which mathematicians studied for many years to discover; and when they had discovered it, they found they had the form of a fish's head! Nature had 'rigged out' the fish into just such a figure.

The feathers of birds, and each particular part of them, are arranged at such an angle as to be most efficient in assisting flight. The human eye has a mirror on which objects are reflected, and a nerve by which these reflections are conveyed to the brain, and thus we are enabled to take an interest in the objects which pass before the eye. Now, when the eye is too convex, we use one kind of glasses to correct the fault; and if it be not convex enough or if we wish to look at objects a different distance, we use glasses of entirely another description.

But as birds cannot get spectacles, Providence has given them a method of supplying the deficiency. They have the power of contracting the eye, of making it more convex, so as to see the specks which float in the atmosphere, and catch them for food; and also of flattening the eye, to see a great distance, and observe whether any vulture or other enemy is threatening to destroy them. In addition to this they have a film, or coating, which can be snddenly thrown down over the eye to protect it; because at the velocity with which they fly, and with the delicate texture of their eye, the least spec of dust would act upon it as a penknife thrust into the human eye. This film is to protect the eye, and the same thing exists to some extent, in the eye of the horse. The horse has a large eye, very liable to take dust. This coating in the horse's eye is called the haw or third eyelid, and if you will watch closely, you may see it descend and return with electric velocity. It clears away the dust, and protects the eye from injury. If the eye should catch cold, the haw hardens and projects, and ignorant persons cut it off and thus destroy this safeguard.

You all know, if you take a pound of iron and make of it a rod a foot long, what weight it will support. But if it be a hollow rod, it will support a weight many times greater than before. Nature seems to have taken advantage of this also, long before mathematicians had discovered it, and all the bones of animals are hollow. The bones of birds are large, because they must be strong to move their large wings with sufficient velocity; but they must also be light, in order to float easily upon the air. Birds also illustrate another fact in natural philosophy. If you take a bag, make it air-tight, and put it under the water, it will support a large weight, say an hundred pounds. But twist it, or diminish the air in it, and it will support no such weight. Now, a bird has such an air bag. When he wishes to descend, he compresses it at will, and falls rapidly; when he would rise, he increases it, and floats with ease. He also has the power of forcing air into the hollow parts of the body, and thus to assist his flight. The same thing may be observed in fishes. They also have an air bag to enable them to rise or sink in the water till they find their temperature.

If they wish to rise, they increase it; if they wish to sink, they compress it, and down they go. Sometimes the fish, in sinking, makes too strong an effort to compress it; then down he goes to the bottom and there remains for the rest of his life.—Flounders and some other fish, have no air bag; and so they are never found floating on the surface, but must always be caught at the bottom.

In this way are the principles of science applied to almost every thing. You wish to know how to pack the greatest amount of bulk in the smallest. The forms of cylinders leave large space between them. Mathematicians labored hard for a long time to find what figure could be used so as to lose no space; and at last found, that it was the six-sided figure, and also three planes ending in a point, formed the strongest roof or door. The honey-bee discovered the same things a good while ago. Honey comb is made up of six-sided figures, and the roof is built with three-plane surfaces coming to a point.

If a flexible vessel be emptied of air, its sides will be almost crushed together by the pressure of the surrounding atmosphere. And if a tube partly filled with fluid, be emptied of air, the fluid will rise to the top. The bee understands this, and when he enters the tall honey-suckle, and finds that he can not reach the sweet matter at its bottom, he thrusts in his body, shuts up the flower, and then exhausts the air, and so possesses himself of the dust and honey of the flower. The feet of flies and lizards are constructed on a similar principle, and they thus walk with ease on glass or ceiling. Their feet are so made as to create a vacuum beneath them, and so they have the pressure of the atmosphere, fifteen pounds to the square inch; to enable them to hold on. The cat has the same power to a less extent.

The gastric juice is worthy of remark. It is a tasteless, inodorous, limpid fluid like water, and is adapted, in different animals to different purposes. In the hyena and other carnivorous animals, it will not dissolve dead flesh. These creatures then live upon other animals, and even bones are soluble in their gastic juice, while it will not dissolve vegetables at all. On the other hand some animals live entirely on vegetables and their gastric juice will not dissolve animal food.

We cannot alter the nature of an animal by changing its food. It will still belong to the family. In this particular, bees are better instructed when they lose their queen bee—which is an entirely different animal from the working bee—if you present another to them within twenty four hours, they will not accept of her nor obey her. They prefer taking an ordinary grub, before it has become a flyer, and feeding it with a particular food, and treating it in a particular way—and when it leaves the grub state, it becomes a queen bee, and they always suffer themselves to be governed by her.

The habits of ants are extremely curious.—We all have heard of ant houses, sometimes twenty feet in diameter filled with halls and rooms of great size and strength. These and beaver dams are constructed upon strictly mechanical principles.

In some insect species, the males have wings while the females have none. This is the case with the glow worm, and the female has the property of emitting a phosphorescent light, and were it not for this, the gentleman glow worm would never find his lady love.

Plants require sunlight, and some flowers turn themselves towards the sun, as it travels round from east to west. The sun flower does this, and so does a field of clover. The facts, though we have not yet got at the reason of them, are still extremely interesting.

You all know, that if a hollow ball be filled with a gas, lighter than the air, it will rise and float away. The fact is beautifully carried out in nature. The farina, or impregnating dust of plants, are little balls, extremely thin, and filled with light gas. They are blown off from the male plant, and by falling on the female plant, impregnate it. Nature has so arranged it, that the unctuous matter, which causes the impregnating part of plants to attach to others, never occurs precisely the same time in male and female plants. Thus if the farina from the male plant hit the male it does not adhere; but if it hit the females it does attach; the balls burst, but they are fastened, and take effect. Thus impregnation often takes place many yards distant. In raising Indian corn, you must all have noticed that a single hill of red corn will be scattered to a long distance through the whole.

The Virginia creeper throws out tendrils in the form of a foot with five toes; each toe has a large number of hairs or spine, which entering the small opening of brick or lime, swell and hold on; but when decaying, they shrink, and the plant falls off. The vanilla plant of the West Indies exhibits a similar construction, except that it winds itself around other objects.

Governor Bebb's Inaugural Address.

Gentlemen of the Senate and of the House of Representatives.

The past history and present condition of Ohio, present interesting subjects for the contemplation and instruction of her legislators and statesmen. Half a century had but just elapsed since the victory of Wayne over the Indians on the Maumee, and the consequent treaty of Greenville, gave to the North Western Territory peace, and to the tenants of its rustic abodes assurances of safety.

This great central valley of the west was then in its primeval grandeur—its mountains, lakes & gulf: its rivers gliding over cataracts or meandering through vast alluvial plains—its boundless prairies and herds of buffalo—its forests unrivalled in extent and variety, and its great tribes of aboriginees who, from time unknown, had been the lords of this vast domain. The bold outlines of the scene remain unchanged and unchangeable. The mountains are here and the lakes, the rivers still flow in their channels, but the buffalo have been hunted from the prairies and the deer from the forest. Logan and Tecumseh are no more. The spirit of their race is broken. Their children have sullenly retired beyond the "Father of Waters," and buried the red scalping knife in the ashes of despair. The yells of the dance, the eloquence of the council, and the incantations of the prophet, are seen and heard no more; but in their stead, halls of legislation, courts of justice, consecrated to Christainity. The annals of man present no example where the triumphs of civilization, in so brief a period, have been so brilliant and complete.

Our own State of Ohio, embracing a very favored portion of this great valley, stands out before the eyes of all men a wonder, for her progress in population, wealth and power; for her metropolis of near a hundred thousand souls; her agricultural and mechanical productions, her public works, her colleges, asylums and schools; and her population of two millions of people, enjoying more of the necessities and comforts of life and enduring fewer of its privations, miseries and wants, than any equal number of men in any age of the world.

Compared with the present recources of the State, present and prospective, even her large debt of 19 millions of dollars is seen at a glance, to be entirely under her control. She owns eight hundred miles of navigable canals, & is largely interested in twelve hundred miles of McAdamized roads, besides her stock in the chains of rail roads which will ere long be completed from Lake Erie to the Ohio river. The valuation returned under her new revenue law, shows that she has over four hundred millions of dollars worth of taxable property.

And no man, born within the limits of the State of Ohio at the period of the formation of her constitution who has marked with filial affection and pride her every step from that hour until the present—no man who has ever been out upon her lakes and rivers, up and down her beautiful valleys, over her hills and plains, in her mines, workshops and farm houses, meeting, every where, a population whose spirit of enterprise and industry "endureth all things and never faileth," can avoid the realization that she has but just entered upon the threshhold of her future greatness and prosperity, or fail to see that her population have, as yet, cleared but here and there a spot in her forests, occupied but a few sites of her immense water power, and but just begun to open her inexhaustible mines of iron and fields of coal. Before the lapse of twenty years, her population will have increased, from two to four millions, and her taxable property from four hundred millions to a thousand millions of dollars.

The cause of this unexampled prosperity, is as much without a parellel in history as the effect. It will be found in the natural resources of the State, in the security of titles to land, in the early protection and liberal policy of the general government. It will be found in the character of her population, who, instead of emerging through long ages from barbarism to civilization, brought with them freedom, law, christianity, and the arts of civilized life. It will be found in her free constitution, conferring on her executive neither patronage, nor the veto power; and in her legislation, which, in the main, has been liberal and wise.—It will be found in the Ordinance of 1787. That great charter of North Western liberty was here before our fathers. It had guarantied to every emigrant liberty of conscience—the right of trial by jury—the right of equal representation—and the inviolability of private property. It had declared that "no law impairing the validity of contracts, previously made without fraud, should ever have any binding authority within the territory." And it had ever proclaimed, that "schools, and the means of education, should ever be encouraged; for the plain reason, that religion, morality, and knowledge, are necessary to good government, and the happiness of mankind."

But, of all the provisions of that ordinance, the most important to the cause of humanity, and the most benificent in its operation upon the morals, the rights, the happiness, and the prosperity of the millions, who in all time to come will inhabit these States, is that which makes the soil north-west of the river Ohio, forever incapable of sustaining a slave.

With African servitude, as the framers of our government found it within the limits of the original slave holding States, the people of Ohio have no desire to meddle. Not that we look upon the subject with cold indifference, or even cease to contemplate with earnest solicitude as men and as Americans, the course which our brethren of those states, united with us in the same great bond of union, may feel it to be their duty no less than their true interest, to pursue towards that oppressed and down trodden race; nor, much less that we countenance the doctrine broached by some, that human slavery is not in itself an evil, but because we look upon it as an institution beyond our jurisdiction, subject alone to the control of the legislatures and people of the several States in which it exists. There the convention which framed our Federal Constitution found it, and there they were compelled reluctantly to leave it. But surely it is a matter of rejoicing to us no less than that of honor to our fathers, that, in laying the foundations of the social system here, where slavery had never existed, they in great wisdom and humanity hedged it out, by a perpetual edict, and consecrated the land to freedom.

In contemplating the history of that period, and dwelling upon the difficulties which beset our fathers, in compromising the conflicting interests of the several sections of the Union, how cheering it is, thus to witness the ever living doctrines of the Declaration of American Independence bursting forth into practical operation wherever it was possible to give them immediate efficacy!

And how should a sense of deep humiliation and guilt fall upon us, the descendents of such men, when the prosperous career of Ohio and of the other free States in the North Western Territory before our eyes, and with all the lights of this age of Christianity and freedom beaming upon us, we compare or rather contrast the ordnance of 1787 with the constitution of Texas, the one perpetually prohibiting slavery, and the other perpetually prohibiting freedom! How can we reflect upon the motives and means which brought about the annexation of that province with such a constitution!—a constitution fastening slavery forever upon a vast region wherein a neighboring republic had already "broken every yoke and let the oppressed go free."

And how with the constitution of the United States in our hands, proclaiming that Congress alone shall have power to declare war, can we behold a President of the United States to trample that sacred instrument in the dust, deliberately, and without the advice of Congress then in session involve the country in a foreign war of conquest, and yet not dare give utterance to our indignant condemnation of his unconstitutional acts? Where is the man who does not know and feel that this Mexican war is a presidential war! A war which before its commencement, Congress would not have declared! A war begun without adequate cause, and without any great, justifiable and commensurate object, compatible with the interest and integrity of the Union. A war conducted without wisdom of design at Washington, and relieved from utter disaster and public odium only by the prudence, bravely and brilliant exploits of Gen. Taylor and his gallant army of regulars and volunteers, who have triumphantly upheld our national banner, and won for themselves imperishable renown, and the gratitude of their country.

In conclusion of this subject, let it never be forgotten, that while the freemen of Ohio will in all time to come, as they have in times past, cheerfully march to the field of battle at the call of the constituted authorities of the country, they will not fail, by word and deed, by the ballot box, and all other constitutional means in their power, to hold those functionaries to a strict accountability for every violation of the trust committed to their hands, and especially for every infraction of that great Constitution, to which we are indebted not merely for liberty, but for our national existence, and which is worth infinitely more to us than the conquest of the continent.

It may be thought that these are subjects belonging exclusively to the General Government, and that Ohio has no right, either through the message of her Executive or the resolutions of her Legislature, to express her opinions concerning them. But Ohio is not an insolated State; she is one of a great confederacy of sister States. As such she has passed her solemn judgement upon these and other great questions of national policy, and it is for that reason that I have referred to them.

It is for that reason that I feel called upon, in her name, to protest against the repeated exercise of the veto power, which sees nothing in all the West constitutional or worthy of its regard but snags and sand-bars, and which for years has been obstructing the healthful channels of legislation, and swallowing up, one by one, all the powers of the government, just as these favorite objects of its protection have been choking up our rivers and engulfing our steamboats our commerce and our lives.

She has also entered and proclaims her protest against the odius and oft rejected Sub-Treasury system re-enacted at the last session of Congress, not only because it deranges the currency, renders the public treasury insecure and magnifies the powers of the self-constituted monarch of the United States, but because it inevitably tends to drain the specie of the country from Oh. & all the interior States of the Union, to the great seaports, where the revenues of the nation are collected, and where according to the constitutional veto system of administering the government, they are to be disbursed also.

Ohio furthermore claims the right to declare that by reason of her great natural resources for manufacturing, her superabundance of food and her scarcity of fabrics, her inland position, where the cost of the importation of her own agricultural productions must, if continued, prove forever a heavy tax upon her labor, she has been induced to invest large sums in manufacturing and mechanical pursuits. That unlike the older establishments of some of her sister States, these branches of industry are in that infant state requiring protection. That she has no confidence in a foreign market for her great staples except in seasons of starvation abroad like the present. That she must have home manufactures and a home market. That she never will submit to free trade and direct taxation. That the people were prosperous under the Tariff of 1842; and that she believes that not only the revenues of the country but all her industrial interests demand its immediate restoration.

Deriving what lessons of experiance we may from the present condition and past history of the State of Ohio, her true policy seems to be sufficiently obvious. She requires no important measure of legislation at the present session of her General Assembly.

Let the great currency and revenue laws, deliberately sanctioned as they have been by the voice of her people stand, with such indispensable amendments, if any, as experience has shown to be just and necessary.

Let her Colleges, Asylums and Schools continue to receive at your hands such consideration and support as their great importance demands, and I especially recommend the appointment of a superintendent of Common Scools.

Let her plighted faith be maintained inviolate. By upholding the laws already enacted, providing the means of the payment not only of the interest but the principal of her debt. By refraining from all further work of internal improvement by the State, until the debt be paid. By strict economy in the administration of all the departments of the government.

By offering to actual settlers reasonable reduction in the price of canal lands, and giving to them, on payment of the annual interest such time for the liquidation of the principal, as will bring about their sale and improvement, that the region five miles wide on each side of the North Western Canals may no longer be a wilderness. By short sessions of the General Assembly, and restraining within reasonable bounds the desire for innovation upon legislation both general and local.

Let those enactments very properly by universal consent denominated "the black laws of Ohio" be repealed. They are impolitic, unjust, and inhuman; at war with the genius of our free institutions and the spirit of the age in which we live.

There is one other subject which I would recommend to the special consideration of the legislature. It is a fact well known, that a question of jurisdiction has arisen between Ohio and Virgini; the latter claiming to the top of the bank of the Ohio side of the river—a claim wholly inadmissable and which can never be acceded to by this State. The question is still undecided.—There is danger that other collisions will arise between the authorities and people of Ohio and those of the States possessing the opposite shore of the river, which may disturb the harmony so desirable to maintain with our sister, and especially our border States. The question of jurisdiction and boundary, if not otherwise amicably adjusted, must sooner or later be determined by a resort to the Supreme Court of the United States, in the mode prescribed by the Constitution for the settlement of controversies between different States. It is much better, if it can be done, to settle the questions amicably, and in such a manner as best to promote the convenience of the people on both sides of the river, than to resort to litigation.

I, therefore, recommend that the General Assembly of Ohio propose the appointment of Commissioners, with full power to make settlement both with Virginia and Kentucky, by seperate compacts, of the question of bounadary, and also, of the use, navigation and jurisdiction of and over the Ohio river, or the settlement of either of these questions. The compacts thus entered into would no doubt readily receive the assent of Congress, in conformity with the 10th section of the 1st article of the constitution of the United States, and thus become binding.

I am induced the more cheerfully to propose this amicable mode of putting forever at rest these complicated and delicate questions, from the assurance which I feel, founded upon the known patriotism of both Virginia and Kentucky, and their disposition, as manifested on many occasions to promote the harmony of the States and of the Union, that the offer will, by them, be met in the same cordial spirit of amity in which it originates.

The able and detailed statement of our affairs already given to you at the present session by my immediate predecessor, who, during a period of more than ordinary difficulty, has discharged his high duties with so much fidelity and patriotism, renders it unnecessary that I should, on the present occasion, say more.

With these very brief and general recomendations, therefore, I confidently commend the interests of Ohio to the wisdom of her legislature, praying that Almighty Being who rules in the armies of Heaven and amongst the inhabitants of the earth, who guided our fathers to the shores of the new world, who made bare his arm in our defence on the battle fields of the Revolution, and went out before our pioneer ancestors in the Western wilderness as a cloud by day and a pillar of fire by night, that he will not visit upon us our manifold national transgressions, that he will give to our rulers wisdom and our people peace, and that in all time to come he will be the God of our children as in the days of old he was the God of our fathers.

Temperance Department.

AN INTERESTING TRAIN OF EVENTS.—A friend came into my study this morning and gave a few facts which are so valuable that I must relate them. A distinguished advocate of the Temperance cause in this city was passing along one of our streets when he observed a man, who had become habituated to the too frequent use of intoxicating drinks about to enter a bar-room. The Washingonian spoke a few impressive words to him and passed on. The remarks produced a most happy result. A few days afterwards the Teetotaler was called upon by the man, who said to him, "Do you recognise me, sir?" "I do not,' was the reply. "Well, sir, I am the man whom you warned a few days ago to forsake the bowl, and I have come to sign the Pledge." The document was presented. The man signed his name. He became from that day sober and industrious; now lives in New York city; is President of a Washingtonian Society and has lately come into the possession of a large fortune £100,000, a legacy of a departed relative in England.

A WORD IN SEASON.—The above narrative led me to examine a MSS. work in my possession, being the "Journal of a young Minister" where I found the following incident illustrating the same principles as the anecdote just given. "One day," says the Preacher, "after I had left the pulpit a man came towards me with a Hymn Book in his hand, his face being lighted up with a smile though a tear was yet lingering upon his cheek He was evidently exercised with two emotions gratitude and joy. "Do you remember me?" he said. "Not distinctly," replied the man of God. "But," immediately responded the man, "I remember you: and I have introduced myself thus to inform you that more than a year ago I went to hear you preach at———and hearing you read this verse first impressed me with the importance of spiritual things, and was the means of leading me to Christ." He pointed to the following verse in the Book:—

"Why will you lavish out your years,
Amidst a thousand trifling cares,
While in this various range of thought,
The one thing needful is forgot?"

"He then left me," continues the record, "and I have never since been discouraged because I could see no immediate effect of my labors, believing that eternity will reveal thousands of such instances of the blessed results of a word spoken in season."

Brazil would here take occasion to say to his readers be diligent, in speaking the truth in love, for none can tell how much good even a few words of advice, counsel, or warning, may do. "Cast thy bread upon the waters," says the Bible, "for thou shalt find it after many days."

CAUSE OF PEACE.

From the Boston Recorder—Extra.

PETITIONS FOR PEACE.

To the friends of Peace throughout the U. States.

Permit us to solicit your special aid in hastening the present war with Mexico to as speedy a close as possible by petitions to Congress for the purpose;—a request which we make to you not as partizans, but as Christian patriots, without distinction of sect or party, East, or West, North or South.

You all understand the history of this war too well to need from us any comments on its origin or its progress, on the evils it has already inflicted, or the still greater evils which it threatens.—It was began with the confident assurance that it "conquer a peace with Mexico" in two or three months; but, after the lapse of seven or eight months, it seems in human view as far as ever from a close, its evils are fast increasing beyond all original calculations, and both its parties are breathing towards each other more and more of such spirit as forebodes a conflict of indefinite duration and incalculable mischief.

Such is the present state of the case; and what shall now be done by the friends of peace, of Christianity, and of republican institutions brought by this war into disrepute and danger? Shall we fold our hands in apathy or dispair, and let war still roll its tide of blood, and crime, and woe over these broad realms of boasted liberty? Cannot this war be brought to a close without any more loss of blood and treasure? We feel sure it can be done, if good men, relying on God, say it SHALL be. Our own government alone could, if so disposed, stop the war at once, and yet secure every proper, justifiable object, if such there be, for which it was commenced. Let our rulers recall our troops forthwith from the acknowledged territory of Mexico within the unquestionable limits of Texas, and then propose to adjust all difficulties between the two republics either by negotiation, or by reference; and the war must of course come to an end at once.

Is it not, then in the power of sober men through the country to secure such a result very soon? The public are at length opening their eyes to the nature and inevitable results of this war; and, if all good men of every sect and party through the land would only unite in respectful but determined remonstrances against the continuance of the war, and in earnest petitions for its speedy termination; we think our rulers, who can stop it whenever they please, would not continue it much longer.

With these views, may we not solicit your aid in procuring petitions to Congress? This request we would fain press upon every reader of this article, But especially upon christian ministers, and trust they will not deem us obtrusive in asking them to bring the subject in some way before their people at once, and to take measures for having a petition signed by as many as possible in the place; and then forwarded immediately to some member of Congress, with a note bespeaking his services in behalf of the object. Is not here an appropriate work for the patriot, the philanthropist, and especially every disciple of the Prince of Peace? If only one in ten of the three millions of professed Christians in our country would join in earnest petitions for peace, and follow them with their prayers to God, would not our rulers listen and respond ere long to their request? Will they not send up such petitions by hundreds, if not by thousands, from all parts of the country.

On behalf of the American Peace society, and by order of the Executive committee.

GEO. C. BECKWITH, Corresponding Secretary.
Boston, Dec. 1, 1846.

P. S. We subjoin two forms of petitions, either of which, with any variations thought desirable, may be copied, and, after being duly signed, sent to a member of Congress in an envelope, with such an inscription on the back as this—"Petition for Peace with Mexico, from A. B. and 106 other inhabitants of ——

To the Honorable Senate and House of Representatives of the United States:

The undersigned, inhabitants of ——, in the State of——— respectfully petition your Honorable bodies to use all your constitutional powers for terminating as soon as possible the present war with Mexico, without any further effusion of blood.

OR

The undesigned, &c., doploring the manifold evils to both countries of the present war with Mexico, and seeing no need or use of its longer continuance, respectfully but earnestly entreat your Honorable Bodies to take such measures, within your constitutional powers, as you may deem best for bringing this war to as speedy a close as possible, without any further waste of blood or treasure ☞Papers friendly to peace are respectfully requested to publish the above. G. C. B.

SYDNEY SMITH ON WAR.—Among the last productions of the pen of Sydney Smith was one "on the duties of the Queen," in which his forcible paragraph occurs:—

"A second great object which I hope will be impressed upon the mind of this royal lady is a rooted horror of war, earnest and passionate desire to keep her people in a state of profound peace. The greatest curse which can be entailed upon mankind is a state of war. All the atrocious crimes committed in the years of peace; all that is spent in peace by the secret corruptions or by the thoughtless extravagance of nations, are mere trifles compared with the gigantic evils which stalk over the world in a state of war.—God is forgotten in war; every principal of Christian charity trampled upon; human industry extinguished: you see the son and the husband, and the brother dying miserably in distant lands; you see the break of human hearts; you hear the shrieks of widows and children after the battle; and walk over the mangled bodies of the wounded calling for death. I would say to that royal child, Worship God by loving peace; it is not your humanity to pity the beggar by giving him food or raiment. I can do that. That is the charity of the humble and the unknown. Widen you your heart for the more expanded miseries of mankind. Pity the mothers of the peasantry who see their sons torn away from their families; pity your poor subjects crowded into hospitols, and calling, in their last breath, upon their distant country and their young Queen; pity the stupid frantic folly of human beings who are always ready to tear each other to pieces, and to deluge the earth with each other's blood. This is your extended humanity, and this your great field of your compassion. Extinguish in your heart the fiendish love of military glory; from which your sex does not necessarily exempt you, and to which the wickedness of flatterers may urge. Say upon your death-bed, 'I made few widows; my object has been peace. I have used all the weight of my character and all the power of my situation to check the irrascible passions of mankind, and to turn them to the arts of honest industry. This has been the Christianity of my throne, and this the gospel of my sceptre. In this way I have strove to worship my Redeemer and Judge.'"

ARRIVAL OF THE CAMBRIA.—The Cambria, the swiftest of the British mail steamers, came quietly up to Boston at 9 1-2 o'clock on Wednesday evening, Dec. 16, having left Liverpool on the 4 h inst. She arrived at Halifax on the 15th inst. at 6 A. M., and left again at 9. Experienced strong westerly winds during the passage. Spoke the steamer Great Western, Capt. Adams & Co. expressed the news through to New York, via. New Haven, arriving here yesterday about noon, some hours in advance of the mails, the latter being detained on the Long Island Railroad by ice on the rails.

The most prominent political news is that of the obliteration by Russia, Austria and Prussia of the republic of Cracow, the last remnant of Poland. It is a monstrous iniquity.

The official tables of the trade of the country show that, as regards live animals, the importation this year has exceeded that of last year by more than four times. In provisions the increase this year over the last is 100 per cent. In coffee the excess over last year amounts to three millions of pounds. The importation of tea has also largely increased.

In the month of September there was the largest delivery of sugar on record, an excess of 160,000 cwts. beyond the corresponding period of last year. The tables show, upon the whole, an enormous increase in the importation and consumption of food, one of the most gratifying facts connected with that liberalising of the tariff which has marked the policy of the country during recent years.

President's address: "Starrsville, Newton Co., Georgia.

Florida and a portion of Georgia were set off by the last General Conference into a separate District, hence our numbers have diminished somewhat from last year; but our present number, added to what we understand to be the present number in the territory set off (viz: 525,) would show a handsome increase. Our prospects were never more flattering, as a Church; and may God grant that our success may be commensurate with the importance and correctness of our principles.

Conference adjourned on Tuesday evening, November 10th, after a harmonious session of four days.

JOHN BASS, Pub. Con:

Genessee Conference.

BR. BASSETT: I receive an omission of one resolution, in the brief, of the minutes of the Genessee Conference as published in your paper of Nov. 7.—46. It is this—

Resolved, That we recommend the calling of a convention of the Church, for the purpose of altering the constitution and discipline, so as to exclude slavery.

It should precede the one stating that "in case a majority of the Conferences will not sustain the call of a convention" &c.

You will please make the necessary correction & oblige yours,

PITTSBURGH DISTRICT.

Allegheny, Pa. Dec., 15, 1846.

REV. GEORGE BROWN Pres. P. A. C.

It is with gratitude to God, that I sit down to inform you, that the charge assigned to my care, by our last A. C. is in a healthy, and flourishing condition. Peace and love, prevail among us. All our meetings are very well attended especially on the Sabbath when our congregations are large and devout.

Our first Quarterly meeting, which commenced on the 26th of November, was an interesting and profitable season—some conversions, and some accessions took place. Since conference we have had an addition of 23 persons to the Church. We were favored at our Quarterly Meeting with the very efficient and highly appreciated labors of Br. Wm. H. Doe. Many will remember his heart-searching appeals as long as they live.

May God bless you my dear brother Brown, with continued health, peace, and success, in your arduous toil. Amen.

Yours, JAMES ROBINSON.

OHIO DISTRICT.

Withamsville, O. Dec. 7, 1846.

BR. BASSETT: Through your excellent paper, I would inform our President, Br. J. M. Young, that our first Quarterly Meeting was held, Nov. 14th, continuing to the 18th. We were favored with the acceptable labors of Brs. Nutty (from the Tenessee Conference,) Hill, Weer and Warrington. We had a tolerably interesting meeting. Good was effected. One united with us from the M. E. Church. The Lord grant us a glorious revival of religion on this (Cincinnati) Circuit.

O. WARRINGTON.
J. D. LANGTON.

Risdon, O. Dec. 15, 1846.

BR. BASSETT: The Portage Circuit, having been left, by the Ohio Conference, to be supplied, through persuasion, I have consented to travel and preach upon said circuit, until other arrangements can be made. On Saturday last the Quarterly Conference, took action upon this matter, and the sanction of the President only is wanting. You will have this named to him, through the paper, if you please. Br. Besse attended our Quarterly Meeting, and preached twice on Sabbath to acceptance, to crowded congregations. Brs. Guest and M. Ensminger also came to our help. We had a good time on Monday. Some of the classes on the circuit are in a good state.

JAMES SWANEY.

Miami Circuit Dec. 15, 1846.

BR. BASSETT: We recently held a three days meeting at Port Jefferson, Shelby county, at the head of the Feeder of the Miami Canal, and formed a small society. We however meet with opposition here, and in some other places. Yet we think there is a prospect of our having a good society in the place. We have held several protracted meetings lately, at each of which some were added to the Church. At one of them quite recently, the Lord manifested his saving grace and power. Several found peace, and Christians were enabled to rejoice in God's love. Whilst we rejoice that we have already had good times since Conference, we are looking for still better days. Peace and good will prevail among the membership, so far as I know. Br. Thornburgh is an agreeable colleague, and is well received on the Circuit. Pray for us.

ISAAC HUNT, Sup't

NORTH ILLINOIS DISTRICT.

Lasalle Co. Ill. Dec. 1, 1846.

BR. BASSETT: I have been out on a tour on the District some two weeks, and expect to be absent from home some six weeks more. I find religion thus far to be at a low ebb. Times in pecuniary matters are very hard—sickness has prevailed to a distressing extent throughout this entire country. Business in places during the sickly season was suspended. Many are yet in a very feeble state of health. My congregations have thus far been uncommonly small. The health of the people is however improving, and we live in hopes of better days. The Church in some places is looking up. And already is a brighter day beginning to dawn upon us. God of Israel send prosperity. Some amongst us are believing, laboring, and praying for a true and gracious revival of religion in every part of North Illinois Conference. The last and present years so far have been trying seasons to us here in the West. But our God yet lives! He yet has a people in these times which try men's souls, who cry night and day unto him. God will hear them. He does hear them, and will avenge them speedily. O for the power of an overcoming faith.

M. JARED.

WESTERN RECORDER.

PUTNAM, OHIO.

SATURDAY, DECEMBER 26, 1846.

☞Our thanks are due Judge Harper, M. C. for a copy of Report of Surveyor General, and to Gen. Goddard of the State Senate for a copy of the Report of Ohio Lunatic Assylum. Hereafter we will endeavor to give an abstract from these interesting documents.

☞Will our subscribers in Steubenville who are in arrears, or who are willing to pay now for current vol. oblige us by making payment to Br. T. Hanna, as we are indebted to him for paper?

☞Our first three months of the volume will be out in a few days. Those who wish to be considered as paying in advance, as per terms, should send the $2, immediately.

SESSION PAPERS.—Since we published the Prospectus of the Ohio Statesman, and of the Ohio State Journal, we have been favored to receive both the Weekly and the Daily issues of the Statesman, for which we are grateful to the publisher. But somehow even the Weekly of the Journal comes to us but about half the time, and we have not seen its Daily. This is undoubtedly accidental. We are neutral Br. Journal, and like to hear from both sides, if you please.

GEORGIA CONFERENCE.—The resolution of the Georgia Conference, prohibiting the admission of slaves into society without a certificate or the consent of their owner or manager, is we suppose in accordance with the regulations of other Churches in that State, established perhaps, out of respect to the civil laws. The founder of Methodism, who also preached in Georgia, more than an hundred years ago, established it as the only condition required of those who wish to be admitted into a Methodist Society that they should profess a desire to flee the wrath to come &c. Now, it seems, if a man (it is not even said whether colored or white,) who happens to be claimed by another, he cannot at his own desire, be admitted to the privileges of religious society, without leave giv n y some nabob who has dominion over him. Shame to such church legislation. Did not St. Paul receive Onesimus without a certificate from Philemon? Why, the Turkish Government would do better by its 'Christian dogs.' We say to the Georgia folks, we think about as well of their resolution, as they perhaps think of abolition.

MEETING OF BIBLE SOCIETY, MUSKINGUM COUNTY.—We were sorry to find but a light turn out at the meeting announced for Monday evening last at the Presbyterian Church, Zanesville. Business however was transacted, and an adjourned meeting appointed, for Sabbath evening, candle-light, Jan. 10, 1847, at the same church. A general meeting is called, at that time, of the friends of the Bible. Arrangements will be made for addresses to be delivered, and it is hoped that the Agent of the American Bible Society, Rev. W. P. Strickland, of Cincinnati, will be present to address the meeting. We hope to see a spirited meeting, and a general attendance of Christians and others, without respect to denomination.

GODEY'S LADY'S BOOK.—We have received from the publishers the number for January, 1847. It is most elegantly embellished. Besides three fine engravings, it contains several plates representing ancient furniture drawings of ladies' netting work, a piece of Music, and numerous drawings representing Model Cottages. The Lady Book, now contains more engravings than any work of the kind. Much of its reading matter is of high literary merit. And we are gratified to say that though it does not discard fiction, it contains more of the substantial and religious reading matter than formerly. Terms, $3 per year for one copy. Two copies for $5,00. The publisher has authorised us to say that to any person forwarding $3 for the Ladies' Book, a copy also shall be sent of either of the Reprints, Blackwood's Ladies Magazine, or London World of Fashion. Or a copy of the new Annual, "the Fountain" will be furnished with the 'Book' for $3. Address, L. A. Godey, Chesnut St. Pihladelphia.

HEAVY PORK.—Our friend of the Zanesville Gazette this week, speaks of a fine lot of hogs 5 in number, weighing 1240 lbs. averaging 249 3-5 lbs. Our neighbor. Mr. G. N. Guthrie authorizes us to say that we beat that on the Putnam side of the river. A lot of ten hogs was bought at the house of Guthries & Large the other day, raised by Mr. Jas. Kichen, and which weighed 2756 pounds, an average of 275 lbs. the lot.

☞Since the above was in type we are informed by our neighbor, S. B. Johnson, that four hogs of his own raising, lately killed, weighed 1128, pounds, averaging, 282 lbs. apiece.

EVANGELICAL ALLIANCE.—A meeting was held at Manchester Eng. Nov. 5th, for organizing the British branch of the Evangelical Alliance, and continued in progress three days. It being known that some British subjects are holders of slaves, it was agreed, that no holder of a slave shall be eligible to membership. A meeting for organizing the American branch of the Alliance, was to be held in Dr. Skinner's Church, Brooklyn, N. Y. on the 10th inst. We have not yet seen its proceedings.

REVIVAL AT SOUTH HANOVER, IA.—We learn by the Presbyterian of the West, that a gracious revival has taken place at S. Hanover. Many have been hopefully converted. Forty six persons have united with the Presbyterian Church, (O. S.) and fourteen with the Methodist E. Church. Twenty five of the subjects of this work were students of the college, several of whom, it is expected will enter the ministry.

REV. R. C. HATTON.—The 'Cumberland Presbyterian' has responded to our enquiry respecting this brother, informing us that "several years since in that section of country (Tennesee) he connected himself with the Methodist Episcopal Church.'

HENRY SMITH, THE RAZON STROP MAN.—By our last accounts, this noted man was holding forth at Troy, N. Y., still having "a few more left, of the same sort." Henry, (not John) is a reformed drunkard, and zealous for the temperance cause.—Writing to the N. E. Washingtonian, he very modestly objects to the pedler law of Massachusetts by which foreigners and non residents are prohibited from selling any kind of goods. And yet either residents or foreigners he says can sell grog at the corners of the streets. He hopes the law will be repealed; and then he says he will go to Boston and sell a few more of his strops, for he knows the people are longing for them. He goes South this winter.

BR. G. RICHEY.—To the suggestion of Timothy, at the close of his article, we respond, certainly.

☞We are informed that the name of the Post office at Mears' Farm, Hamilton county, O. is changed to Mount Washington.

MEASUREMENT OF COAL.—We republish an article on this subject from the Pittsburgh Gazette, as we think it contains some facts and some thoughts worthy the attention of our citizens in this region.

U. S. CONGRESS.

House.—Most of the day was occupied in discussing Mr. Vallandingham's resolutions in vindication of the war with Mexico.

Wed. 16. Senate.—A bill was introduced, granting the right of w y for the construction of the Electro Magnetic Telegraph through the State of Ohio. A resolution was adopted, after much debate, appointing Samuel Medary Printer to the Senate.

House.—A resolution was introduced by Mr. Blake, instructing the Committee on Public works and Public Lands, to enquire into the expediency of selling the Public Works and Public Lands of the State, and applying the proceeds towards paying the debts of the State. The war resolutions were again discussed until the house adjourned at a late hour.

Thur. 17.—We observe nothing of special note in the proceedings of this day, save that the Senate and Governor counted the votes for Congressmen.

Frid. 18. Senate.—Preamble and resolutions were discussed recommending Congress to increase the pay of volunteers, and for the relief of widows of those who fall in battle.

The House proceeded with the discussion of the 'Mexican resolutions.' The use of the Hall at night was granted, to Messrs Carey and Tipton for Temperance Addresses.

Sat. 19.—The House refused the use of the Hall to night for a free lecture on Human Magnetism by Mr. I. I. Keely. The resolutions of Mr. Vallandingham were still further discussed.

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

CHEROKEE TROUBLES RENEWED.—The Advocate of 26th ult, reports another outrage by one of the Starr family, James Starr, Jr. In company with two men not recognized he went to the house of Johnson Whitmire, Going Snake District, forced open the door and kidnapped three negro boys. Mr. Whitmire was at the time in his bed, but being alone had the presence of mind to remain quiet. He saw James Starr enter the house and drag out one of the negro boys, whom he struck over the head with a stick, which inflicted a severe wound; and whom he released after taking him off a mile or so. The next morning a small party took the trail of the men who perpetrated the outrage, and had not gone more than a mile and a quarter before they came upon the body of a Cherokee man who had evidently been stabbed to death by the same men who stole the negroes. The body was lying across their tracks and had been stabbed twice, once in the upper part of the abdomen, and once under the left arm. The party pursuing kept the trail until they discovered that the murderers had made their way into the State of Arkansas.

BALTIMORE AND OHIO RAIL ROAD COMPANY.—We understand that a meeting of the Board of Directors of this company, yesterday, the President submitted a very elaborate exposition of his views in regard to contemplated extension of the Railroad to the West, and the different points to be kept in view in regard to the terminus of the road, and particularly in relation to the contemplated extension to Pittsburgh. To the exposition was appended a series of resolutions, which were adopted by the Board, and the exposition and resolutions were ordered to be printed for the information of the Stockholders.

The resolutions we learn are, substantially, to the effect that a meeting of the stockholders is to be called in the month of Febuary; that the Board of Directors recommend to the meeting the sanctions of a subscription of $600,00 to the Pittsburgh and Connelsville Railroad, to be expended on that part of the road between Pittsburgh and Smithfield, (near the Maryland Line,) provided the Pittsburgh and Connelsville Company will give a pledge that no connection shall be formed with the road, without the consent of the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company; and further that tolls on the Pittsburgh and Connelsville road are to conform to those on the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad. The former company is also to be required to show that portion of the means for completing the road to the Maryland Line will be furnished as may be wanted.—Balt. Amer.

PITTSBURGH AND CONNELSVILLE RAIL ROAD COMPANY.—At a meeting of the Directors on Monday, resolutions were passed protesting against the course of the Baltimore Company; pronouncing the proposition of the latter wholy inadmissible. They also resolved that it was expedient to bring the negociation already so protracted to a close; and instructed their President to address a letter to the President and Directors of the Baltimore and Ohio Rail Road Company, urging upon them the propriety of calling a meeting of the Stockholders prior to the first Monday of February, the day on which the Stockholders of the Pittsburgh and Connelsville Company are to assemble.

A refusal on this part of the Baltimore and Ohio Rail Road Company to comply with this request, shall be considered a persistance in the conditions which are rejected: and that the President of the Pittsburgh and Connelsville Company be thereupon requested to call the company together at the earliest legal day.—*Pitts Com. GREAT WESTERN RAILROAD.—This Canada enterprise seems to be gathering a new impulse. The Hamiltin Express says—"We understand that the arrangement is, that ten individuals were registered for 10,000 shares, on which they have paid 2½. per share and that they have paid 5s. per share on the remainder, with a determination to dispose of them as soon as possible. In the meantime the company here are authorized to draw immediately £30,000.

HAYTI.—An important move has just been made.

The Senate of Hayti has promulgated a constitution for the republic, doing away with the dictatorship of Riche. The Senate is lavish of expressions of regard and esteem to Riche for having, of his own motion, relinquished a portion of his power.

THE CLAIMS ON MEXICO.—From the feeling at present predominant among the members of Congress, we take it, that the claims of our citizens on Mexico for spoliations, &c., will be assumed and paid by our own government at an early day, on the grounds that the war was generated in part, if not entirely by the refusal of Mexico to liquidate those claims, and that the United States having recognized the non-payment of them as a cause of war, is bound now to undertake their settlement. —*Week. Wilbur, lady aughter, who are going to that distant region ssionaries of the Methodist Episcopal Church. other passengers going out are Edward F. r, Richard Andrews, G. W. Whitlock, ge S. Wardell, Charles L. Ross, and James Wadsworth. The cargo of the Whiton is osed of a great variety of articles, and her presents more the appearance of Noah's Ark a vessel of the nineteenth century. ANOTHER VICTIM.—The N. York papers tell of nother victim to man's lusts, in the person of a oung Englishwomen named Clara Evans. She as just 17 years old. Her seducer, one Kals, romised marriage. Shortly after she attempted o escape from her shame by a resort to those gents which medicine affords in such abundance, nd in the attempt she perished. Kals has fled. Well may the Globe express a wish, that the ense of these crimes of which he is the author hall pursue him hot-foot through the world.

COLD WATER AND WARM FLANNELS.—The Bos- on Medical Journal, on the approach of cold eather advised every body to "put on your flan nels." Per contra an exchange says:—

Don't. A writer in the Hartford Times has hrown off his flannels and his rheumatisms at once, and has found health in the Jeffersonian ractice of cold bathing. Two years ago, he says, I found my strength wasting under a succession of severe colds and protracted coughs. No sooner had I succeeded in curing one, than the change of weather caused another. Probably, here was not a fortnight in the winter of 1844, in which I was free from a cold. A friend ad- vised me to try cold bathing, and I resorted to it at once, and applied a thorough bath of cold wa- ter, fresh from the well, every morning. In two weeks' time I became stronger, and my cold left me. It has never returned. But I am careful to apply the cold water every morning, and it is now a luxury. I often expose myself, get my feet wet, &c., but now I never take cold, nor have I seen a sick day from the time I commenced my daily cold baths.

CLERICAL PUN.—A minister was once invited to preach in a house recently built where the congregation were noted for their somniferous propensity. He commenced the service in usual manner and proceeded to deliver his sermon.—According to custom the good people disposed themselves to rest, and in a short time the preacher was saluted with a variety of discordants issuing from the nasal organs of the drowsy sinners. He stopped suddenly and began to survey the scene before him. The audience aroused themselves from their unseemly attitude, and stared inquiringly at the venerable man.

"I have," said he, been admiring the fair proportions of your new house, and have but one fault to find.

"And what is that?" exclaimed a man whose pride of the new fabric would acknowledge no blemish.

'Why,' replied the preacher in a tone of irony, "I perceive you retain the old sleepers."

No MAN, says an exchange, should be ashamed of the occupation which secures to him an honest livelihood.

THE COAL MEASURE.

MESSRS. EDITORS: As the winter is now fairly upon us, I beg leave to call your attention, and that of the public, to a matter which concerns them, and is especially recommended to their consideration at the present time by the wants which the season brings along with it.

It has long been a subject of complaint in this community that in the purchase of so important an article as the fuel by which our manufactories are fed, and on which the comforts of all classes of our citizens so essentially depend, there, was no effectual provision to insure uniformity of measurement, and no adequate security to protect the consumer against the perpetration of the most outrageous frauds.

The process of measurement is at best too tedious and uncertain to furnish any substantial check against abuses. But what will our citizens say, when they are informed that, supposing it to answer the purpose if properly regulated, there is, in fact, no well-ascertained standard amongst us —that it is one thing at the pits, another in our cities, and still another at Louisville and New Orleans, and that all these, differing as they do from each other, are again essentially varient from that existing in England, and constituting, perhaps, in the absence of any positive legislation here, the true legal standard of this country? —Of all these, however, there is none which is so widely and viciously erroneous, as that which prevails amongst ourselves.

It is well known to every body who is at all acquainted with the subject; that coal, like lime, potatoes, apples, &c., is sold all the world over by what is called the heaped bushel, composing, according to the imperial standard established by act of Parliament, a cone with an apex of 6 inches in height, upon a base diameter of 17½ inches, and containing altogether about 2815⅝ cubic inches, or about 31 per cent. over and above the Winchester bushel, which is the standard of dry measure here as well as there. At Louisville and New Orleans, I suppose, are all well aware of the fact,) the standard is fixed at 2688 cubic inches—or precisely five pecks of the Winchester bushel. And yet, strange and incredible as it may appear, I am assured upon what I have reason to consider the best authority, that here, in the very heart of the coal region, the measurement in use is no other that the Winchester bushel itself, or the wheat measure of 2150 cubic inches only, and that our citizens, poor as well as rich, are regularly paying for a hundred bushels of coal when they are actually receiving only seventy-six, or thereabouts for their money! If any man doubts this startling annunciation, let him take the measure of any coal wagon on our streets, and then make the calculation for himself, and he will be able to determine whether I have been correctly informed or not. I merely state what I have learned from others, and what I take from observation to be pretty near, if not altogether, the truth. If I am mistaken I shall not take it amiss to be set right by somebody who is better informed.

Whatever may be the fact, however, it is very certain that we are without any positive regulation on the subject in this state, and that in the absence of Congressional Legislation, it is a case which imperiously demands the attention of our city and State authorities. It will not be enough for them, however, to adjust the measure of this article. That, as I have already remarked, is both a tedious and uncertain process for ascertaining the quantity. It will be necessary, also, to establish a standard weight, as has been recently done in England, which will furnish a ready and unerring test in all cases, and will be found to be the only effectual protection against fraud. There is no good reason, it seems to me, why the coal consumed in these cities should not as well be subjected to that test as hay. The expense would be trifling and would be cheerfully paid, even if it came out of the pocket of the consumer, and it might, moreover, at the same time, be made an abundant source of revenue to our cities. A tax, even of a mill on the bushel, would produce something very clever in the course of the year, and I am very sure that there is no man who would grumble at a matter of some 8 cents on a load of 80 bushels when he is likely to save some 8 or 10 bushels by the operation. The only complaint will of course be on the part of the dealers. They would, however, constitute but a very small portion of the community, and their complaint, if any, would be of little consequence. I trust, therefore, that the Councils will take hold of the matter at once, or that in default of their interference, the citizens themselves will at least carry it before the approaching Legislature and insist upon some regulation which shall serve as a standard hereafter as well in regard to weight as to measure. There can be no serious difficulty in adjusting either, and as the Legislature has already interposed in the same way, in regard to most other articles of traffic, it is to be presumed that they will not refuse to extend their regulation on a proper representation from this quarter to a case involving one of the most important staples of this Commonwealth, which they have heretofore so strangely overlooked.

True Nature of a Revival.

Religion is like a sin, if you let it altogether alone; if it be neither fanned nor stired; if there be no application of fresh fuel; no efforts to keep the combustion going on vigorously, it becomes very dull, the ashes gather over it, and you suppose that it was quite extinct. So with religion, God has appointed means to keep the flame of piety burning vigorously. All the appointed means of grace are needful when used according to appointment to keep religion alive in the soul. If at any time the child of God become negligent, if he restrain prayer before God, if he neglect the state of his heart, and not regularly practice self-examination, if he do not love God's truth, but to allow the bible to be a sealed book—if he do not cultivate a spirit of love, humility, forgiveness, &c., his religion will lose its power on his life.—His piety will burn dimly if it be at all. His conscience will become stupid and his mind worldly; apathy and spiritual slumber will creep over him with their benumbing influence. Now if while the christian is in this condition, the Lord send his spirit to work in his heart, to stir up his drooping graces, to remove the stupor from his conscience, to awaken him to a diligent use of all means of grace to arouse him from his deadness and stupidity to the exercise of christain graces and the discharge of christain duty, then he is revived.—Such a stiring up of the gracious feelings of the soul is a revival even when it occurs in the case of an individual christain. And when such an awakening becomes general in a community or in a church, when the sacred flame becomes contagious, when the holy fervor, like an electric spark, flashes from heart to heart, then such a community or church is revived.

From these remarks, it is manifest that a revival of religion had reference primarily to professors of religion. It has no application to the impenitent. We cannot speak of reviving that which has a being. As religion has no existence in the heart of the impenitent sinner, it obviously cannot be revived. And yet such a season of refreshing is a precious time for the thoughtless. When God comes near by his spirit, when he animates and quickens his children, when he inspires them with a love for souls, and works in them the spirit of earnest believing prayer; then indeed is it a blessed season for the impenitent. When the water of the pool is stirred, happy is the poor distressed sinner that steppeth in: when "the spirit is poured out from on high" and the church is truly revived, then her influence will be felt on the world, and sinners be converted to God.

RELIGIOUS MOVEMENT.—One of the great results of our free institutions exhibits to the world this fact, that any religious denomination may hold meetings to amend, modify, or even change their religious creed, without molestation or hindrance, without civil or ecclesiastical interference. As a man's house is his castle, so is his conscience his fortress. On Sunday a very important meeting was held at the Tabernacle by certain German Catholics, about two hundred in number, for the purpose of religious worship. There was a very crowded meeting, mostly of persons belonging to various religious denominations, who were deeply interested in the question at issue, and indeed so large a body of persons organizing a church, was of itself a momentous subject. After service, the reverend clergyman aged about 60, dressed in a black gown, commenced his sermon, taking his text from the 8th chapter of St. John 36th verse. He said, in the course of his remarks, that he had been brought up in the Church of Rome, but believing that church had departed from the faith established by the Savior and the Apostles, he and his congregation advocated their right to leave it and organize a church upon the principles of Christianity as laid down in the revealed will of God. He proceeded to show how severely they had been denounced for desiring a reform, and spoke at considerable length of what he and his people considered errors and heresies of the Roman Catholic Church. He advocated the reform brought about in Germany by the Abbe Ronge. This church is not connected with any sect in this country.—N. Y. Sun

NOBLE REVENGE.—When I was a small boy, there was a black boy in the neighborhood, by the name of "Jim Dick." Myself and a number of my play-fellows were one evening collected together in our usual sports, and began tormenting the poor colored boy, by calling "blackamoor," "nigger," and other degrading epithets; the poor fellow appeared excessively grieved at our conduct, and soon after made an appointment to go a skating in the neighborhood, and on the day of the appointment I had the misfortune to break my skates, and I could not go without borrowing a pair of Jim Dick. I went to him and asked him for them. "O yes, John, you may have them and welcome," was his answer. When I went to return them, I found Jim sitting by the fire in the kitchen, reading the Bible. I told him I had returned his skates, and was under great obligations to him for his kindness. He looked at me as he took the skates, and with tears in his eyes, said to me, "John, don't never call me blackamoor again," and immediately left the room. These words pierced my heart, and I burst into tears, and from that time resolved not to abuse a poor black in future.—Southey.

TALLOW CANDLES.—This is the season of the year in which farmers' wives make up their stock of candles for family use. We give the following directions for making candles: Melt the tallow over a slow fire—let the vessel into which the wicks are dipped be nearly full, so that the wick will take up the tallow nearly to the top—when the wick is lowered into the melted tallow let the operation be performed slowly; when the wicks are raised out of the tallow let the operation be performed slowly; when the wicks are raised out of the tallow, the operation should consume nearly a minute, in order that the tallow may cool on the wick in lifting. In this way, the candles will be of the same size throughout, and there will be no waste or butt-ends left below the wick when the candle is burned for light. It is the practice of persons unaccustomed to making candles to have the tallow made boiling hot, not to keep the dipping vessels filled, and to raise the wick quickly out of the tallow, and the consequence is, the candle has a long slender neck, with little tallow on that part of it, and a stream of hot tallow will run off the candle and leave the lower end almost a bell shape. If the wick is raised slowly out of the melted tallow not a drop will fall from the candle. An experiment of five minutes will be most convincing.—The melted tallow should be in that state that the fingers can be dipped in it without burning—in this state the wick will take up the tallow rapidly.—N. Y. Farmer and Mechanic.

Never say—"I cant.' Its a lazy expression and besides, not the truth.

Religion is on the increase among the Cherokees. Four hundred and forty-seven copies of the Scriptures printed in their language have been recently distributed among them.

Virgil was so fond of salt, that he seldom went without a box full in his pocket, which he made use of from time to time, as men of the present day use tobacco.

Young wrote his 'Night thoughts' with a skull and a candle in it before him. His own skull was luckily in the room, or very little aid would have been yielded by the other.

Homer, it is said, had such an aversion to natural music, that he could never be prevailed on to walk along the banks of a murmuring brook; nevertheless, he sang his own ballads, though not in the character of a mendicant, as recorded by Zoilus.

BREVITY.—A quaker at Liverpool once sent a letter to a correspondent, asking the news, by a simple note of interrogatory, thus "?" His friend replied in the same vein, "0."

DEATH IN THE SLEIGH.—At New Haven, Monday night, a runaway horse fell across a sleigh belonging to Professor B. Silliman, Jr., seriously injuring two females, one of whom, Bridge Halloran, employed as cook in Mr. Silliman's family, died in her wounds a few hours after.

NOTICES.

Br. J. J. Watson, writes us that he has located himself at Hebron, Licking Co. which is the village at the intersection of the National Road and the Ohio Canal. He writes us that he finds quite a spirit of enquiry in reference to our principles, and thinks there would be a good opening for some of our ministers at that place. He desires that any of the brethren who can, would send an appointment, giving 2 or 3 weeks notice, and he has no doubt that large congregations would attend. Cannot Br. Munhall, and other brethren make it convenient to visit Hebron?

AMANDA FURNACE, Ky.—Brs. L Lewman and E. L. Woody, both subscribers to our paper, from Monongalia Co. Va. have written to us, that with five families all Meth. Protestants, they have recently removed and located themselves at Amanda Furnace, Ky. They have had serious sickness on the way, but all is now well, and they are satisfied with the change they have made. The brethren write, that they expect to unite themselves in class, trusting that some good brethren will come and preach them a sermon occasionally. They number twelve members. As requested, we send our paper to Amanda Furnace, and shall certainly remember the little M. P. colony there. Will not our ministers upon the Ohio side, who are contiguous to the place, more than sympathize with an isolated band, manifesting such firmness? Certainly those brethren who are within reach will go and preach at the "Furnace."

DELAWARE CIRCUIT.—We hold our next Quarly Meeting in the town of Delaware, commencing the 9th of Jan. 1847. We invite, Rev. T. Potter, and as many of our brethren as can come and help us. W. HATFIELD.

COLUMBIA CIRCUIT.—Br. Clancy's meeting will be at Graham's Station, Meigs Co.

S. ELLIOTT.

LANCASTER CIRCUIT.—Our second Quarterly Meeting, will commence, Jan. 16, 1847, at New Salem. We respectfully invite Brs. A. H. Bassett, C. Springer, C. S. Callihan, W. Marshall, W. Maynard, and S. Catlin.

W. MUNHALL.

Br. Moses Scott, informs the President, Br. Clancy, that he cannot at this time take the field of labor, assigned him as a mission, having been solicited to serve the Salt Creek Circuit, which was destitute of a preacher, and having consented to do so. He has however made arrangements to supply also, Ohio Furnace. He thinks if a preacher could devote his entire time in travelling there, without receiving much support, a circuit might be formed. But there would be opposition.

MIAMI CIRCUIT.—Br. Young, the President is requested in making his appointments, to make arrangements to spend two weeks with us if possible. Our Circuit lays in a long strip, up and down the G. Miami river, and we wish him to spend one Sabbath at Port Jefferson.

An Elegantly Illustrated Magazine for Christmas and New Year, containing a Pictorial Description of Ohio, &c. &c., which can be mailed to any part of the United States, for 4 cents postage.

THE January Number of our FAMILY MAGAZINE, for 1847, will be complete in itself, and contain an interesting Historical and Descriptive Account of the State of Ohio, together with a great variety of other literary and interesting matter; the whole illustrated with each one occupying an entire page of the Work. We expect to circulate many thousands of this elegant Periodical in the State of Ohio and elsewhere. The Plates are all executed in a peculiarly chaste and perfect manner; and any one of them is worth the price of the Work.

FIFTEEN ELEGANT ENGRAVINGS,

The following is a list of the principal Engravings that will be published in the January Number, viz:—

1. A splendid View of the City of Cincinnati, as it appears at the present time. This forms the Frontispiece, and is elegantly printed on the best and finest paper, accompanied with a particular account of the origin, rise, and progress, of the Queen of the West.

2. A View of Cincinnati, as it appeared in the year 1800; forming a striking contrast with its present appearance.

3. A View of the Public Landing Place, at Cincinnati.

4. The New Catholic Cathedral at Cincinnati—a large plate.

5. A View of Lane Seminary, at Walnut Hills, two miles from Cincinnati.

6. Several Views of Kenyon College, &c., &c., at Gambier, Ohio.

10. Several Engravings illustrative of the Antiquities of Ohio. Together with—

13. Bears attacking a boat's crew in the polar seas—a spirited engraving.

14 Picture of the Deluge. This is, without question, the most valuable and interesting Engraving in the whole Work. We have not the space necessary to describe it, and do it justice.

15. A View of Mount Ararat, from the hills above Erivam. This is generally admitted to be the mountain on which the Ark rested after the Deluge.

☞The whole of these Plates are accompanied with interesting descriptions, making the Number invaluable as a Present to young People.

The price of "The Pictorial Description of Ohio," will be ONLY 12½ CENTS PER COPY, or Ten Copies will be sent by Mail for One Dollar.

Letters enclosing remittances must be post-paid in full. The silver change for a single copy, or for three or four copies, may be thus remitted, (Postage Paid,) at our risk; but when you send silver, please envelop it carefully in a half sheet of writing paper, so that it will be subject to only single postage.

All orders should specify distinctly the town, county, and state, where the Magazine is to be forwarded, and should be addressed (post paid) to

W. S. STOCKTON,—General Agent.

TO persons who are acquainted with the character and objects of the CHRISTIAN WORLD, as they have been developed during the last six years, it is only necessary to say, that as soon as one thousand paying subscribers are secured, the paper will be put to press. The Old Subscription List ought to supply this number at once.

To other persons, it is proper to remark, that the Christian World, in print, is intended to reflect the Christian World, in action—in a word, daguerreotype it: and then, for purposes of common advantage, to compare the organized and operature Religion of the Age with the Religion of the Bible.

The enlarged literary and business agencies of the Establishment, are deemed amply sufficient to assure the public of successful management. Its immediate connexion with the CHRISTIAN ATHENEUM—an Institution which is to be furnished with many of the principal organs of Church and State, both in Europe and America,—will give its conductors early access to invaluable sources of universal intelligence.

DIRECTIONS.

1. On receipt of this Prospectus, let the Old subscribers at every Post-office, appoint one of their number, or some other suitable person, an Agent. Let him send us, at once, as many names and as much money as possible. In cases where substantial agents make themselves responsible for their subscribers, this responsibility will be regarded as equivalent to payment in advance—provided they settle their accounts within six months. Even in such cases, however, immediate payments are decidedly preferable; and, to encourage them, the commissions to agants are arranged thus:—On cash orders, 25 per cent.: on deferred remittances, 12½ per cent.

2. As the Prospectus will be widely distributed, let all persons who see it, and feel an interest in it, act promptly in the manner described above. It is thought that a little effort will be sufficient to procure a company, or club, at almost any Post-office in the Union. The times increasingly demand just such a publication as is proposed.

Address,—W. S. STOCKTON, General Agent, Philadelphia, Pa.: or either of the Associate Editors. All orders will be punctually attended to.

NEW SERIES

OF THE

Congressional Globe and Appendix.

CONGRESS at it its last session, through the Joint Library Committee of the two Houses, having authorized a large subscription for the Congressional Globe and Appendix; and the Senate, by resolution, having directed the mode of preparing the reports of the proceedings, and authorized the Secretary of the Senate to contract with the undersigned, stipulating that the reports when written out shall be subject to the revision of the speakers; the Congressional Globe and Appendix is now offered to the public, not only as an authentic, but as an official report of the proceedings of Congress, made under the eye, and published by authority of the body.

The undersigned originated the mode of journalizing the proceedings of Congress, which, thus adopted, is to be perfected with the aid and under the supervision of Congress. Their publication was the first and only one that gave each successive step in every measure in both branches of Congress; a report of all the debates; every important vote; and an Appendix, including at full length all the revised speeches delivered during the session.

The work, as it is now to be conducted by them, will be found a most perfect political history. The Senators from the States and the Representatives from every section of the Union bring with them into Congress a knowledge of the feelings, sentiments, and interests of their several constituencies. Public opinion and the public information, as it exists among those they represent, are embodied by them; and in the crucible of Congress the wisdom of our times is brought to its test, and is there concentrated, in directing the political movements of the whole country. The impulses thus given through Congress from every quarter react upon the nation as a whole, and all its component parts are made to move in co-operation. The press cannot be more usefully employed than in condensing and again spreading abroad the intelligence of our free country, tending to such happy results through our almost miraculously adjusted State and National institutions.

Having identified ourselves with the plan of advancing the usefulness of Congress by publishing full and impartial reports, and having a large mass of the Congressional Globe and Appendix, issued during the last twelve years, which would be impaired in value to us and utility to the public if the work were discontinued, we have a double motive to prompt us to extend it through a new series. We are resolved, if possible, to give it permanence, and hand it down to successors as a standard work worthy of being maintained and improved. We shall enter upon our new undertaking without being distracted or burdened by any associate labors of the press; and thus unencumbered, shall hope to make the new series a step in advance of the former in all points of execution. With a view to accomplish this, we shall be (one or the other) in attendance on Congress.

The reports will not be affected by our party bias. We believe every member of Congress will bear witness that our reports are full and fair.

The Congressional Globe is made up of the daily proceedings of the two Houses of Congress, and printed on superfine double royal paper, with small type, (brevier and nonpareil,) in quarto form, each number containing sixteen royal quarto pages. The speeches of the members in this first form are condensed—the full report of the prepared speeches being reserved for the Appendix. All resolutions, motions, and other proceedings, are given in the form of the Journals, with the yeas and nays on every important question.

The Appendix is made up of the President's Annual Message, the reports of the principal officers of the Government that accompany it, and all speeches of members of Congress, written out or revised by themselves. It is printed in the same form as the Congressional Globe, and usually makes about the same number of pages during a session.

During the first month or six weeks of a session, there is rarely more business done than will make two numbers a week—one of the Congressional Globe and one of the Appendix; but during the remainder of a session, there is usually sufficient matter for two or three numbers of each every week. The next session will be unusually interesting; therefore, we calculate that the Congressional Globe and Appendix together will make near 1500 large quarto pages, printed in small type—brevier and nonpareil. We furnish complete Indexes to both at the end of a session.

We have on hand the Congressional Globe and Appendix for the last fifteen sessions of Congress, making together fifteen large royal quarto volumes, which we will sell unbound, for $41; or bound with Russia backs and corners for $56. Those who want the back volumes should apply for them immediately, as they are in demand. Congress subscribed for 341 complete sets during the two last sessions. The proceedings of Congress for the last nine years cannot be procured from any other source—Gales & Seaton having stopped printing their Register of Debates in 1837.

We will endeavor to print a sufficient number of surplus copies to supply all that may be miscarried, or lost in the mails; but subscribers should be very particular to file their papers carefully, for fear that we should not be able to supply all lost numbers.

TERMS.

For one copy of the Congressional Globe,	$1 00
For one copy of the Appendix,	1 00
For six copies of either, or part of both,	5 00

The money may be remitted by mail at our risk. The safest and best way to remit is, to pay the amount to the Postmaster where you reside, and take from him a receipt.

POETRY.

[The anniversary, about this time, of the Landing of the Pilgrims at Plymouth, in 1620, will render appropriate the following beautiful lines. ED. W. R.]

THE PILGRIM'S ROCK.

BY MRS. AMELIA B. WELBY.

When first the lonely May flower threw
Her canvass to the breeze,
To bear afar her pilgrim crew,
Beyond the dark blue sea,
Proud freedom to our land had flown.
And chose it for the brave;
Then formed the Nation's corner stone,
And set it by the wave,
That when the pilgrims anchored there
Their stepping stone might be
That consecrated rock of prayer,
The bulwark of the free.

And there they stood—each pilgrim brow
Was wan with grief and care,
And bent each manly form, but oh—
Another sight was there;
Fond woman, with her sweet sad face,
All trembling, pale and chill:
But oh! there was in that lone place
A sight more touching still—
The cheek of childhood pale with fear,
And hush'd its voice of glee;
And they are gone, but we are here,
A bulwark for the free.

Our pilgrim sires are gone yet still
A nation in its pride
Hath pour'd o'er every vale and hill,
The bright unbroken tide:
And still their sons shall flood the land,
While that old rock appears,
Like a pilgrim's spirit, bound to stand
The mighty wreck of years,
And oh! while floats the wind and wave,
That hallowed rock shall be
The threshold of the good and brave,
The bulwark of the free.

PRAY FOR ALL.

BY VICTOR HUGO.

"Daughter, to prayer!"

Pray thou for all who living tread
Upon this earth of graves;
For all whose weary pathway leads
Among the winds and waves;
For him who madly takes delight,
In pomp of silken mantle bright,
Or swiftness of a horse;
For those who, laboring suffer still,
Coming or going—doing ill—
Or on their heavenward course;

Pray thou for him who nightly sins
Until the day dawns bright—
Who at eve's hour of prayer begins
His dance and banquet light;
Whose impious orgies wildly ring,
Whilst pious hearts are offering
Their prayers at twilight dim;
And who, those vespers all forget,
Pursues his sin, and thinketh not
God also heareth him.

Child! pray for all the poor beside;
The prisoner in his cell,
And those who in the city wide
With crime and misery dwell;
For the wise sage who thinks and dreams;
For him who impiously blasphemes
Religion's holy law.
Pray thou—for prayer is infinite—
Thy faith may give the scorner light,
Thy prayer forgiveness draws.

Written for the Western Recorder.

THE GENERAL CONFERENCE AND SLAVERY.

NO. III.

REV. SIR: "When," says Dr. Paley "the doctrine of transubstantiation had taken possession of the Christian world, it was not without the industry of learned men that it came at last to be discovered that no such doctrine was contained in the New Testament. But had those excellent persons done nothing more by their discovery, than abolish an innocent superstition, or changed some directions in the ceremonial of public worship, they had merited little of that veneration with which the gratitude of Protestant churches remembers their services. What they did for mankind was this: they exonerated christianity of a weight which sunk it. If indolence or timidity had checked these exertions, or suppressed the fruit and publication of these inquiries, is it too much to affirm, that infidelity would, at this day, have been universal." Although I make no pretentions to the qualities possessed by that class of persons to whom the doctor refers in the foregoing extract; men, who have been such benefactors of mankind, and who, by their learned labors have saved the church from being overrun with infidelity, yet I humbly hope, that my feeble efforts to elicit the truth will cause the members of the late General Conference to review their resolution on slavery, and retract the errors it contains: so that the church may be "exonerated of a weight which sinks it;" for neither the name nor the thing which is called abolitionism is to be found in the Old or in the New Testament.

In reviewing the resolution which refers to domestic slavery, the aptest figure by which I can illustrate the proceedings of that body, is to contemplate the church in the South as a patient who is very sick, and G. C. as a doctor who gratuitously undertakes to cure her. The doctor, like a philanthropic and humane physician, hearing of her dangerous illness, voluntarily visits her, and on pulling out a pill-box the following dialogue takes place. C. What is that, doctor which you have in your hand? D. Something that I have prepared for you. C. Why, I did not know you had prepared any thing for me, as I did not send for you. D. True, I was not sent for; but hearing of your extreme illness, "the love of humanity" impelled me to visit you, and prescribe for you. C. And what have you prepared for me? D. A bolus. C. It is monstrous large. D. Not too large for you to swallow. C. What is it made of? D. It is not for you to know what the ingredients are: It is enough for me to state, that it is made up secundum artem. C. And what do you mean by that, doctor? D. You are too inquisitive; but if I must tell you, it is compounded acording to the Materia Medica. C. Well, I am no wiser now than I was before. D. I can't help that. C. I cannot take it. D. Hush, you must. C. It is bitter? D. Take it, and then you'll know. C. But it will be too late to talk about it then. D. True; but you will experience the effects. C. Will it cure me? D. Do you think I would say it would kill you? C. I suspect it is only an anodyne. D. You are too capious. It will answer when all other remedies fail. Your existence depends on your taking it. C. But some physicians say it will do me no good. D. Tush, they are only quacks. C. But you know it is said, "who shall decide when doctors disagree?" D. I see you are inservably obstinate. Good bye.

Before I analyze the resolution under consideration, I must make one remark:—It appears to me, that the resolution sets forth a doctrine which a majority of the General Conference did not believe, and which they did not intend to avow when they voted for it, namely, that domestic slavery is not a sin. I do not mean to charge the gentleman who claims the paternity of the resolution with any hidden design to impose on the Conference by the manner in which it was drawn up: far be such an imputation from me. But it does appear to me, that it does not speak the opinion of the abolitionists on the subject; nor does it accord with the views of the members from the South. Some of the latter gentlemen I find, voted for the first member of it, on the ground, as they said, that it would be "a sin against God to hold slaves" who had been abducted from their rightful owners, and would not be restored to them when claimed. Now, although this interpretation is within the strict letter of the resolution, it surely was not the sense the draftsmar of the resolution had in his mind when he penned it; nor was it the sense he intended to convey by the words he used. The abolitionists and anti slavery men who have frequently published their sentiments on the subject, and have uniformly asserted that domestic slavery is a sin, voted to a man, for the first member of the resolution which says, "the holding of slaves is under many circumstances, a sin against God;" and yet, it is perfectly clear to my mind that this sentence positively sets forth the doctrine, that domestic slavery, or "the holding of slaves," is not "a sin." I argue thus:—

"The holding of slaves," or domestic slavery, for I use the phrases synonymously is "a sin" in itself, or it is not. If it is "a sin" in itself it is malum per se, and is a sin because it "is a transgression of a divine law." Being malum per se, or a sin in itself it does not depend on the addition of "many," or of any "circumstances" to make it "a sin." If it is not malum per se, or "a sin" in itself, the addition of "circumstances," be they "many" or few, cannot change the essential quality of a moral transaction, so as to make that essentially sinful, which, before the addition of these "circumstances," was essentially sinless or innocent. That "circumstances" may aggravate or extenuate the turpitude of a transaction, I readily admit. But to say that the addition of "circumstances" can change the essential quality of a moral transaction is, I apprehend both unphilosophical, and contrary to the scriptures. For if the sinfulness of a transaction depended on the addition of extraneous "circumstances," there would be no fixed or certain standard of morals; nor would there be any essential difference between virtue and vice, right and wrong, good and evil. The decision of the General Conference then flies beyond the mark, (though I am far from supposing they intended it) for it strikes at all religion Natural and Revealed.

Again: "the many circumstances" under which it is said "the holding of slaves is a sin against God," naturally and essentially belong to the reputed sinful transaction, or they do not. If they naturally and essentially belong to the transaction, they are a part of it and cannot be seperated from it without destroying its entireness. Being a part of it, and not appendages, they enter into its composition, so that the whole of its parts consitute the entireness and identity of the sinful transaction. The sinfulness of the transaction does not depend upon the addition of "circumstances," for these circumstances essentially belong to it, and are as essentially sinful as any other parts of the transaction to which they belong. If they do not essentinlly belong to the transaction, or constitute a part of it, as their name indicates they do not, it follows that the sinfulness of the transaction belongs to these "circumstances" whatever they be, and to them alone, leaving the transaction of domestic slavery innocent in its own nature. It is the addition of these circumstances which vitiates domestic slavery, so that in the absence of them "the holding of slaves is not a sin against God." It is entirely useless to assure the reader of the honesty of my opinion, my mode of reasoning sufficiently points it out. Let the members of the late General Conference who voted for that part of the resolution under consideration, show me the flaw in my argument; or let them admit that from their own resolution domestic slavery is NOT "a sin."

It is really very remarkable, and is worthy of being constantly kept in mind, into what absurdities writers in favor of abolitionism run, when they attempt to treat of the demerits of domestic slavery. They are like boys in the water who do not understand the art of swimming; who, when they get out of their depth, are fearful of being drowned, and then they begin to kick and splash, and struggle for their lives. We have had a specimen of the confusion which was in the mind of the author of the resolution when he wrote it, and made it contain a doctrine which he did not intend it should speak. He got out of his depth, and the confusion of his mind is stamped on the production of his pen. But the absurdity of this resolution will more fully appear when we analyze it.

It will be allowed, I hope, that any decision by the late G. C. on the subject of domestic slavery, ought to have been made in language so fixed as to admit of no acquivocation; and so plain and intelligeble that no one could mistake its meaning. If they conceived it to be their duty to give and decision upon a matter of so much importance, every member of the church had a right to expect that they would give that decision in clear and unequivocal language; because the church, for years, had been greatly agitated with the conflicting opinions of different men on the subject; and because the characters, the interests, the church membership, the happiness, and I may add, the salvation of the souls of thousands were likely to be jeoparded by such decision. Well, has the G. C. expressed themselves in this manner? To me it appears they have not; nor can I conceive how they could have expressed themselves more ambiguously if it was their object and aim not to be understood. Hear them:—

"Resolved, That in the judgment of this General Conference &c." And what do they mean by "judgment?" Am I to consider the word as conveying the same idea as opinion or belief? or am I to suppose that, with them, it implied something more? As I cannot tell what meaning they attached to it, I will present the reader with the meaning of the word as given by Mr. Locke. "The faculty which God has given to man to supply the want of clear and certain knowledge, in cases where that cannot be had, is judgment, whereby the mind takes its ideas to agree or disagree; or which is the same, any proposition to be true or false, without perceiving a demonstrative evidence in the proofs. The mind sometimes exercises this judgment out of necessity, where demonstrative proofs and certain knowledge are not to be had: and sometimes out of laziness, unskillfulness, or haste, even when demonstrative and certain proofs are to be had. "Locke's Essay. Vol. 11, p. 149.

To the same amount is the language of Dr. Reid. He says:—"As a judge, after taking the proper evidence, passes sentence in a cause, and that sentence is called judgment; so the mind, with regard to whatever is true or false, passes sentence, or determines according to the evidence that appears." Reid's Works. Vol. 111, p. 76.

From these extracts I draw one conclusion: that "evidence," or "proofs" are necessary to be had to enable the mind to pronounce a correct or true "judgment." Had the G. C. such "evidence" or "proofs" before them? or did they pronounce their "judgment" without any evidence or proof at all? They have given us none, nor have they intimated that they had any before them, in the form of an argument, or in the shape of a quotation of a passage of scripture. Was this because "they were not to be had!" or was it owing "to laziness, unskillfulness, or haste, "that they did not trouble themselves about any? In either case we are under no obligation to abide by their "judgment," or receive it as true, seeing it is not supported by evidence or proof.

"The holding of slaves is" &c. This is an equivocal phrase, as the votes of the members from the South shew it to be; and if for no other reason, it ought not to have been used by the G. C. on account of its ambiguity.

"Under many circumstances, &c. Does the word "many" here mean a great number of "circumstances" of the same kind? or a great "many circumstances" of different kinds? say not, I beseech you, that I trifle by proposing such questions. I do not, for I have learned by dear bought experience, that great matters often depend upon a word that some people would consider in itself quite unimportant. The reader must know that, I and many others were expelled from the Methodist Episcopal Church on the word "inveigh;" and history tells us that a great Politician, Scholar, and Divine was tried for his life, on the force and meaning of a proposition, and had well nigh been hung for using it. The former circumstance gave birth to the Methodist Protestant church; and the world is indebted to the latter for the "Diversions of Purley." Nothing emanating from a body of men possessed of so much wisdom, learning, and religion as the members of the late G. C. possessed, can be considered of a trifling character: and surely nothing can be viewed in that light on which the salvation of an immortal soul may depend. What then is the meaning of the word? and what are the "circumstances" which constitute the "sin of holding slaves?" Here again I am at a loss; for I know not in what light the G. C. considered those "circumstances," whether of a civil or religious character: or whether they referred to age, to sex, to climate, or to Mason and Dixon's line. It is certain then that the resolution is remarkable for its uncertainty, and in this respect may be compared to the edict of Mahommet who forbade a part of the hog to his followers. This decree has been beautifully, and facetiously versified by the Poet Cowper, and I wonder how any one that ever read that poem could have forgotten it, or not perceive its applicability to the resolution. The followers of Mahommet intent on gratifying their propensity to eat swine's flesh, and yet unwilling to violate a command coming from such high authority, found themselves individually under the necessity of supplying what was omitted in the decree: they therefore argue differently as to the forbidden part. Some affirmed that it was the "snout" that was forbidden—some said it was the "tail"—some the ear, and some, some other part. And yet, notwithstanding their different opinions with regard to the forbidden part, it is said "bit by bit the hog was swallowed." So the church South, not knowing what these "circumstances" are which make the 'holding of slaves a sin against God." will, I presume go on as she has done, notwithstanding the high authority that has pronounced the uncertain decree.

"Nevertheless it is our opinion that under some circumstances it is not sinful." Well! Well! this sentence coming on the back of the other member of the resolution which declares "that under many circumstances the holding of slaves is a sin against the God," caps the climax of absurdity. It is perfectly useless to enquire now what these circumstances are, which possess such a neutralizing power. Let them be what they may, it is obvious that the G. C. thought that the word "circumstances" was a very convenient word for them to use; as by it they saved the labor of thinking, of particularising, and of proving their point. If the bedstead was too short, for the occupant, "circumstances" would cut him, and reduce him to its length, and if it was too long, they could stretch him to its dimensions. The term can be made to send forth sweet water and bitter from the same fountain, and to blow hot and cold out of the same mouth. It can change the Leopard's spots, and whiten the Ethiopian's skin; and by a wonderful, though irdescribable power it can restore them all to their original complexion. And this is to be passed upon the church for gospel truth! It would have been infinitely better for the General Conference not to have meddled with domestic slavery at all, or having undertaken to give us their "solemn judgment" on it to have presented the world with one less liable to objections, one that would have been more consonant with scripture and common sense.

REPLY TO REV. G. RICHEY.

MR. EDITOR: In the Recorder No. 8, of Vol. VIII. I discover an attempt to reply to Timothy's "opinions on church relation." And really, I think it is a rare specimen of perversion. I shall first point out his (Mr. Richey's) perversion of St. Paul's meaning. "Now we command you, brethren, in the name of our Lord Jesus Christ, that ye withdraw yourselves from every brother that walketh disorderly, and not after the tradition which he (the disorderly brother) received of us." This text the gentleman quotes as conclusive evidence for secession from a church where there are some disorderly members. Suppose I admit that secession from the Thessalonian church is what the apostle Paul enjoined upon Christians at Thessalonica. In what attitude do I place the apostle? His teaching and his practice proves a perfect paradox. His teaching was according to Mr. R., you Thessalonians must secede from the church. "For we hear that there are some which walk among you disorderly, working not at all, but are busy bodies." Therefore leave the church and set up for yourselves, for if you do not you violate a "plain and positive command given by the inspiration of the Holy Ghost" to secede. His practice was to continue himself in the church notwithstanding the plain and positive command to secede from the church. Can any man believe an inspired apostle guilty of such contradiction? None I presume but Mr. R. and his associates in this work of perversion. Seeing therefore to construe the term "withdraw" embraced in the proof text quoted to mean secession involves the character of the apostle's teaching and practice in a glaring contradiction I am forced to the conclusion that the apostle did not mean secession, as Mr. R. would have us believe, but simply expulsion. And in this conclusion I stand in good company. Says Dr. Clarke in his comment on the passage. There (refering to the idle and busy-bodies spoken of in the 11 V. of the 3 ch. of 2 Thess,) he had ordered 1 Thess. IV. 11. 12, that they should study to be quiet do their own business, and work with their hands; but it appears that they had paid no attention to his order; and now he desires the church to exclude such from their communion." "That ye withdraw yourselves from every brother that walketh disorderiv" that is dissolve the relation between the church and the disorderly brother by the proper exercise of discipline on the part of the church and thereby exclude the disorderly brother. It is too obvious to be doubted that the apostle is speaking of the duty of an individual church or "brethren," towards a disorderly brother, and not of a brother towards a corrupt church. The gentleman will have it that St. Paul commanded the Corinthian brethren to come out from the church as Corinth and be separate from the primitve church in her individual and general character, for he hoots at the idea of making Paul mean separation from the world, because it don't suit his "favorite dogma of secession from the church." Now I ask Mr. R. if the sin of idolatry, gluttony, drunkenness, fornication, adultery, infidelity, &c, which were more or less practiced by members of the church at Corinth was established in the church or in the world? Mr. R, does not believe that a single species of sin was ever established in the primitive church, nor do I. Of course then all sin of every description is of the world so that it was impossible for the church to be corrupt only as her member associated with the world, engaged in its practices and drank of its spirit. "Wherefore come out from among them (the world) and be ye separate, saith the Lord, and touch not the unclean thing; and I will receive you." To say that St. Paul meant come out from the church is just to say that sin was legalized in the church in his day; "ye have us for an example" says the apostle. "Brethren, be followers together of me, and mark them which walk so as ye have us for an example." If separation from the church was the doctrine and order of Paul. Why I ask did he not give to christians an example of separation from the church? Why did he live and die in the church and enjoin upon the "brethren, be followers together of me" if his doctrine or the doctrine of the Holy Ghost was separation from the primitive church because of disorder in it? What a pity it is that Mr. R. did not live cotemporary with St. Paul. I think he would have set him and all christians a right example. Secession—set up for yourselves, and no longer be followers of St. Paul, would have been Mr. R's motto and order. But the Jentleman quotes 1 Cor. V. 11. "But now I have written unto you not to keep company, if any man, that is called a brother be a fornicater, or covetous, or a railer, or a drunkard, or an extortioner; with such an one no not to eat." This I suppose Mr. R. thinks to be a standing injunction to the brethren to secede from the disorderly brother; but if he had read the context a little more carefully he would have seen nothing in this passage to prove secession, but a standing law to every individual church or society to exclude its unworthy members. Let us read the 12, 13 verses. "For what have I to do to judge them also that are without? (the nonprofessors) do not ye judge them that are within? (the members of the individual church at Corinth that bec ome corrupt.) But them that are without, God judgeth. Therefore put away from among yourselves that wicked person." This was the only way the Corinthian church was to keep no company with a brother that was an idolater &c., because to the individual church of Corinth did the exclusive right and privilege belong to judge of the disorderly character of its members, and exclude them. God never vested the right and privilege in his general church to exclude disorderly members from individual churches. Hence he never made his church, in her general character, accountable for the toleration of disorderly members by an individual church. We have endeavored to dispose of the Jentleman's proof texts in such a way as to save the character of an inspired apostle from glaring inconsistency and contradiction, and rescued them from the unholy service of sectarian bigotry. For St. Paul ascribes to a division maker an anti-christian character. "Now I beseech you, brethren, mark them which cause divisions and offences, contrary to the doctrine which ye have learned; and avoid them. For they that are such serve not our Lord Jesus Christ, but their own belly; and by good words and fair speeches deceive the hearts of the simple," Rom. XVI. 17, 18. To what extent, the character of Mr. R. is to be determined, by this criterion, I wish not to say. I invite his attention especially to the words just quoted, and probably, he can find some portion of God's word that he can press into a contradiction of the apostle, as he seems versed in that art. Mr. R. says, make divisions. St. Paul says "avoid them" "which cause divisions. "For they that one such serve not our Lord Jesus Christ, but their own belly." But. Mr. R. thinks M. P. ministers are the last set of men to speak against division. Why not, as well as an apostle? Does he not know that the division was caused by unrighteous expulsions from the M. E. Church, that the reformers in the church never preached secession or division, but on the contrary, exhorted one another to cleave to the church of their choice to the last? And because they would not secede, they were expelled, for what? for their opinions and efforts to reform the government of the M. E. Church. And being expelled they determined then to organize themselves into a church, and hundreds seceded to go with their persecuted brethren. The division makers were the expellers of the innocent members from the church. Those expulsions of innocent members was a fruitful cause of division in and secession from the M. E. Church. And this work of division making in the church was carried out by some power loving ministers, and not by the hue and cry of Reformers to divide and leave the M. E. Church, as Mr. R. seems to to think. Nor have I ever known an M. P. minister to preach a sermon on secession and division. Some I have known to touch on lay representation and expose the assumption of power in the ministry and there stop, and leave every man to form his own judgment without expatiating on the "plain and positive command given by the inspiration of the Holy Ghost to secede," and send them headlong down to perdition for not seceding. I think the great majority of the M. P. ministers feel they have too elevated a calling to condescend to the unworthy work of division making. "God forbid that we should glory save in the cross of our Lord Jesus Christ." The gentleman thinks he has nailed me fast, when he says, (speaking of staying in a church where there are some corrupt members,) "Well that only proves that Timothy can do what Paul and Christ would not do." Well now let us see: Jesus Christ as a man belonged to the Jewish Church. That Church was awfully corrupt, yet Jesus stayed in it. St. Paul belonged to the Christian Church which was very corrupt in some of its members or individual churches. Yet St. Paul stayed in the Primitive Church. So you see; Mr. Editor, Timothy in this respect does just what Jesus and Paul did. Mr. R. thinks the most effectual way to partake of other men's sins is to continue in the church where there are some sinners. Well if this be true logic, Jesus Christ and the apostles most effectually partook of other men's sins and fellowshiped all the abominations that were perpetrated by unholy church members, for some very dark characters belonged to the church in their day. Let Mr. R. get out of this conclusion if he can. He thinks too he has helped me out of a very great dilemma by showing I will be punished for my sins, and slaveholders for their own sins. That I always believed—but then according to Mr. R's. doctrine I am as far as ever out at sea; for he will have it that my relation is a sinful relation to the church, so long as there are some sinners in the church to which I belong. Well then Christ held a sinful relation to the Jewish Church, the apostles to the Primitive Church. They were all according to Mr. R's. doctrine necessarily and unavoidably sinful. They lived and died in that relation—consequently they must all be damned. I ask Mr. R. to meet the argument fair and square, or blush to publish such doctrines, if you cannot remove the difficulty. One more request I have to make, since you admit that Timothy will not be punished for the sin of slavery, that you hereafter discountenance the egregious error that we of the North are personally accountable for the sin of slavery. For the sin of fellowshiping a slaveholder, and the sin of holding slaves are different acts. And as for the assertion that I am bound to fellowship slaveholders as brethren in Christ, it is all a bugbear. Where did the gentleman find the evidence for such an assertion? The answer is, no where. He can't find it in the constitution of the church, nor in the bible. Let him write it out if he can. He marks for a quotation what is not in the article. A man that is capable of such barefaced perversions and misrepresentations must have a dark spot about him somewhere. I would just inform Mr. R. that slavery is a test of membership in the M. P. Church according to the constitution, the bible and his own admission. If any man doubts it I will prove it. So that no class of sinners have any constitutional right to membership in the M. P. Church, more than sinners had in the Primitive Church. I am ready to meet any man on this point, provided he has a good moral character, and will write in the spirit of a gentleman, to say nothing about the christian. Mr. Editor, I submit this reply to your judgment to be disposed of in any way you judge best. If you think proper to publish it and Mr. R. replies in the spirit of a gentleman, I hope you will open your columns to him.

CHURCH DIVISION.

THINGS TO BE CONSIDERED.

NO. II.

MR. EDITOR: Among the many considerations bearing upon the question of church division, as called for by some of the Northern Conferences of the M. P. C. and which demand our candid attention, is that of time—the time necessary for its accomplishment.

1. We may reasonably anticipate, much tardiness in its progress and consumation.

There are many things to be examined and arranged which will be found of great importance, connected with this movement. Points to be investigated and settled, involving in many instances an honest difference of opinion upon matters of great moment—and emergencies, which cannot be distinctly foreseen, and accurately pointed out, to be provided for, as in the progress of the work circumstances may transpire to create them. The geographical dimensions of the territory interested in this movement is very extensive, and time must be had for freely interchanging communications, that each others views and wishes may be known and met as far as practicable. This will be necessary, in order to secure harmony of action. There is also a large community of minds embraced in the compass of this movement. And a great diversity is known always to exist among minds, differently educated—differently circumstanced—and under the influence of different prejudices, to say nothing of the diversity arising from the varied capacites with which men are naturally endowed.

To render all, or a suitable majority of those who are immediately concerned in this work, alike familiar with the object of the movement, and the reasons for it, together with the mode, judged to be the most suitable and appropriate for effecting it, so as to impress upon all, a conviction of its propriety, sufficiently clear and distinct, to secure the unanimous and willing co-operation of the mass, is a work which the most sanguine cannot reasonably anticipate will be accomplished at once. Some are always indifferent about examining any subject closely, fort hemselves. And such are generally among the first to find fault with the action of others, and the most clamorous and unreasonable in their demands. Never really knowing what would suit them best, they are always at a loss to know when to be satisfied.

Others arrive at conclusions by a very tardy and protracted process of reasoning. Their thoughts never flow ready and clear upon any subject, and their apprehension of things is always dull and indistinct. And yet they are seldom willing to confide in the discernment of others, so as to proceed with them in carrying out measures of importance. While there are still others who may be too deeply concerned in other affairs, demanding their attention, to allow of that immediate and direct devotion to this important question, which its weighty consequences demand, to qualify them for passing judgment upon it understandingly. All of these, with many other causes of delay, will conspire to render the work necessarily slow in its progress and protracted in its consumation.

To tear down and destroy, is a work that may be done in haste. But to take to pieces, and rebuild with the same materials, an edifice that has cost the toil, and taxed the ingenuity of nearly a quarter of a century, is a work that cannot be accomplished in a moment.

BR. BASSETTI I am pleased with your enlargement of the Recorder and think it somewhat improved. The editor being an old acquaintance, of course I feel friendly toward him and his paper, but I must admit I like the sentiments of the ex-editor on the subject of slavery better than those of the present one: Although I have been much gratified to find that Br. Bassett is not disposed to dis-union and disorganization, as too many of the styled philanthropists of the M. P. Church are.—As we all have an equal right to hold an opinion if not to express it, I would just say, that I hold the opinion that the Gen. Conference did about right in its action on the slavery question at its last session. And I am decidedly of the opinion that the conservative and anti-abolition part of that body showed more of the christian spirit than the ultra abolition brethren. Judging from what I read of the proceedings published, I would just remark here that I have become exceedingly tired of the agitation of this subject. I have frequently thought that I could enjoy myself better to be out from among those agitators. The fault is certainly amongst the ministry chiefly. for it is in their power to preach more of Christ and him crucified and preach and talk less about * * * * but enough of this.

Yours, &c., THOS. P. ARMSTRONG.

BR. BASSETT: Believing, and that sincerely, that upon the establishment throughout the world of the principles for which we contend; depends the like extensive establishment of gospel holiness and prevalence of the glorious liberty of the children of God; therefore, an intelligent, firm and modest zeal, that welcomes sacrafice, and with pleasing delight meets and surmounts every obstacle that lurks in the pathway of truth, love and unity, cannot be justly considered selfish ambition or sectarian bigotry. But O! slavery, slavery, how thou art wounding Christ in the house of his friends. Could those good brethren who can no longer remain in the M. P. C. in consequence of her connection therewith, but see as we do the principles upon which a gospel church should be established, they certainly would be content to let the legislative, judicial und executive departments of the M. P. C. remain where they are.

I cannot see, that the constitution of the M. P. Church, revelation, or reason, sanctions this wholesale criminating or excommunicating on account of sectional wrongs. If thy brother trespass against thee, go and tell him between thee and him alone, &c. which points to the judiciary for litigation, to the executive for execution, and to the bible for law, by which all members accused of immorality should be tried, and not to the edicts, resolutions, or opinions of any body of men upon earth: and every edict, resolution or opinion of any ecclesiastical body, by which the judiciary of the church would be biased or influenced in the smallest possible degree, is in our opinion, wrong in itself and incompatible with the gospel.

Biographical.

Written for the Western Recorder.

BR. BASSETT: Having been officially released, from Port William Circuit, and appointed to this (Cincinnati) Circuit, I entered at once upon the duties of my charge. Found my old friends and brethren generally in health. Yet some, were severely afflicted. One of these, Sister MARY SHELDON, has since gone to her great reward. Her husband, BR. MOSES SHELDON, but 3 or 4 weeks previous, also leaned his head upon his Savior's breast, and there sweetly breathed out his life. They were both taken down with fever at about the same time. Br. S. was released by death in about 10 or 12 days. But his companion survived him, and lingered from 30 to 40 days, and though her sufferings were severe, she endured them calmly and patiently, knowing that those light affictions which were but for a moment, worked for her a far more exceeding and eternal weight of glory; and that they were not worthy to be compared with the glory that should be revealed in her." But death has relieved her and her companion from all pain, sickness, sorrow, and death. And though separated for a few weeks, it was but to meet again in the climes of endless blessedness; where tears are wiped from all eyes, and sorrow and sighing forever flee away. They have left one child, some fourteen months old. May the gracious Father of the fatherless, preserve, and guide, and save him. O what ravages death has made in this (Bethsada) Society, since I had last preached here, about four years since. Some 10 or 12 have fallen victims to his icy embrace—all active members. And though we were made to mourn over the death of those dear brethren and sisters, yet we rejoiced to hear that they all died in the triumphs of faith and had gone to rest with Christ. Within this period, Br. T. Hanford has lost his companion, four children, and a son in law, (the last a member of the M. E. Church.) And it is astonishing, with what christian fortitude, through grace, he is enabled to bear up under these severe afflictions. But ere long, if faithful he will be enabled to rejoin his departed companion and children, in a world of eternal peace and glory.

PROSPECTUS OF THE

LITERARY ATHENÆUM,

A NEW AND SPLENDID MONTHLY MAGAZINE,

TO BE EDITED BY THE

Rev. Henry D. Moore, of Philadelphia,—and Rev. Andrew A. Lipscomb, Professor of English Literature and Belle Letters, in the city of Baltimore.

ON the first of January, 1847, the subscribers intend issuing the first number of a spendid Monthly Magazine, to be called the "LITERARY ATHENÆUM," to be devoted to the interest and circulation of a mind-refining, soul-inspiring, spirit-stirring literature; such a literature, in a word, as the progressive taste of society seems to demand.

Between the magazines of the day, which are devoted almost exclusively to the circulation of Christian Literature, and those devoted to the light, and in too many instances, tasteless and corrupting literature—there is a wide and deep chasm, to fill which successfully and profitably, very few attempts have been made. To supply this void, to some extent at least, is the intention of the subscribers, in issuing the "Literary Athenæum."

The general cast and character of the contents of the proposed magazine will be fixed according to the standard of the most sterling intellect, and the most liberal appreciation of the wants of the common mind. Its pages will ever present a feast and a glow, to feed and illumine the loftiest and purest taste and spirit of the admirers and lovers of refining and exalting literary walks and research.

To secure this grand design, effectually and honorably, no pains or expenses will be spared.

The contents will be purely original; consisting of Lectures, Addresses, Essays, &c., on the most popular and exciting literary and scientific subjects, from the most able writers that can be secured—interspersed and relieved by beautiful poetic composition.

Science, Art, and government, in their almost infinite variety development and interest, will be liberay and honorably discussed in its pages.

Arrangements are in progress for an extensive and important European correspondence, which will be a feature of great interest in its varied connections.

In addition to such articles, there will be presented occasional tales of unexceptionable character and style; differing essentially from the weakish romances which fill the pages of the many magazines of the day. Writers in this connection, can be secured, whose productions are the emolument of life, true to itself,—and which will kindle and glow with the loftiest and purest sentiment, and thrill with the beauties of morality and religion in their loveliest forms.

Each number of the Athenæum will contain four embellishments of the first artistical merit, One of them will be a portrait of some distinguished personage in this country or in Europe, accompanied with an interesting biographical sketch. Another will be a view of the buildings and grounds, of some one of the popular Universities, in this or the old world, accompanied with a historical, biograpical and statisical sketch in this body of the work. The portraits will be fine mezzotint, and the college views beautiful line engravings. Then will follow richly colored specimens of flowers and fruit; in connection with which, there will also be presented interesting notices—floral and botanical—of climate, habits, culture, &c. All of which cannot but secure interest and favor.

Each number will comprise sixty pages of letter-press double column, beautifully stereotyped, and printed on fine white paper; the whole corresponding in all respects with the character of the other departments of the work.

Such is to be the character of the work at its commencement. If it is successful, as it ought to be, and as is hoped and believed it will be,—improvement will be made as far as possible in the different departments, as they are suggested in the progress of the work.

The subscribers take pleasure in announcing to the public, that they have concluded arrangements with the Rev. Henry D. Moore, of Philadelphia, and Rev. Andrew A Lipscomb, Professor of English Literature and Belle Letters, of Raltimore, who will co-operate as Editors the conew Magazine. Under the management of those gentleman, the subscribers flatter themselves, abundant success will be secured in behalf of the enterprise.

TO PUBLISHERS.

The subscribers would also give notice to Publishers, at home and abroad, that there will be in connection with the work, an extensive review department. This will be made a feature of excelling interest. The department will be conducted fairly and honorably, and all works sent to the office of the subscribers, will receive such notices as the character may demand.

The first number will be issued on the first of January 1847. Its contents and the name of cohtributors, will be published shortly.

TERMS—Three dollars per annum, in advance.

Editors of papers, copying this Prospectus, and sending a paper with it, to the office of the "Athenæum," shall receive the numbers of the work, and the thanks of the publishers.

All letters, containing orders for the work, post-paid, and enclosing the subscription price, will receive prompt attention. To be addressed to

THANKSGIVING SERMON,

Rev. T. H. Stockton, Pastor 1*st M. P. hurch, Philadelphia, Thursday Morning ov.* 26. 1846.

ore than half the stars of our political conation hallow this hour. Or, to allude, rather, e territory on which they shine—from the k of Plymouth to the Prairie Banks of Lake higan; from the deep and dark rush of the sissippi to the gentle lapse of the Potomac—ing, hushed and reverent, by the tomb of shington; and so back again to the white nd, and foaming surf, of the far-rolling and l-roaring Atlantic—the pious Proclamation of Elect Rulers have sanctified the day, and ted us to assemble, in our thousands of tem-, and offer our humble and grateful tributes to common Father and God.

We are here, in compliance with the appointnt and recommendation of the Governor of own State. According to the allusion just de, we unite with our fellow-citizens throughthe commonwealth, and with those, also, of en other states, in simultaneous celebration of Divine goodness.

et us commence by invoking—as I trust we now do—most heartily, the presiding, direc-, and redeeming presence and aid of the y Spirit.

The passage of Scripture which I proce ed to ounce as my text, may be regarded as an ostolic Proclamation of Thanksgiving. It y be found in the 1st Epistle of Paul to Timo-, ii. 1—10:

I exhort therefore, that, first of all, supplications, yers, intercessions, and giving of thanks, be made for nen: for kings, and for all that are in authority, that may lead a quiet and peaceable life in all godliness and esty. For this is good and acceptable in the sight of our Saviour: who will have all men to be saved, and ome unto the knowledge of the truth. For there is God, and one mediator between God and men, the n Christ Jesus; who gave himself a ransom for all to estified in due time. Whereunto I am ordained a acher and an apostle, (I speak the truth in Christ, and not,) a teacher of the Gentiles in faith and verity. I therefore that men pray every where. lifting up holy ds, without wrath and doubting. In like manner , that women adorn themselves in modest apparel, a shame-facedness and sobriety; not with broidered , or gold, or pearls, or costly array, but (which beeth 'women professing godliness) with good works."

t is my design first, to give a rapid and brief aphrastic exposition of this passage; and, ondly, to apply it, in its spirit at least, to the ies of the occasion.

I. EXPOSITION.

. "I exhort, therefore, that, first of all supplitions, prayers, intercessions, and giving of nks, be made for all men; for kings, and all t are in authority; that we may lead a quiet peaceable life, in all godliness and honesty." his instruction appears to relate to public rship. That it does so, is still more apparent n the last two verses of the text, in which both n and women are advised of the proprieties to bserved in this connection. The meaning of apostle is, therefore—Let this be a standing inance in public worship. In all your adsses at the Throne of Grace, remember all n, and especially rulers. Duty and interest te in demanding this attention.

The services here specified are four: supplicans, prayers, intercessions, and thanksgivings: more distinctively rendered, by Dr. Macght, deprecations, supplications, intercessions, l thanksgivings.

Deprecation has for its object, the prevention, removal, of evil. "Lead us not unto temptan, but deliver us from evil," is a deprecation. ne forms of prayer, as you know, offer many ticular deprecations. "From"—such and h evils—"good Lord deliver us."

Supplication respects, rather, the bestowment good. "Give us this day our daily bread, and give us our trespasses as we forgive them that spass against us"—is a supplication: and a y comprehensive one, too, relating to both ly and soul, and involving all natural and ritual blessings.

Intercession, is a requirement of mediation. diation includes many duties, among which incession is one. The mediator, besides doing er things, intercedes. Strictly, there is but ne Mediator between God and men—the man rist Jesus." Still, subordinately, in His name, may take part in this one duty of the office. e cannot perform its other duties. We make nement. But, we may intercede; and are re instructed to intercede; and this, perhaps; ticularly for the conversion of those for whom intercession is to be made.

Thanksgiving is the expression of gratitude for loving-kindness of God, as already manifesl; whether in answer to our former deprecations, plications, and intercessions; or in unasked exhibitions of the tenderness of His affection, d the abundance of His resources, in our beif, through Jesus Christ our Lord. He has alady, in mercy to all, prevented many evils; livered from many evils; bestowed inestimable od, both natural and spiritual; and multiplied nversions to our Holy Religion among all clas throughout the world.

The persons in whose behalf these services are be performed, are thus announced: 1. "For men." 2. "For kings, and all that are in auority."

In the first of these announcements, the uniersal charity, the boundless impartiality of ristianity may be seen. It was necessary to ake this distinction of the New Dispensation pressively evident. The enemies of Christ d not understand it. They regarded the new stem as unsocial; and derided it, as malignant. truth, it was just the reverse—the most wonrful development of the love of God to the ole world. He is no respecter of persons, of tions, or of countries. If the former relative sition of Jews and Gentiles, seemed to intimate at He is partial; that seeming intimation is now rrected. Judaism was only a transient institution, and is now for ever superceded. The original truth, revealed long before Judaism existed, even from the beginning of the world, that God is the common Father of all men, is now again disclosed, and in far greater glory than ever. Now, "there is neither Greek, nor Jew, circumcision nor uncircumcision, Barbarian Scythian, bond nor free; but Christ is all and in all." It was in the true spirit of Christianity, therefore, that the apostle gave this direction. Let the impartiality of God be shown in your worship: let the services you celebrate declare to all whe witness them, that our religion is the religion of all people—of the poor—of the masses—in a word, of all men.

In the second of these announcements, the respect of Christianity for the Civil Authorities is evident. It was also necessary to make this distinction of it, plain and convincing. The Jews were known as a turbulent and rebellious people. The Christians were at first regarded as a Jewish sect. From the very beginning, the enemies of Christ endeavored to bring him and His disciples into conflict with the State. He was stigmatised as a traitor; and His followers, as seditionists. True, He, himself, proclaimed the law of His kingdom, in this respect: "Render unto Cesar the things that are Cesar's; and unto God, the things that are God's." Still, it was highly important that the church should repeat this proclamation; and show the law in practical efficiency. Paul was particularly careful to fulfil this duty. "Let every soul be subject unto the higher powers"—said he, "For there is no power but of God: the powers that be are ordained of God." Civil Government could properly ask no more than this acknowledgment. Any form of it, while it stands, is to be regarded as a Divine ordinance; and submitted to, as such. The worship of the church ought to recognise these devotions. And how could it do so better, than by presenting solemn services in behalf of Civil Rulers—by offering, first of all, deprecations, supplications, intercessions, and thanksgivings "for kings, and all that are in authority?" Surely, this course was a becoming and wise one.

The advantage anticipated by the apostle, as resulting, from obedience to these instructions, to the church itself, is thus alluded to—"that we may lead a quiet and peaceable life, in all godliness and honesty."

He knew that such services, exhibited by the church, in its public worship, would have a natural tendency to subdue the enmity, and propitiate the favour both of the people and their rulers. He knew, moreover, that, in answer to such petitions, humbly and faithfully urged, there was every reason to expect the outpouring of the Spirit upon them, still more strongly disposing them to let the Christians dwell among them in quiet and peace. They regarded the Christians as impious; but by these means they would be convinced of their "godliness." They regarded the Christians as treacherous; but, by these means they would be persuaded of their "honesty." The apostle knew that the Christians were godly —or true to their God; and that they were honest —or true to their neighbour: and he desired "all men." and especialty "kings, and all that" were "in authority," to be assured of these facts; that popular violence might be suppressed, and state persecutions countermanded; and the disciples of the meek and lowly Redeemer be permitted to "lead a quiet and peaceable life."

Having thus noticed the exhortation itself, let us now run over the reasons for it. These are thus stated:

1. "For this is good and acceptable, in the sight of God our Saviour." I need not enlarge upon this. It cannot be made plainer. To offer such services, in our public assemblies, for such persons, and for such purposes, instead of being in any wise offensive, is "good and acceptable in the sight of God our Saviour."

But now for the philosphy of this—the divine and glorious philosphy of this. Christianity is God's religion. Its Founder was His Son. Its subjects are His people. Jews and Gentiles, the People and their Rulers, all hate the whole development. They crucified Christ; and oppose His disciples. Yet these disciples meet together for public worship, and, first of all offer deprecations, supplications, intercessions, and thanksgivings, in their behalf; and this is said to be "good and acceptable in the sight of God our Saviour." How can this be? Why do not the worshippers invoke vengeance? Why does not God display His wrath? Because of God's purpose. They know it; He remembers it. What is it? The next verse declares it,

"Who will have all men to be saved, and to come unto the knowledge of the truth." "All men"—Jews and Gentiles: "all the world." He desires to have it so; designs to have it so; decrees that it shall be so; and commands all men to cooperate with Him in making it so. He "will have all men to be saved."

Now, what is the utmost extent to which the meaning of this word "saved" can be properly expanded here, I shall not, at present, attempt to decide. Many different opinions are maintained, in relation to it. But the following points, at least, seem clear to my mind;

1. It includes deliverance from falsehood. So I would paraphrase the verse: "Who will have all men to be saved from falsehood, and to come unto the knowledge of the truth." That is, God will have these religions abolished. He will break their bars; burst open their gates; and set their captives free.

2. It includes, as expressed, "the knowledge of the truth." God will put Christianity in the place of the false religions. He will make all men know that this is the true religion. He will show them the difference between this, and those in which they now trust. He will illustrate and confirm its infinite excellency, by its universal establishment.

3. It includes whatever God had in view in the appointment of Jesus Christ as the Mediator between Himself and all men; and all that the Mediator had in view in His humiliations and sacrifice for all men. "For there is one God, and one Mediator between God and men, the man Christ Jesus; who gave himself a ransom for all, to be testified in due time." "A ransom for all"—that was the Mediator's object. That was God's object. But how much does this object include? A ransom from what? From ignorance? From error? From sin? From death? From hell? How far does it go? Does any thing qualify it? If so, what? And to what extent? Has the whole matter been testified? Or is it yet to be testified? Has the due time come? Or, is it yet to come? For the present, it may be enough for us to know, that God "is the Saviour of all men, especially of those that believe." There is a common salvation for the world, and a special salvation for believers.

No wonder, then, that deprecations, supplications, intercessions, and thanksgivings, in behalf of all men, are "acceptable unto God our Saviour." He is willing to hear them, because it is according to His purpose to answer them. His New Covenant includes, in its redeeming contemplations, every king and prince, every patrician and plebeian, every artisan and peasant, on the face of the earth.

In the next verse, the apostle magnifies his office, as the ordained messenger of Christ to the Gentiles, commissioned to inform them of these glad tidings. "Whereunto I am ordained a preacher and an apostle, (I speak the truth in Christ, and lie not,) a teacher of the Gentiles in faith and verity."

In the three concluding verses of the text, he directs both men and women in what way to appear, in their solemn assemblies, for the performance of these services of Divine worship. The men are to offer these prayers, in every place; first, "lifting up holy hands"—i. e. making a reverent appeal to God for the innocency of their lives; secondly, "without wrath"—i. e. with nothing but love in the heart; and thirdly, without doubting"—i. e. with nothing but faith in the mind. Coming before God, in behalf of others, their own minds, and hearts, and lives must be right in His sight. "In like manner, also, the women,"—who are invited by Christianity to come out and participate with the men in such offerings,—are to make their appearance with certain adornments. And, as though the apostle were afraid they would make some mistake in relation to the kind of ornaments they should wear, he distinguishes the right kind from the wrong, himself. They are to come "in modest apparel, with shamefacedness, and sobriety"—not with broidered (or plaited) hair, or gold, or pearls, or costly array; but, (which becometh women professing godliness) with good works." This is the way for men and women to come to thanksgiving! the right way! the becoming way!

Having thus attended to the exposition of this passage, let us now conclude by making some application of it to the circumstances of the occasion:

II. APPLICATION.

The impression, I think, must have been generally made, that these services are in the spirit of those of the Primitive church. Those indeed, were ordinary; these are extraordinary; those were directed by church authority, these are invited by state authority; those were celebrated by comparatively few persons, these are observed by the great mass of the population; but, notwithstanding these differences, the spirit of the service is the same. The church, ministers in behalf of all men; for all that are in authority, and for all that are under authority.

I alluded, in the commencement, to the fact, that more than half the states of our confederacy, unite in this worship. These are: Vermont, New Hampshire, Massachusetts, Connecticut, Rhode Island, New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Delaware, Maryland, Kentucky, Ohio, Indiana, Michigan, Iowa, and Louisiana.

These states are reported as comprising "at least three-fourths, or fifteen millions" of the population of the Union. What a vision! How would Paul exult to contemplate such a scene! What a difference between the services of the isolated and persected churches of his day, surrounded and obstructed by the ancient, powerful, and imperious institutions of Judaism and Paganism—and this unrivalled uprising of the whole people, not only without let or hinderance, but at the respectful invitation of their elect rulers!

I have read and compared the proclamations of six of our Governors. Some of these, are, indeed, but poor specimens of the style proper to such papers; and have very little of the distinctive spirit of Christianity in them. Others, however, are admirable models, in both respects:

[Here, the proclamations of Governers Colby, of New Hampshire;—Briggs, of Massachusetts; —Toucy, of Connecticut; and Shunk, of Pennsylvania—were read, to the congregation. After this, for the sake of contrast, and as prompting to gratitude and good work was read, "the Form of Prayer, drawn up by the Archbishop of Canterbury in view of the 'dearth and scarcity now existing in parts of the United Kingdom, owing to the failure of some of the crops of the present year'—to be used on Sunday, October 11th, and the two following Sundays." We have not room, nor is it necessary, to re-publish the documents. It may be well, however, to subjoin a synopsis of the reasons for thanksgiving and prayer, assigned by some of our chief magistrates:

I. REASONS FOR THANKSGIVING.

1. New Hampshire:—"For preserving our lives in circumstances of great mercy thus far through the year—that the year itself has been one of plentiful harvest—that means of general improvement are advancing—that the advantages of education and intelligence are widely extended—and above all, for the blessings of the holy religion, which, while it reveals to us our nature, bears also the consolation of its promises, through the Son of God."

2. Massachusetts:—"Unnumbered mercies —a year of signal prosperity to all classes of the people." "Business has been successful, labour has been rewarded, the productions of the earth have been abundant, the means of education have been improved, and those civil and religious institutions, transmitted to us from our farthers have secured the uninterrupted enjoyment of individual and public liberty, and the right of every citizen to worship the Creator according to the dictates of his conscience."

3. Connecticut:—"For our existence, for the continuance of our lives, for the overflowing cup of His bonnty, for the improvements of civilization, the freedom of onr institutions, the prevalence of good government, and abundant means of education and instruction which we enjoy, and for His goodness to us, to our country, and to all men —and especially for the revelation, perfect example, and infinite sacrifice of our blessed Lord and Savior Jesus Christ."

4. Pennsylvania:—"For His goodness, vouchsaved to us during the past year—in continuing to us blessings of civil and religious liberty—in preserving us from the ravages of malignant disease—in leading us with the fruit of His bounty—in furnishing us so abundantly the means of individual, domestic, and social improvement and enjoyment—and in continuing among us the institutions and ordinances of our holy religion, in all their purifying and elevating influences."

II. REASONS FOR PRAYER.

1. New Hampshire:—"While we render tharks to the Most High for the dispensation of these mercies to us, let us beseach Him to extend them to the whole family of man;—that the declaraton 'that he that giveth to the poor lendeth to the Lord,' may be felt in its full force;—that war may cease upon the earth; that the grace of God may be given to his professed worshipers, so that the rights of all men may be most sacredly regarded by them; that the spirit of wisdom may guide our rulers, so that liberty may be given to the opressed—that the light of the Gospel may be diffused through every land—its influence sanctify every heart—and lastly, that the blessings of our quiet New England homes may be enjoyed ere long throughout the world."

2. Massachusetts:—"Enjoying the temporal blessings bestowed upon us by our heavenly Father, let us remember that our immortal nature needs those spiritual mercies that will 'make us wise unto salvation,' that we are sinners before the Supreme Judge in heaven and earth, and that our only hope of pardon and acceptance with him, held out in the volume of inspiration is by 'repentance toward God and faith in our Lord Jesus Christ."

"Let us humbly pray that God will continue to us, as individuals, and as a community, those privileges and enjoyments which he has hitherto vouchsaved to us.

"That he will dispose the rich in this world's goods to remember the poor and to show kindness to the widow and the fatherless:

"That he will look propitiously upon the people of our sister states, and bless them:

"That he will impart wisdom to the goverment of this union, and direct to such measures as shall promote the best interests of the whole country:

"That he will inspire those who conduct the administration of our public affairs with an elevated patronism, a love of justice and of peace, and cause that a speedy termination be put to tha war which exists between this and a neighboring republic, so that the soldiers of their armies shall no more imbrue their hands with each other's blood, and the sound of lamentation and mourning shall no more be heard from those who are lain in the battle:

"That he will appoint and give efficacy to the mean which shall in his own good time, exhibit to the world a practical illustration of that prominen and beautiful truth put forth in our Declaration of Independence,, 'that all men are created equal,' and present this great confederacy of states without a bondman within its limits:

"Finally, that he will hasten the time when the religion of his Son shall pervade the whole earth, animate the heart and influence the conduct of every one of its inhabitants; and when the song of angels, heard by the sheperds of Judea, shall be echoed by the whole human family, Glory to God in the highest, and on earth peace good will toward men."

3. Connecticut:—"Most devoutly to supplicate the continuace of his unmerited favor."

4. Pennsylvania:—"While thus with grateful hearts we thank Him for His goodness, let us acknowledge our sins; invoke His forgiveness, an supplicate His continued favor to our beloved country. Let us humble ourselves before Him, that in His holy providence we have been involved in war with a neighboring republic. In our thanksgivings for the victories He has caused our arms to achieve, let us commend to his compassion the hearts that have been made desolate by the ravages of the sword; and earnestly pray that peace, alike honorable to both nations, may be restored; and that the whole family of mrn united in the bonds of fraternal affection, may go forward in the cultivation of every peaceful art and science, in the advancement of civil liberty and the universal diffusion of a pure and undefiled religion, correcting whatever is wrong in the condition of human society, to the achievement of that high and holy destiny contemplated in the purpose of infinite benevolence."

We cannot, of course recall the remarks made in these connections. It must suffice to say, that particular emphasis was laid upon the manner in which these documents are closd. It is always a delight to us, to dwell on such official recognition of the Lordship of Christ:

"Given under my hand, and the great seal of the state, at Harrisburg, this twenty-first day of October, in the year of Our Lord, one thousand, eight hundred and forty-six, and of the commonweath the seventy-first."

Omitting whatever additional and practical directions was given to the subject, we conclude our sketch by a sort of response and chorus suggested by the above form:]

OUR LORD!

THE RESPONSE AND CHORUS OF THE STATES.

Our Lord!"—exclaimed Vermont. "Our Lord!"-responds New Hampshire. "Our Lord!" —esponds Massachusetts. "Our Lord!"—responds R. Island. "Our Lord!"—responds Connecticut. "Our Lord!"—responds New York. "Our Lord!"—responds N. Jersey. "Our Lord!" —esponds Pennsylvania. "Our Lord!"—responds Delaware. "Our Lord!"—responds Maryland. "Our Lord!"-responds Ohio. "Our Lord!" —esponds Michigan. "Our Lord!"-responds Iowa "Our Lord!"-responds Indiana. "Our Lord!" —esponds Kentucky. "Our Lord!"—responds Louisiana. And all their sister states, and terrirores, anticipating, it may be, their own days of similar celebration, catch the same spirit and extend the same response, until, from the Lakes to the Gulf, from ocean to ocean, the matchless domain of the illustrious and happy confederacy, echoes, and re-echoes, from mountain, to mountain, from shore to shore, from plain to sky—from the world which was shadowed by His cross to the world which shines with His throne—with the perfect and grateful chorus—Jesus Christ, Our Lord!

THE OLD BOOKS.

BY D. C. COLESWORTHY.

'Do you buy old, second-handed books?' inquired a boy of Mr. Letford, the bookseller.

'Not very often,' was the reply. 'Sometimes we take school-books that have been used a little, in part pay for others.

'Can't yon buy these books of me?' said the boy, placing six or eight volumes on the counter.

Mr. Letford took one up, to examine, saying —'These are very old books, and I could never sell them. They are not worth two cents a piece to me!"

'They are good books; some of them are old sermons. Perhaps you could sell them. What will you give me for them.'

'I don't want them.'

'I must have a little money. Will you give me sixpence a piece for them?'

"No: I will not give you but three cents a piece. At that price you may leave them, or take them somewhere else.'

'Where would I be likely to sell them,' anxiously inquired the boy.

'The best place would be to put them in the auction room. Carry them down to Mr. Bailey, the auctioneer, and ask him to sell them. You can get more than I would allow you.'

'I will see Mr. Bailey, then,' said the boy, tying up his books, and putting them under his arm, 'for I feel unwilling to sell them for what you offer me, although I want the money.'

Mr. Letford attended to his business, and thought no more of the lad, till about two or three weeks after, when the same boy came into his store, with the very books he carried away.

'Sir, I have not yet sold my books,' said the boy, 'I carried them down to Mr. Bailey, and requested him to sell them at auction, but he said they would bring little or nothing. I left them, telling him I would call in a short time and get my pay, if he would dispose of them. To-day I called, and was handed my books. Mr. Bailey said he offered them for sale, but no one would bid over two cents a piece, and he could not let them go. Now I've come to sell them to you. Can't you give me over three cents a piece?'

'No: they are not worth more than that to me.'

'Well take them, then.'

The bookseller counted out twenty-four cents, and handed them to the boy, while he placed the odd volumes under his counter.

The boy appeared pleased with his money, thanked the gentleman, and was leaving the store, when Mr. Letford asked him—

'My lad, what is your name?'

'Charles Merrill,'

'Where do you belong?'

'To North Yarmouth.'

The boy immediately left the shop, while Mr. Letford waited upon his customers.

Six months more had expired since the bookseller had purchased the books of the boy, when one day, as he was cleaning up his shop, his eye chanced to meet the old volumes. Taking one up, he found it to contain sermons printed about a century before. As he was looking over the pages carelessly, he found concealed between two of the leaves a ten dollar bill. On examining it, he descovered that it was genuine although about twenty-five years old. Curiosity led him to examine the book more carefully, when he fouud, to his astonishment, in all fifty ten dollar bills of the same bank,—making in all five hundred dollars. The other volumes were searched as carefully, but they contained nothing.

'Where can I find the boy of whom I purchased these books?' was the first question Mr. Letford put to himself, after his surprise was over.

He recollected that the boy's name was Merrill, and that he informed him that he resided in North Yarmouth.

That very day he addressed a line to the boy, stating that he had something of importance to communicate to him, and requested him to come immediately to Portland. He waited a week or two, but received no answer. The first opportunity, he took a chaise and rode out to make inquiries respecting the youth. After spending several hours, he learned that a boy by that name lived with Mr. Mitchel about six or eight months before. On Mr. M. the bookseller immediately called. From him he learned that a poor boy by that name came to him one day and solicited employment, stating that he was poor and destitute.

Out of pity, Mr. Mitchell employed him several months, when the boy left, stating he intended to go to Readville or Bangor, to study. Mr. M. spoke well of the boy—said that he was industrious and pleasant—and spent much of his leasure time in reading. He could not remember where Charles was born, but believed that he was an orphan.

Without ascertaining anything more particular as to the whereabouts of the boy, Mr. Letford returned to the city. The next day he addressed a couple of letters to him; one was sent to Redfield, the other to Bangor. From these letlers he never received an answer.

The bookseller deposited the money in a bank, and made use of it as occasion required, determining, if possible, to find out where the boy resided, and always to have at his command the amount he had found. If Charles were an orphan, perhaps that money had been left to him by his parents; but he being young when they died, knew not that they possessed this amount; or it might be, that he had purchased the books of another, or that they had been given him. At any rate, Mr. Letford hoped that the time would come when the mystery would be solved, and the money be given to its rightful owner.

Years had passed away; and although Mr. L. had made numberless, inquiries, he could not ascertain anything definite respecting the youth of whom he purchased the old books.

About ten or a dozen years had gone by, and the bookseller had almost given up the idea of ever seeing the individual again, when in the summer he visited Boston, for the purpose of purchasing a stock of books.

As he was conversing with a wholesale dealer one morning, a gentleman come into the store with whom the dealer appeared to be intimately acquainted. He introduced him to Mr. Letford as the Rev Mr. Merrill, of A———. After a short conversation, the minister inquired if he were not the Mr. Letford who formerly traded in Portland.

'Yes, sir, and I still trade there.'

'Do you remember a little boy selling you some old books, about a dozen years ago?'

'Perfectly well.'

'I am that boy.'

'Indeed you astonish me. I have made more inquiries than a few, and have never been able to find what became of him.

'Soon after I sold you the books, I went to the eastward, with the intention, if possible, to attend school. The money that I obtained for those books was all that I had to defray my expenses. Taking my bundle in my hand, I started. In a few days, Providence provided me a friend, who took me to his house, gave me schooling, and prepared me for college. I graduated in New Hampshire, and for the last year I have been pastor of a church in this state.'

'I am really glad, sir, that I have met you at last! Do you remember what books you sold me so long since?'

'I do not,—only that some of them were volumes of sermons. They were books that belonged to my father. When he died, they came into my possession. Was there any thing remarkable about the books?'

'About six months after I purchased them, I took one volume to examine, and folded between the leaves I found fifty ten dollar bills.'

'You astonish me.'

'These bills must have been placed there by your father.'

'It was said that he had money by him when he died—but we could never find any.'

'That money, Mr. Merrill, has been kept at interest most of the time since I found it, and now I am indebted to you some eight hundred dollars, which I will forward to you as soon as I go to Portland.'

'Sir, I cannot consent to take that amount.—That the money rightfully belongs to me, I have no question; but I shall insist upon your keeping at least one half the amount.'

'On no consideration will I take it. I presume you are in debt for your education.'

'Yes, sir; I owe several hundred dollars for it.'

'You will now be able to square up, and have something left.'

Mr. Merrill thanked his friend in tears, and pressed him to keep a portion of the money for his own use.

In a few days, Mr. Letford returned to Portand, and the first thing he did was to return to Mr. Merrill the money which he had kept so long in his possession.

The amount exceeded eight hundred dollars, every cent of which he gave to the rightful owner,—feeling a satisfaction and pleasure in so doing, which a mean, dishonest man can never appreciate.

In a few months after, the pastor left his congregation for a week, to visit some of his Eastern friends, and for several days he stopped at the house of Mr. Letford. An acquaintance had been formed which could not be easily broken.

Had we not read the following in the newspaper, a year or two since, perhaps this story never would have been given to the world:

Married, in Portland, by Rev. Mr. Dwight, Rev. Charles Merrill, of A———, Mass., to Miss Eliza, daughter of Mr. James Letford.

PITTSBURGH DISTRICT.

Steubenville O. Dec. 25, 1846.

Dear Br. Bassett: I can only report in a general way, of the Pittsburgh District. Quite feeble in bodily health, but anxious in mind, I left home at the close of my three weeks affliction, on Monday 3 o'clock P. M. Oct. 19th, and reached old Harmony Meeting House, on Lewis circuit, (a distance of 141 miles, the way I went,) on Saturday in time to preach the 11 o'clock sermon. The meeting was very good—you have the particulars from our good Br. Stillians, that is enough. After visiting my old friend Jacob Lorentz and calling to see two brothers-in-law, G. A. Jackson in Weston and R. Jackson in Milford, and preaching in both those places, I past on to my meeting Peters' Chapel, on Clarksburg circuit—held meeting at Br. I. Swishers by the way—enjoyed sweet rest for the night under his roof, and the next day this kind Br. went with me through the rain to my appointment. Peters' Chapel is a frame house—unfinished; no sash or glass in the windows—nor was there a stove—we had no fire. In so wet a season we could not in truth, pronounce ourselves comfortable. This might have been a first rate meeting, if the house had been in good order. As matters were, we done the best we could, and have reason to believe, that the labors of the ministry were owned by the Lord, and that the blessings of the most High, did attend his people, in the use of the means of grace. The preachers of that circuit Brs. Reger and Lister appear to be well received, and promise fair to be useful. God send them prosperity, in all their labors of love.

Br. Henry T. Lawson of the Muskingum District, met me at the above meeting, and gave us one very profitable sermon. He naturally belongs to our Conference. His relations are with us. He started out in the ministry from among us, and were I not a little afraid of certain imputations, I'd ask him to return to his own land again, but I forbear.

After preaching at Kyzer's meeting house, and at Pruntytown, I proceeded to Evansville circuit. My meeting was at the town of Evansville. Br. Waren the Superintendent, arrived on Sunday 11 o'clock, and left on Monday morning. His wife was sick. So being pretty much alone, in the work, I done all I could in 4 sermons, and a love-feast. The people appeared thoughtful and serious, as if the word took hold of their souls, but there was no general break, made upon the ranks of the ungodly. The children of God enjoyed this meeting very much: and so far as I could learn they love their preacher. They ought to have two preachers—one cant do all the work, on so large, and heavy a circuit. At Evansville they need a good meeting house. Come brethren, make an effort. That school house dont hold your Sabbath congregations—give the church a comfortable home, and it will prosper.

My next meeting was at Fairmont—it commenced Nov. 14th and I left on the 18th. The meeting appeared to be profitable to many of the church members, and the citizens appeared to give the gospel a fair and patient hearing. Brs. F. A. Davis, R. R. Helmick, and myself, done all we could, with the sword of the Spirit, which is the word of God. I am confident God was in his word,—my whole soul was drawn out after the sinners of that place. On Monday night one young man came to be prayed for—more aught to have come. On Tuesday night, he hung back —no one come,—so being rather discouraged, the meeting was brought to a close. How often is old Adam, and old Satan more than a match for me. Will not the work on this large circuit, or Br. Helmick suffer, if they do not get another preacher? no one man can do justice, to so large a field of labor, without injury to himself.

Nov. 21st my meeting for the Monongahela circuit, commenced in Mt. Morris. On my way to it, I preached in Morgantown, in the Baptist meeting house—ours being unfit for use. The plasterers were at work in it.

In Mt. Morris we need a meeting house. The School house used on the occasion is too small. A house, I think, will be erected there before long. The meeting seemed to be profitable to Christians, of all orders, who attended, and I hope good was done to sinners. However, none were converted. Brs. P. T. Laishley, N. Gilespie and myself, done our best, and meant it well. Our labor is with the Lord, and our reward shall be according to our work—not according to our success. God bless these good people, and their preacher.

On my way to my Waynesburg meeting at Barns' School house, I preached at Kirby's meeting house, and Murdock's School house--meeting commenced on Saturday 11 o'clock, and I left on Thursday morning. The church was revived and one penitent joined the Society. On the out of door people, it is believed, a good impression was made. Br. Porter and Colleague are doing well in their field of labor. If nothing happens to hinder the success of their labors, Waynesburg Ct. will rise this year. "O Lord revive thy work."

After preaching in the town of Waynesburg, on Thursday night. I proceeded on Friday to Washington—my meeting commenced that night. Signs of the times here are good. Sunday was a blessed day to our souls—a good sacrament—a good prayer meeting in the afternoon—one conversion. While I remained, there was cause of hope, and the meeting was continued—two joined the church, several persons had previously joined. Br. J. C. Hazlett is likely to do well in Washington. That previously afflicted Society, under his pastoral care is becoming harmonized, and I trust, will abundantly prosper this year.

I next came to Wheeling. Here our meeting commenced Dec. 11th, and closed on the 14th. We had a pleasant meeting,—congregations small. This was owing to the absence from the city, of so many of our members, and to special efforts being made, in several of the other churches. Our cause has a good standing in Wheeling, and every thing moves on, in orderly manner. Br. Watson, the Superintendent is greatly beloved, and I have no doubt will prove himself a useful laborer, among the people of his charge.—Lord send them prosperity.

On Tuesday 15th inst., I reached home, and found my beloved wife sick—very sick. She is now a little better, but until her health is further restored, I cant think of publishing any more appointments. Those already published will be met, so far as circumstances will allow.

In conclusion, I thank God for his care over me—I have stood my toils well. To say nothing of other labors and constant travelling and exposure, I have preached about 6 times per week. with but little inconvenience. I thank the friends and brethren for support rendered me, in a pecuniary way—five out of the eight appointments, paid the whole apportionment. Two about two thirds, and one, not quite half. This is help in time of need. Their kindness in all other respects, at all places where I stopped, or visited, will not soon be forgotten.

I meet with much to try me, much to humble me, much to stir me up, and cheer me on, in the heavenly road. Earth is nothing—Heaven is all in all to me.

Yours in much love, GEO. BROWN.

P. S. I am not in the mood to answer Br. Boardman's two inquires—nor to say any thing to the Committee on Horseology—most of that Committee have done more for me than my ing letter called for—they all have a place in my heart. G. B.

Lewis Circuit, Dec. 11, 1846.

MR. EDITOR: Another great revival of religion on this circuit. At a protracted meeting held on Smith's run—within two miles, of Weston, county seat of Lewis Co. Va. Said meeting commenced Nov. the 29, lasted 8 days, 35 where added to the M. P. Church on probation. And so far as I was capable of judging 37 embraced religion. Glory be to God's great, and very excellent name. Angels may whisper—but let redeemed soul's give glory to God. "But God forbid that I should glory save, in the cross of our Lord Jesus Christ, by whom the world is crucified unto me, and I unto the world."

Flatwoods, Braxton Co. Va, Dec. 16th 1846.

BROTHER BASSETT: As Revival Intelligence is always cheering to the friends of Zion I will give a sketch of the state of Religion on this (Braxton) circuit. Our first Quarterly meeting was on the last Saturday in October; & continued till Monday night. At the close when we gathered and shocked, we had twenty five accessions, and there had been ten or twelve conversions. Four weeks after, we commenced another protracted meeting. It continued four Days—the Result was nineteen converted, and ten accessions.

Br. Martin informed me yesterday that he had taken into the church since conference rising fifty members. There appears to be a good state of feeling all around the circuit. Peace and union prevail. To God be all the glory.

Yours ELIJAH SQUIRES.

CAUSE OF PEACE.

From the Advocate of Peace.

THE MEXICAN WAR.

WHAT SHALL BE DONE TO HASTEN ITS TERMINATION?

WE think it time to press this question upon the serious consideration of our countrymen. We would call their attention to it without disbinction of party, and ask every one to inquire for himself what he ought to do or attempt for the speedy termination of our present war with Mexico.

This war might be terminated very soon. If a spirit of peace should pervade both parties: if either party, actuated by such a spirit, should stop fighting, and then offer to settle the points in dispute by fair reference to competent and impartial umpires if war passions, and the semi-barbarous code of national honor did not goad them on in the work of mutual mischief and destruction; if the mass of the people in each or either country would call aloud for peace, or their rulers set themselves at work in earnest for a consummation so devoutly to be wished; how soon might this war come to a close, perhaps, without even another drop of blood!

Such a result is confessedly possible. And does not its bare possibility impose on every good man the duty of doing all in his power to arrest the murderous, suicidal strife now going on between these republics? Does not every principle of our religion, every dictate of humanity, every motive of patriotism, every just view of all the interests at stake, require such services of us at the present crisis?

If asked what you shall do for the speedy termination of this war, we answer that a great deal may be done by every class and every individual in the community. A public sentiment, once set universally and strongly against its further prosecution, would bring it to an end very soon; and every person in the land can do something to help form such a sentiment, and give it utterance and efficacy. If this sentiment were expressed in the way of petitioning our rulers to take measures to stop the war, and such petitions were poured into Congress from men of every party at the East and the West, at the North and the South, would not their wishes be heeded, and the war be brought at once to a close? So it seems to us; and hence we would urge upon all the importance of their petitioning Congress to use its constitutional powers in arresting this war, and securing a just and honorable peace without any more bloodshed.

May we not appeal especially to Christians? They believe in a gospel of peace; they are the professed followers of the Prince of Peace; and are bound, as we conceive, by every principle of their religion, to do all they can to stay the crimes and miseries of war. There are said to be in the United States some 45,000 Christian churches of every name, with three or four millions of members; and, if half these millions, in every sect and party through the land, would only unite in earnest against the further continuance of this war, would they not be sure to succeed?

Still more earnestly would we appeal to ministers of the gospel. They are the moral guides of the people; and, commissioned from the Prince of Peace, and the God of Peace, as preachers of a peaceful religion, ought they not to lead the van of efforts for the restoration and continuance of peace? Can they, without being recreant to God and humanity, shrink from such services at a time like the present? There are in the whole country, it is said, some 35,000 such heralds of peace; and, if they should all lift up their voices against the continuance of this war, would it not come to an end very soon? And what service would be more important, or more appropriate to their office?

More powerful still is the periodical press upon the mass of minds through the community. There are in the United States more than 100 religious papers, and some 1500 or more of every class, reaching every neighborhood, and every leading mind, with their daily or weekly issues: How easy for such a multitude of papers, if only united and earnest for peace, to insure its speedy, almost instant restoration!

Permit us, then, to bespeak, gentlemen of the press, your special co-operation for this purpose. We ask it without distinction of party. We do not wish you in this case to lift your voice either for or against any party as such; nor do we see why honest men of all parties cannot consistently co-operate for an object which every one of them desires. You are the law givers of that public sentiment which must, sooner or later, determine what measures shall be taken to stop this war between sister Republics whose interests are, and whose hearts ought to be, one now and ever. Will you not then use your best endeavors for peace by opening your columns to its claims, and inditing articles yourselves in its behalf?

RIBBON GRASS.

Ribbon grass, (Phalaris Americanis,) or as it is sometimes called, spriped grass, is often cultivated as an ornimental appendage to the flower garden. It requires a light warm soil. Being an aquatic plant, its transplantation to soils of this description creates a morbid action in the vessels, which is the cause of its beautiful appearance, as it is well known in its native localites it is not distinguishad by any great variety of colors, being almost of a dark insipid green. A communication in the Connecticut Farmer's Gazette, on this subject, from the pen of a Mr. E. Ives, contains the following:—

"About four years since, I put a small root of the ribbon grass in a swale which is covered with running water to the depth of three or four inches until late as June or July. The root was put in with the coarse grass (Carex) which occupied the ground. Another piece was put into swamp ground, where the water was stagnant. This ground was covered with weeds. They both flourished and spread—the grass growing more rankly than in my garden. I offered the grass to my horse; he ate it readily as he did herd grass.

This grass does not ripen its seeds in dry cultivated grounds, but the roots have a great tendency to spread; hence any quantity of roots may easily be procured. I have not observed if it perfects its seed in wet ground. This grass is very tenacious of life, produces abundance of foliage, and appears to be less injured by being trod on than any other grass.

The ribbon grass should be cut early; yet it is believed that if it is not cut until the top is perfectly dry, it would be better than any other grass in the same condition, because the lower joints retain their juice until autumn. I have not made any experiments with ribben grass upon peat ground; but intend this season to try it. I think this grass well worth the attention of those farmers who have yet ground which produces no grass, or low ground which produces coarse grass. One species of this grass has been used in England to prevent the encroachment of the sea, and to prevent the blowing of sand."

It is said that cattle are remarkably fond of it, that it starts quickly after the scythe, and will yield two crops a year. "In one case," says an exchange, "it was thrown into a bog, where it took root, spread rapidly, and excluded every other plant. It grew luxuriantly, and stood erect, full of large leaves four or five feet high. In another case it was thrown out of a garden into a mowing lot, where it continued to grow, and was then dug up and throwu into a brook, where it flourished and extended in a few years down the brook more than a mile; and finally spread over a number of acres, and converted a bog meadow into the best of mowing. It was mowed twice in the season and produced three tons of excellent hay to the acre annually. The meadow was so mirey that cattle could not not pass over it. The grass formed a sod sufficiently strong to pass with carts, and in some places it united over the brook forming a bridge. The brook is large enough to operate a cotton manufactory."—Olive Branch.

WESTERN RECORDER.

PUTNAM, OHIO.

SATURDAY, JANUARY 2, 1847.

NEW YEAR.—Through the benevolent providence of an ever blessed God, we are permitted to greet our readers with the opening of a new year. It should prove a useful retrospection to recount the unnumbered mercies of the past, and consider,

'What poor returns of love
Hath our Creator found.'

As a people we have been most highly favored. Want and destitution have been almost unknown amongst us. Seedtime and harvest, "rain from heaven, and fruitful seasons" with all things needful for life and godliness, have been our rich inheritance "filling our hearts with food and gladness." Surely, the Lord hath been mindful of us. And "he hath not dealt with us after our sins, nor rewarded us according to our iniquities." What a grateful—humble—obedient people should we be. Love to God should occupy our hearts, sacrafices of praise continually, should be offered up to our divine Benefactor, whilst good and useful thoughts, and purposes, and words and deeds, should mark our history of each day. And yet, how unmindful are we of our dependance, and obligation! "How thankless for the numerous benefits received! "Consider this, ye that forget God." And what a worldly minded people are we—seeking chiefly our own pleasure, or interest, or emolument, forgetful of our calling, to glorify God, and be useful to our fellow! And how numerous, and how grievous have been our sins! Marvelous, indeed, is the forbearance of our God, that he hath not 'cast us off forever.' He has preserved, and spared us to enter upon the duties and enjoyments of a new year!

During the year past, what members of our fellow mortals have fallen by the hand of death. No respect has been had to age, rank or merit. "The tall, the wise, the reverend head,' as well as the lowly cottager, and the mendicant, have alike been removed to 'the house appointed for all living.' And for what purpose, friendly reader, have our lives been precious in the sight of the Lord? Evidently, for some useful purpose. No creature should live in vain. "The chief end of man, is to glorify God, and to enjoy him forever." All that we can do for his glory, or in obedience to his requisitions, is but our reasonable service.' In entering then upon a new year, let us earnestly repent of our past delinquencies, and unprofitableness, and sins. Let us gratefully praise God for the continued, and bounteous displays of his undeserved kindness, and forbearance. And let us set out anew to live a holy, and consistent, and useful life. Let it be an individual enquiry, what can we do, more effectually to glorify God, and benefit society? Great schemes of benevolence are in operation for the benefit and salvation of mankind, which invite our co-operation. What are we doing for the Bible cause—the cause of Missions—the Tract cause—the cause of Sabbath Schools—the Temperance cause, and other forms of benevolent enterprise within our reach? Have we done nothing, or at most but little? Let us rouse. And —'what our thoughts design to do

Our hands, with all your might pursue.'

We enter upon a year of fearful uncertainties and perils. Multitudes, multitudes will finish their earthly career in 1847. It may be the case with the present writer or reader of this humble word of admonition. Yet a little while, and we shall 'wither as the grass,' and be no more numbered with the living upon earth. The Lord cause us 'to know our end, and the measure of our days, what it is, that we may know how frail we are.' And may he 'teach us, so to number our days, that we may apply our hearts unto wisdom.' For 'Life is the time to serve the Lord;

The time to ensure the great reward;
The day of grace, when mortals may Secure the blessings, of the day.'

OHIO LEGISLATURE.

Monday Dec. 21. Senate. A bill was discussed, providing for the election of the Board of Public Works by the people. Engrossed for a third reading.

House. Numerous petitions were presented praying for a modification of the license laws, repeal of the Black laws, &c. The afternoon session was occupied with discussion of the resolutions in defence of the war with Mexico.

Tue. 22. Senate. The bill was passed, providing for the election by the people of the Board of Public Works.

House. The 'war resolutions' after further discussion, were referred to a Committee on Federal Relations.

Wed. 23. Senate. A bill was received from the House for incorporating a Free Will Baptist Church in Logan Co. Mr. Goddard said, he objected to entertaining bills of this kind, not from objection to the object of the bill, but that there was already ample provision by general law, for the incorporation of churches, without application to the Legislature. He thought that the Legislature should refuse to pass acts of this kind, and then the people would the sooner find out that there was in existence, an all sufficient general law upon the subject.

Thu. 24. Some amendments of the tax law were discussed. Both houses adjourned over till Saturday.

Sat. 26. In the Senate, a resolution was agreed to instructing the Judiciary to enquire into the expediency of granting some relief to returned volenteers.
